to the question of pirating literary property, I should have no objection to any legislation which could equitably deal with the involved question of copyright, but I really think intervention on the subject is unnecessary. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is of opinion that in the case of short paragraphs any legislation would be useless, as the news could be taken, and the wording of the paragraph entirely changed. With regard to leading articles, there might be some chance of their being pillaged, but, even according to the present law, they may be published without a stamp, and, indeed, a newspaper might be published every morning at ten o'clock and sold at 1d., giving all the articles of all the morning papers in London. I will undertake to say, however, that such a paper would not have any very great circulation, for the English people have an instinctive dislike of anything which bears meanness and dishonesty on the face of it. I am of opinion, too, that the leading articles are not the things which sell a newspaper, though we all of us read them of a morning with a devotion which I cannot account for, seeing the little information which we generally find we have obtained when we get to the end of them. With regard, however, to the securities against libel and the like, I will just read to the House a little paragraph which I cut the other day out of the Cambridge Press :—

"The good Time Coming: I hear, upon good authority, that at this moment a project is on foot among the men who have been most active in the movement against the newspaper stamp duty to start a penny or twopenny daily paper, to appear at ten or eleven o'clock in the day, and to be composed of the materials furnished (at great expense) by the respectable daily papers a few hours before! The very idea of such villainy is revolting."

I do not know whether the worthy editor meant to apply these charges to my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. M. Gibson) and myself, but he certainly seems to forget that he has given all the securities which the law prescribes not to libel any one. This charge was copied into The Globe on the 12th of March, and the following morning it did duty in The Times. Now The Globe is a paper which, with the exception of a few advertisements which it gets from the Treasury, fills its columns entirely with intelligence which somebody with the help of a good pair of scissors has extracted from the morning papers. Now, I do not see exactly what mighty difference there is between coming out at ten o'clock in the morning and three in the afternoon, but certainly I think the conduct which is revolting in the one case cannot be entirely without guilt in the other. One request I would make of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that is, that he will bring in this Bill as soon as he can, and pass it as fast as ever the House will allow him; for I know that there are some hundreds of people in the country connected with newspapers—some of whom have opposed, and some supported the measure—who are in extreme difficulty to know what to do in their present state of suspense. They do not know exactly where they will be hit, and they are in great perplexity to know what arrangements they will have to make for the future. I entirely disagree, however, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that this measure will not produce a good crop of newspapers. I have here a paragraph from one of the Glasgow papers, I believe, from which I see that three new daily papers are about to be established in that city—the Daily News, the Morning Bulletin, at 1d., and the Evening Digest, at  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. In Manchester, too, preparations are being made for starting daily papers as soon as ever this Bill has passed. Something has been said to-night about the opposition which many of the provincial papers have made to this proposal, but I am very glad to say that a great many papers, and among them some of the best and most influential of the provincial press, have all along supported it. The Leeds Mercury for instance—a paper almost unexampled for the influence which it possesses in the district in which it is published—has always written in favour of the abolition of the stamp duty, as a measure, among other reasons, necessary for the spread of education. The Manchester Examiner, too, has always, from its establishment, consistently supported the measure; and The Manchester Guardian, a paper of older date and larger circulation, has also taken the same course, and has very lately charged a London journal with having opposed the Government because the Government was about to propose the abolition of the stamp. It is certainly very unbecoming for one journal to make such a charge against another, nor do I believe that it has the least ground in truth. I am quite satisfied, from years of attention to this subject, that there never was so large a measure, involved in a small measure, so to speak, as is the case with regard to this proposition for making the press free. I am willing to rest on the verdict of the future, and I am quite convinced that five or six years will show that all the votes of Parliament for educational purposes have been as mere trifles compared with the vast results which will flow from this measure, because, while the existing papers will retain all their powers of usefulness, it will call to their aid numbers of others not less useful, and while we continue to enjoy the advantage of having laid before us each morning a map of the events of the world, the same advantage will be extended to classes of society at present shut out from it. The Times newspaper has written rather strongly lately upon this subject, and in a manner which, if I had been asked for advice, I should scarcely have recommended—though, perhaps it is rather presumptuous in me to talk of giving advice to The Times. That journal generally says something good upon every subject, and only so far back as the 17th of May last it wrote an article on the subject, in which was the following paragraph—and I quote it to show that, however dangerous The Times may think any principle of legislation may be which is unfair to its own interests—and I am not at all prepared to say that the plan of Mr. Spring Rice, when he lowered the duties, was not unfair to that journal—yet on the subject of the stamp it can when it so pleases write as rationally and as powerfully as any one. This is the paragraph—

"With all our talk about knowledge, about the achievements of science, about education, schools, churches, enlightenment, and Heaven knows what not, there is something positively ridiculous in taxing that intelligence which really constitutes the great medium of a civilised country. We make a great stir about teaching everybody to read, and the State, that is the nation, pays a quarter of a million a year in teaching children to do little more than read. Then we proceed to tax the very first thing that everybody reads. In this way the newspapers pay for the education of the country, for they find their expenses aggravated and their circulation restricted by an impost about equal to the sum spent in educating the masses. But we have several times enlarged on the absurdity of a tax which, as it is a tax on news, is a tax on knowledge, and is thus a tax on light, a tax on education, a tax on truth, a tax on public opinion, a tax on good order and good government, a tax on society, a tax on the progress of human affairs, and on the working of human institutions."

Now I like authorities as well as anybody when they are on my own side, and The Times is a great authority, no doubt, on such a matter as this. I am prepared to admit that there is no journal to which the people of this country are more indebted than to The Times. Though it is, I consider, wrong on many points, though it knocks us all about pretty roughly at times, and though it maltreats many questions, yet it is a free press, and, whatever may be its faults, nobody can deny that education, freedom, and progress of every kind are very much indebted to that great public instructor. I quote this paragraph therefore with the more confidence, though I am not quite sure that The Times may not to-morrow entirely deny it, or write in an opposite sense. When we see, then, great and influential journals, such as The Times and the provincial papers to which I have alluded, whose interests are so deeply involved, writing in favour of the abolition of this duty, not a single Member of this House should rise to oppose it. Two Chancellors of the Exchequer have to-night told us that they are in favour of its abolition, and I hope no man who looks forward to becoming Chancellor of the Exchequer will have the boldness to dispute their opinion. This is the question of which there is no getting rid; you must decide it, and the only satisfactory way in which you can do so is to take the besom and make a clean sweep. I have done something towards bringing this question before the public and before the House, and, if this measure passes, I shall look back to the part which I have taken in this movement with as much pleasure as upon any part of my public career.

MR. PACKE said, that however much certain large towns might be enamoured of this measure, certainly in country districts, where people could only obtain their newspapers through the medium of the post, it was not at all palatable. He would not, however, object to the passing of the Resolutions now before the Committee, but he reserved to himself the right of opposing the measure at a future stage.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he could not regard one argument at least of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) as very conclusive, namely, that because the country was at war the present was to be the moment for getting rid of taxation. He quite agreed in the opinion that this was not exclusively a fiscal question; for, without doubt, it involved a great legal difficulty, and it was but right that the House of Commons should come to such a decision as would relieve the law officers of the Crown from their present false and embarrassing position. Still he was at a loss to know why 500,000*l.* of taxation could not be raised from newspapers published within a month after the occurrence of the events narrated. His belief was, however, that two-thirds of any tax levied upon newspapers must be absorbed in the expense of transmitting them through the Post Office. But he wished, before he came to any conclusion as to the measure now under discussion, to have a clear explanation from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the sources from which he intended to supply the consequent deficit of 200,000*l.*

Mr. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he considered the proposed alteration of the law was demanded with reference to the due administration of the law, from a regard for the education of the people, and out of respect for the House's own recorded Resolution.

Mr. BENTINCK said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had stated that there was an inconsistency in having assented tacitly to the Motion of the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) last year, and now opposing the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) had not spoken on the occasion when the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Gibson's) Motion was discussed, but certainly it would be a sweeping rule to lay down in that House that silence invariably gave consent. But, in fact, there was no real inconsistency between supporting the Resolutions of last year and opposing the present Motion. The right hon. Member for Manchester's Motion was—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the laws in reference to the periodical press and the newspaper stamp are ill-defined and unequally enforced, and it appears to this House that the subject demands the early consideration of Parliament."

Now, undoubtedly, the state of the law did demand early consideration; but he must entirely dissent from the particular manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to deal with the question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself told them that there are at this moment a great number of publications or newspapers the position of which was so doubtful that the highest legal authorities were at a loss whether they ought to tackle with them or not. Nothing could be worse than such an anomaly, and the state of the law ought to be dealt with as speedily as possible, if it were only to vindicate the rights of that portion of the press which was subjected to taxation.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he wished to know whether, in the case of the Resolutions being agreed to, the Bill would be brought in to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Resolutions would be reported to-morrow, and the Bill would be then introduced.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
House resumed.

THE UNFUNDED DEBT.

On the Motion for going into Committee of Supply,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the state of the Unfunded Debt for 1855-56. He was anxious to obtain from Her Majesty's Government some explanations in reference to this subject, because a strong impression rested on his mind that this branch of the public debt stood at a much higher figure than Parliament had a right to expect, or even, he suspected, were aware of. Indeed, he should have directed attention to the matter during the passing of the Exchequer Bills Act; but it did so happen that at that time there was no responsible Finance Minister in the House, besides which the Bill was only a sessional one. The only occasion on which he had had an opportunity of stating his opinion on the subject was upon the occasion of the passing of the Bill—which was late upon a Wednesday—when he took what he might venture to term a flying shot at it, and expressed a hope that these Exchequer bills would not change their nature and be turned into funded debt securities. However, the hon. Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Wilson) seemed on that occasion to consider any such contingency quite impossible. It was, however, an indisputable fact that Exchequer bills were converted into funded debt in the months of June and October of the year 1853; and it was against that process that he wished strongly to protest. The unfunded debt of 1853 amounted to 17,742,000*l.* By the 17 Vict. c. 25, it would be seen that the unfunded debt stood at 16,000,000*l.* But what was the amount of the unfunded debt for 1855 as it now stood under the Bill which had gone through that House? The actual sum appeared to be 17,183,000*l.*; but a certain amount of bills had been exchanged for bonds to the amount of 591,000*l.*; so that, practically, the unfunded debt for 1855 stood at the same amount as in 1853. He humbly submitted, therefore, that some explanation ought to be given as to why it was that the House had not been duly informed of the increase which had been made in the amount of the unfunded debt. Last year, on the occasion of his bringing forward his first Budget, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) stated that some Ways and Means would be required while his increased income tax was being realised; and, accordingly, he obtained a vote for the issue of 1,750,000*l.* in Exchequer bills. Now, it was these very Exchequer bills which he wished the House would trace, and in regard of which he was desirous it would determine whether it had been duly advertised of their issue. For he held it to be the imperative duty of Parliament closely to criticise every variation in the public debt—whether funded or unfunded—a doctrine nowhere more fully recognised than in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. Well, on the occasion to which he had just alluded, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the vote of 1,750,000*l.* was in the nature of Supply Exchequer bills, while he carefully drew a distinction between the permanent and unfunded debt and the class of bills we were then advocating. He added that they were to be withdrawn as soon as the new income tax was realised, and that they were not to be confounded with the permanent Exchequer bills debt, but were to be taken per se, and were to be paid off out of the growing products of the revenue. Well, on the 21st of February the right hon. Gentleman ceased to be Chancellor of the Exchequer; and then, in the absence of all explanation—there being no one in office capable of rendering the necessary official statement—Her Majesty's Government did not hesitate to bring forward a measure actually rendering nugatory all their former professions, and incorporating this issue of 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills of last year with the unfunded debt of the country. He certainly thought the House of Commons had a right to expect some explanation would be given relative to this occurrence, and he trusted that the course recently pursued would not be drawn into a precedent.

Sir H. Willoughby

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he had also given notice of a question to the same effect as the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby)—the terms of his question being, whether the Secretary of the Treasury could give any explanation of a renewal of 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills, which was stated to have been made contrary to a pledge given to the House of Commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the last Session? There was a general impression abroad that there was an irregularity in the statement of the accounts, and some discrepancy between the theory and the practice of the finance of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. The amount of Exchequer bills which it was generally expected would have to be renewed this year was 15,433,000*l.*, whereas the actual amount was 17,183,000*l.*, which included the item of 1,750,000*l.* referred to by the hon. Baronet. Now, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in his budget speech of 1854, stated that these were special bills raised for the purpose of meeting expenses which had been incurred before, that they would be paid off from the produce of the accruing taxation, and would not appear in the amount of Exchequer bills to be renewed this year. On the 6th of March, 1854, in bringing forward his budget, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he proposed to double the first half-yearly payment of the income tax, and to make provision, in the interval, before the tax could be actually levied by the issue of Exchequer bills within the amount of 1,750,000*l.*, which would be paid out of the growing produce of the revenue. In alluding to these bills, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said, they were, in reality, what other Exchequer bills falsely purported to be, supply Exchequer bills, and that when the supplies came in the bills would be paid off from such supplies, and nothing more would be heard of them. He had read that day the correspondence to which the hon. Baronet had alluded; and in it the right hon. Gentleman seemed to make two pleas, which appeared to be totally inconsistent with each other. The first was, that although the right hon. Gentleman might have stated what he had quoted, he, on a subsequent occasion, declared that they were not to be paid off at all, but were to be renewed as ordinary Exchequer bills. The other plea was, that this sum of 1,750,000*l.* was not renewed without notice, because he (Mr. Gladstone) did actually make a statement on the subject in reply to the hon. Baronet opposite. Now, the question of the hon. Baronet did not refer to this particular matter at all, although the right hon. Gentleman went out of his way to say that the bills to be renewed this year were ordinary Exchequer bills, to be renewed in the ordinary manner. This was on the 8th of May. He certainly could not find any modification in this of the previous statement; but even if there were, the right hon. Gentleman, on the 23rd of May, returned to his original statement, and declared that there was no change whatever in the intentions or the announcement of the Government, from the beginning, and that the bills were to be paid off from the accruing taxation. Now, no one could have expected to see such a sum of money mixed up—unintentionally, no doubt—with the whole amount of Exchequer bills. And were it not for the zeal and activity of the hon. Baronet opposite in these matters, who referred back to the returns of 1854, no one would have been likely to trace what were the real circumstances of the case. It was not his intention to assert that the right hon. Gentleman was not perfectly within the law in what he had done. But what he (Mr. Ricardo) maintained was this, that if the right hon. Gentleman intended these returns for the information of the House they were most clumsy and unbusiness-like. But if—what he could not believe—they were intended as a mystification, they could not be more efficient and successful. Who could suppose that the right hon. Gentleman intended to add to the debt in this manner? The right hon. Gentleman had denounced the raising of money by loan as a deliberate system of deception upon the public. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Where, or when?] He could not tell the exact line in which the expression occurred, but that the remark was made he would undertake to say. He had written it down from the speech as he had read it in Hansard. The right hon. Gentleman repudiated any idea of making a loan, and was indignant with the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) for supposing that the 6,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bonds might, by unfinancial minds, be interpreted into a loan. He (Mr. Ricardo) confessed that, for his part, he had very much the same idea as the hon. Member for Huntingdon. He thought, notwithstanding the presence of those unfortunate Long Annuities, which had been the prey marked out for destruction by successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, and which were to fall out as the Exchequer bills fell in, that if, at least, there were not 6,000,000*l.* added to the permanent debt of the country, they would be prevented from taking off a very large number of millions from the permanent debt of the country at the expiration of the Long Annuities. The right hon. Gentleman appeared not to be pleased at hearing these things mentioned; but he (Mr. Ricardo) felt bound to say that, if ever there was an amount of money added to the debt of the country without the country exactly understanding the process, it was the 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills which the right hon. Gentleman the then Chancellor of the Exchequer created last year. He did not think the present was the moment to discuss the abstract question of whether it was advisable to carry on war by means of taxation, or by means of loan. He was certainly very far from being one of those who objected to taxation, because it would render the war unpopular: he should be very glad to see war unpopular; but at the same time he believed that the attempt which was made last year—a very praiseworthy attempt, as he believed it to be—to raise the supplies, and to carry on the war by the taxation of the country, was an utter, unmixed, and irretrievable failure. That was plain from the result of the operations of last year. That being the case, would it not be better that the failure should be honestly, straightforwardly avowed? Why not let it be confessed that it was a failure? Of what use could it be to conceal that 1,750,000*l.* had been added to the permanent debt of the country? The right hon. Gentleman could easily explain how the failure had taken place without having recourse to any subterfuge. He recollects the open and manly way in which the right hon. Gentleman avowed the abortion—as he was pleased to call it—of the conversion of the South Sea notes. He thought the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willochby) was entitled to the thanks of the House for calling attention to the subject under consideration. It was a subject of great importance, and he trusted that the statements which had been made that night would have the effect of making the House more vigilant in such matters in future.

MR. WILSON said, that the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken rose to put a question to him, and he would endeavour very briefly to give him a satisfactory answer. In the first place, however, he heartily concurred with the closing observation of the hon. Gentleman, that the House was indebted to the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) for even at the eleventh hour calling the attention of the House to a circumstance so interesting and so important, and he sympathised very much with him when he regretted that these discussions were to be carried on in another place, where there was an absence of persons intimately acquainted with the details. He wished the hon. Baronet would exercise his vigilance still more, so that no misrepresentations might hereafter take place in reference to such transactions. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ricardo) said that if there were one question more certain than another, it was that the 1,175,000*l.* of Exchequer bills, which were now the subject of discussion, were as completely and as irretrievably added to the permanent debt of the country as any loan that was ever made. Now, on that point, he totally joined issue with the hon. Gentleman. He proposed not only to show that it formed no part of the permanent debt of the country, but still more to show that out of the taxation of the past year—out of the produce of the year—the whole expenditure had been paid, and that the country had not been debited with one single shilling on account of the expenses of the past year. It had been assumed that there was no question but that the Government had added to the national debt for the purpose of contributing to the necessary expenses of the war during the past year. Those assumptions were entirely unfounded, and he hoped he should succeed in convincing the House that upon the principles which were announced last year the Government had entirely fulfilled the promises which had been made. Perhaps the House would permit him to recur in the first place to the amount of Exchequer bills provided for the present year. The hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) was quite right in saying that the Exchequer bills ought to have been reduced by 591,000*l.*, and both the hon. Baronet and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke were right in supposing that the 1,750,000*l.* made part of the 17,183,000*l.*, the amount of the unfunded debt. When he introduced the Exchequer Bills Bill, and laid his statement on the table of the House, the hon. Baronet asked him whether that amount of 1,750,000*l.* would be reduced by the amount of Exchequer bills that had been funded in the preceding year. His reply was that the amount of Exchequer bills had been reduced, so there was no discussion on the subject, and the matter passed off without much observation. Having made these observations, perhaps the House would permit him to refer to the state of the unfunded debt as it now stood in relation to the previous year. In the previous year it amounted to 17,742,000*l.*; in the present year it was 17,183,000*l.*, showing a reduction of 559,000*l.* Perhaps he might be told by the hon. Baronet that in the meantime the Government had to a considerable amount converted Exchequer bills not only into stock but into Exchequer bonds. Well, if that were so, the House would of course find the amount figuring proportionally in the funded debt of the country; but, if they turned to the account of the funded debt, they would find that it amounted on the 5th of January, 1853, to 761,622,000*l.*, and to not more than 751,839,000*l.* at present; so that, in that period, the floating debt had been reduced by 559,000*l.*, and the funded debt, instead of being increased by the suggested conversion of Exchequer bills, likewise had decreased to the extent of 9,783,000*l.* The amount of Exchequer bonds forming a new species of debt on the 5th of January last was 1,043,000*l.* If that sum were deducted from 9,783,000*l.* being the amount of the funded debt, there would be still left a clear reduction of 8,740,000*l.* as funded debt, and 559,000*l.* as unfunded debt. Therefore, so far as the debt at the present period was concerned, it stood at least 9,200,000*l.* less than at the commencement of the year 1853. He must ask hon. Gentlemen to go back to the Budget of the 6th of March, 1854. On that day his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), then Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced that Budget with this explanation: He said, "The country was not then at war, but it was very likely to be at war, for which very large preparations had been made. He, therefore," he said, "proposed to lay before the House a statement of finances independent of that consideration, reserving to himself the right of coming down for further expenses, which would be rendered necessary by the war, if it should unhappily take place." Now, on the 6th of March there was a deficiency upon the Estimates of 4,307,000*l.*,

supposing no war took place. Now, how did the right hon. Gentleman propose to provide for that deficiency? He said that, in the first place, he should ask the House to double the income tax, and that the whole amount of the increase should be received by him in the first half year. The half year's income tax was estimated at 3,370,000*l.* The right hon. Gentleman said that it was quite true that he lost an additional amount of taxation equal to the income tax of the half year, but inasmuch as the dividends would not come in until July, he must make immediate arrangements to meet demands, and he asked the House to give him 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer Bills Supply Bills, distinctly stating that they were different in their nature, though not in name, to the ordinary Exchequer bills of the year. The right hon. Gentleman intended paying those Exchequer bills from the growing produce of the taxes which he then proposed. He took the precaution also of saying that he could not foresee what would happen. If war took place he should be obliged to make a further provision, and he distinctly, time after time, referred to the impossibility of guaranteeing the House that he should not make further claims during the year. Suppose no declaration of war had taken place, let them see how the principle would have operated. His 3,000,000*l.* of new taxes would have come into collection in October, and in April the whole of that amount would have been in the Exchequer, and his expenditure would have been paid as the year went on, and he would have been clearly in a position to have redeemed now every shilling of that 1,750,000*l.* But he did not intend limiting the matter in that way. He would show to the House that under those unfavourable circumstances the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly justified, and that facts had since that time more than borne out his declaration. The right hon. Gentleman, after the war had been declared, came down with his second Budget on the 8th of May. The new deficiency he showed was 6,850,000*l.*, and he proposed to provide for it thus:—he proposed that the income tax for the second half year should be doubled, that 450,000*l.* should be raised from spirit duties, 700,000*l.* from sugar duties, and 2,450,000*l.* from malt duties. Only a small portion of that amount could come in until this year; and how did the right hon. Gentleman propose to remedy that inconvenience? He proposed that there should be issued Exchequer bonds to the extent of 6,000,000*l.* in anticipation of those taxes. He ought at the same time to say that 625,000*l.* of that amount was exchanged for Exchequer bills, and therefore the bonds were reduced to 5,375,000*l.* Now, the House would have arrived at this fact, that the Government had 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills and 5,375,000*l.* Exchequer bonds in aid of the expenditure of the year, independent of the income from the ordinary revenue. To show that his right hon. Friend took a correct view of the character of these Exchequer bills and Exchequer bonds, he, in the end of May, in showing what were his Ways and Means, included the Exchequer bonds and bills in his calculation; and in the course of the debate which ensued he combated the opinion that the issuing of these Exchequer bonds and Exchequer bills was the creation of debt. It was quite clear that, whatever category the bonds were placed in, the bills were placed in the same. Could hon. Gentlemen believe that bills that had three, four, or six years to run were to be paid off in the year on which they were issued; or that, when the House sanctioned Exchequer bonds that had three, four, or six years to run, the right hon. Gentleman did not contemplate that those bonds were to be paid off at a future time by means of the increased taxation which he then imposed? Let the House stop for a moment to inquire how the country was affected by these operations, and how this 1,750,000*l.* bills and the Exchequer bonds stood against the public at the present moment. On the 8th of May, 1854, my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) estimated the deficiency of the year at 11,157,000*l.* That deficiency, on the 17th of the present month, instead of being 11,157,000*l.*, stood at 14,198,000*l.*; that was, the expenditure of the year had exceeded the expectations of the Government by 3,041,000*l.* The House had passed Bills sanctioning taxation to the extent of 3,000,000*l.* on that amount. In addition to that, he ought to inform the House that the whole of that amount had been spent in ready money. All these additional supplies since the House met in the present year had been spent in ready money, thus contradicting the present war from any of the wars which had preceded it. Not one single payment had been deferred more than it would have been in time of peace. When, therefore, he quoted these figures, he wished it to be understood that they represented the real state of the expenditure in a time of peace. There was nothing behindhand which could ever come against the country as a future charge, and that, he took it, was a great distinction from all former wars. He would say, also, that not a single demand had ever been made by a single department which had been refused during the whole year. It was the duty of the Treasury to exercise a vigilant supervision in ordinary times; but the Government had felt that during the war the responsibility of expenditure rested on departments, and, except where there had been an extraordinary expenditure, it was their duty to see that it was not laid on as a basis of permanent expenditure. If he had taken credit for the present state of the finances, it was not that the Government had been niggardly in the expenditure of money, for without reserve they had sanctioned every expenditure every department had proposed. They had, up to the 17th of the present month, expended in Supply services alone, for the quarter, 9,579,000*l.*; before the close of the quarter it would reach 11,000,000*l.*, whereas the ordinary amount was between 4,000,000*l.* and 5,000,000*l.* There was an important element which had been kept out of sight by the hon. Gentleman, who had taken exception to the financial operations of the Government. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) told the House last year that he should not receive his taxes within the year. The Government would have, on the 5th of April, due in uncollected taxes, not for ordinary revenue but for the war, no less than 5,120,000*l.*, being for income tax 3,320,000*l.*, and for malt duty 1,800,000*l.* Well, then, if they were to balance accounts at the end of the year, when they put their whole expenditure which had been paid in ready money, they must give credit for that which was due, and which, if peace should come, would go to the payment of ordinary revenue. Again, he would state that every shilling incurred by the war had been paid out of the income of the year. The case was strong enough as it stood; but he would ask the House to recollect what was the state of matters on the 5th of April, 1854? Why, on the 5th of April last year, after his right hon. Friend had paid off nearly 10,000,000*l.* of national debt, there were deficiency bills to the amount of 6,642,000*l.* Upon the 5th of January of the present year that sum had been reduced to 1,598,000*l.*, so that there had been paid off in nine months upwards of 5,000,000*l.* of deficiency bills, and that out of the growing produce of the year. Now, he was compelled to say that he did not think we should stand so well on the 5th of April next, because the expenses of the present quarter had been very large. He should be very glad to leave the matter as it stood, because he believed that all the gratuitous assumptions that had been indulged in would be dispelled when it was ascertained that the Government had fulfilled all their obligations, and had placed the finances in a better state than they were in at the commencement of the war. But then he would be asked what became of the 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills. They had been renewed, but they were not a permanent debt. They were a mere floating debt, and there was a great difference between the two things. He had told the House that the Government had some 5,000,000*l.* of taxes due, and that they had paid the expenditure of the war. Hon. Gentlemen must not expect that because in a time of war the Government raised money for the present half-year, they were going to allow the next half-year to starve. These anticipations of the revenue must be made from half-year to half-year as long as the necessity existed. A noble lord had told them in another place that the conduct of the Government in this matter was like that of a young spendthrift who borrowed money for four months and thought himself a paragon of prudence because he repaid the amount by fresh bills at the expiration of that time. Perhaps he (Mr. Wilson) might venture upon a more correct illustration. Suppose that any hon. gentleman possessed an estate of 5000*l.* a year and contemplated making large improvements which would absorb his whole income. He began in April, and his dividends would not come in until six months afterwards. Did he take credit for what he would have to pay the contractor, or did he take the more prudent course of obtaining advances from his banker for the half-year? He would, in all probability, adopt the latter course; and he (Mr. Wilson), as well as his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), thought that was a very sensible operation. Government anticipated to the extent of 7,125,000*l.* the revenue of last year. There was 5,000,000*l.* of it uncollected on the 5th of April; and they might go on anticipating it, and these securities might be kept afloat so long as the existing expenditure went on, because they would still have the remaining six months taxes in arrear, which would be collected during the six months to follow ; and then, with that amount of income in excess of expenditure, they might either liquidate these securities, or else by the operation of the sinking fund, pay off other securities, which would come to the same thing. That sum would be available at the conclusion of the period for paying off the debt which was created in anticipation of it. The hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) in a tone of complaint a few weeks ago, asked if it was the intention of the Government to convert Exchequer bills into funded debt ? and he complained of savings-bank money being applied to that object. [Sir H. WILLOUGHBY: Without the consent of Parliament.] The consent of Parliament had been given, but the hon. Gentleman appeared to him to speak of savings-bank money, as if he had not a very accurate notion of the nature of the investments in which that money was laid out. The real fact of the case was, that Government took upon itself the enormous responsibility, and also the cost of holding that money ; and, therefore, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer had intrusted to him the power of using the widest discretion as to the mode of conducting those funds, the sooner the management of them was given up the better. But with all the discretion that could be employed, the loss to the country was greater than was generally supposed. During ten years the loss upon the difference of interest paid to that which was received amounted to 434,000*l.*, and, taking into account friendly societies, to 660,000*l.* These funds ought to be regarded as bankers' deposits ; and what would any banker pay to a customer who should, after having deposited his money in the bank, attempt to control or find fault with the securities in which the banker chose to invest it ? It was quite enough that the banker undertook the responsibility of holding that money and of paying the interest. It should be remembered, also, that it was during times of great prosperity that the largest amount was deposited in savings-banks, and in times of adversity that money was withdrawn ; and as the Government were obliged, in the latter case, to convert stock into money to meet that demand, the result was that, taking an average of ten years, the price at which they bought in the funds with the savings-bank money was 97*½*, while the average price at which they had been compelled to sell out was 87*½*, showing what a serious loss was imposed upon the Government by making it responsible for that money, which the Government ought, on the other hand, to be allowed to make use of. In conclusion, he must appeal to the House to place some confidence in the discretion of the Finance Minister.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, as I was a party to those transactions to which the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) has called the attention of the House in a very brief statement, made in a spirit of great fairness and in a temper most unexceptionable, it may be that the House will expect me to say a few words on this very small question, which has, I think, most unduly been magnified into a great one. I stated, when I asked for the issue of these bills, that they might be redeemed by the first moiety of the income tax, and at that time I explained to the House, and I thought I was successful in explaining to the hon. Baronet, that I did not want both an issue of bills to the amount of 1,750,000*l.* and also the first moiety of the income tax ; but that what I asked for was, an issue of those bills in anticipation of the first moiety of the income tax. I did not at that time make a proposition for the finances of the year, and I will not now discuss the question as to whether it was prudent for the Government to come to this House and ask for the means of transporting a military expedition which it was intended to send out, but I will only say that the proposition then made was not made for means to carry on the war, it was only made for the purpose of sending out a military expedition, and, if no active operations should take place, of defraying the expense of its return. I made another statement on the 8th of May, in which I said the exact contrary to that which I had stated on the former occasion to which I have referred. On the 8th of May I said, that I should want both the doubled income tax and the issue of 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills. I am unwilling to trouble the House by reading extracts from the report of that speech, but I may state that, after having brought forward what is commonly called a Budget, in my anxiety to make the subject under the complicated circumstances of the time clearly understood by the House, I took a course which I believe had never before been adopted by any Chancellor of the Exchequer, and drew out what may be called a cash balance for the convenience of the House.

I told the House on that occasion that the total expenditure which I anticipated I should have to meet was 63,339,000*l.*, and I then proceeded to show how the money was to be forthcoming. The ordinary revenue of the year I estimated at 53,349,000*l.*, the proceeds of the first half-year's doubled income tax—3,307,000*l.*—raised the revenue to 56,656,000*l.*; and I took into my calculation also the vote of 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills, which raised the whole revenue to 58,406,000*l.* I stated as distinctly as possible that I should not only require the double income tax, but the 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills also which had been voted in March, and I think, therefore, the hon. Baronet must allow that the charge of having kept something back from the House entirely falls to the ground. But I have heard it said to-night that I ought to have told the House on the 8th of May that it was my intention to renew these Exchequer bills. Sir, I should have been guilty of the grossest folly if I had told the House any such thing, for at that time I was of necessity perfectly unable to form any judgment on the subject. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Mr. Ricardo) went into the very much larger and more important question—of how the expenditure of the war is to be raised. He says, the attempt to raise the supplies for the year by the taxation of the year has turned out to be an utter, irretrievable, and unmixed failure. The hon. Gentleman did not condescend to support this statement by reasoning or facts—he delivered it oracularly, and I must say that his statement is, to me, an utter, irretrievable, and unmixed puzzle. I cannot understand what the hon. Gentleman means, and I very much doubt whether he knows himself. The question, however, which the hon. Member has opened is one of the utmost importance. It deserves the most careful and deliberate consideration from this House, and I certainly am the last man to deprecate its discussion. For myself, I maintain that all attempts to forestall the expenditure of the year in a time of war are futile. I never attempted to submit to this House any war estimate which was, or ever could be, reliable in the same sense as a peace estimate is. All I could do was to urge upon my colleagues, in whose hands was the administration of the great military and naval departments, to present outside estimates; and then, in addition to providing for these estimates, it was my duty to ask for a considerable vote of credit and the command of a large additional amount of cash. The Estimates have certainly been exceeded; but still, in the first year of the war, and with all the additional expense of a winter campaign, the forethought of this House has been very nearly equal to the entire expenditure. With respect to the question of the public debt, I find that it was somewhere about 2,000,000*l.* less when I quitted office in January, 1855, than when I accepted office in January, 1853. The process by which I arrive at this result is this: I take the funded debt as it stood in January, 1853, I add to it the unfunded debt, and I deduct from it the balance in the Exchequer. I do the same with regard to January, 1855, and I find, as I said, that during the two years I held office the debt has been reduced by about 2,000,000*l.* But, in the course of the year 1854 there had been an excess of 9,000,000*l.* of expenditure connected with the immediate purposes of the war, a very small, in fact, I may say, an insignificant portion of which had been defrayed out of the proceeds of the taxes that year imposed by Parliament. Now, in answer to the question whether the effort made by the House last year, to provide for the expenditure of the war out of the taxes of the year was, or was not, an utter failure, I will offer a brief statement. It was not the effort of an individual, or of the Government, it was the solemn and formal decision of the House of Commons. The deliberate view they adopted was, not that they should register a vow against any resort to loans, nor that they should entangle themselves with any abstract resolution or distinct pledge, but that it was their duty to commence the war with a manful and resolute effort, after a liberal estimate of the expenses of that war, to provide for the liquidation of those expenses out of the taxes of the country. Now, how does the matter stand? The amount of provision which was made in May, 1854, from permanent sources, was, in round numbers, 12,000,000*l.*, and of that about 10,000,000*l.* was taxes newly imposed, and 2,000,000*l.* was handed over to us upon the estimate of the revenue, with the taxes as they stood in the previous year. The excess of expenditure was then estimated at something under 11,000,000*l.*, and out of the 12,000,000*l.* permanent provision it was expected that within the year we should realise about 8,000,000*l.* If we actually had got

8,000,000*l.* in hand during the year, it follows that we should have had to draw upon the funds granted to us in expectation to the extent of about 4,000,000*l.* We should have had so far to pledge the credit of the country—in fact, to create debt to that amount; but, as has been stated, against that 4,000,000*l.*, we were fully justified in setting that portion of the receipts of the extra taxation of the year which would have been received on the 5th of April, amounting to somewhere about 5,000,000*l.*; and, therefore, if the expenditure of the war had been confined within the estimated limits, we should have an actual surplus of 1,000,000*l.* from the revenue belonging to the year over and above the actual expenditure of the war. But the expenditure has gone beyond these bounds. I apprehend that if, instead of providing for the expenses of the year by means of taxes, we had taken a loan to the same amount, we should have been equally open to the risk of the expenditure going beyond the limits that were placed. The two subjects were entirely distinct. Some people seemed to think that money raised by taxes was not so good, and would not go so far, as money raised by loans. My impression is, and I shall be ready at the proper time to support it, that money raised by taxes will go quite as far, and even a little further; because the House would be disposed to keep a sharper watch upon expenditure raised by taxes, than it would do if that money were raised by loans. But the expenditure was gone beyond the estimate to the extent I will now state. The excess for the year was estimated, in May, at a little under 11,000,000*l.*; the actual excess, as we have now ascertained by experience, up to the present time, has passed 14,000,000*l.* Therefore, there was a surplus of 3,000,000*l.* of expenditure over and above the 11,000,000*l.* which we estimated. But even there the House, in its forethought, did not leave us without resource, because, on the 8th of May, when we presented estimates showing that the expenditure of the year, including the vote of credit, might run up to 63,000,000*l.*, the House was pleased to sanction the provision of cash to an amount exceeding 66,000,000*l.*, or 3,000,000*l.* beyond the estimates. The consequence of that 3,000,000*l.* excess of expenditure has been that, instead of drawing to the extent of 4,000,000*l.* upon the aids in anticipation of taxes, we have drawn 7,000,000*l.* Against that sum of 7,000,000*l.*, you must place 5,000,000*l.* for taxes that have not yet come in; so that the result is that, with all the gigantic operations which you have been carrying on, the whole excess of expenditure over the sum to be raised by taxes is 2,000,000*l.* Such an excess in time of peace would indicate gross want of care on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his colleagues, or on that of the revenue departments; but surely, in time of war, an excess of 2,000,000*l.* is not a discreditable account to present. What was the state of things at the commencement of the revolutionary war? There was then, at the end of the first year of the struggle, when the efforts made had been but trifling, an excess of expenditure more than doubling the provision made by Parliament. Parliament provided 4,000,000*l.*, and, in addition to spending that sum, the Government of the day contracted a debt of 5,000,000*l.* It is inherent in the nature of the demands made by war that you cannot set limits to them; and I am sure that the House of Commons is prepared to make the most liberal allowance, not for the Government's neglect or failure of duty, but for those circumstances with which it is possible for human forethought and care to cope. I do not wish to push the matter too far—I will not pursue it further into detail. I do not seek to entrap the House into assenting to an abstract principle, nor to induce it to tie itself down to any foregone conclusion; but I say, as a matter of retrospect, and reverting to the extensive operations in which you have been engaged, that you have not cause to regret a failure or an abortion—for this House has made provision in a remarkable degree for the expenditure which has been incurred, and it has great reason to look back with satisfaction on the course which it thought fit—wisely, as I believe—to adopt.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, nothing can be more important than that at this period of the year we should be favoured with the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and under the present circumstances in which the country is placed I recognise additional reasons for our being furnished with such an exposition. I lament the causes which have deprived the House of that great advantage. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, placed as he has suddenly been in a position of great difficulty and responsibility, had a perfect right to throw himself on the indulgence of the House while he refrains for a time from making that explanation; but, although it is our duty, no doubt, to show him that forbearance which he justly demands, still nothing can be more inconvenient than that, while the official statement of the condition of our finances from the responsible Minister of the Crown is withheld, these desultory debates should arise, circulating assertions, as they do, which I, for one, am not prepared to admit to be authentic, and which are certainly not made under circumstances that would justify their receiving that criticism which they might otherwise require. I do not mean for a moment to say that my hon. Friend the Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) was not fully authorised in making the remarks which he did. They related to a very pertinent point, but one that is limited in its character. Yet the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury takes advantage of the inquiry which my hon. Friend made with regard to it, and in putting which he was followed by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Ricardo), to enter into a detailed exposition of the financial state of the country. With the exception of the future supplies which we may be called upon to grant, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilson) really concealed nothing from our knowledge. He has, indeed, communicated to us an amount of information which rather astonished me. "I wanted," he says, "so many millions and I obtained them, and having obtained them in such and such a way, I have spent so many millions"—"Ego et Rex meus." Whether "Rex meus" will be prepared to submit to the despotism of the Secretary of the Treasury is a point which, with our limited experience of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am unable to determine; but I hardly believe that the late occupant of his important office would have been so willing, as the right hon. Gentleman appears to be, to yield to so severe a surveillance. All that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) said may be perfectly true; but I prefer having from the lips of the proper Minister and at the proper time the authentic account of the liabilities and resources of the country, and I decline to enter at the present moment into any discussion on the subject. The question which has been brought before our consideration is one of a much more circumscribed scope. It has been legitimately introduced, and, so far as I caught the purport of the hon. Member for Stoke

(Mr. Ricardo), with temper, and also, as I believe, with accuracy. Let us endeavour to recall the single point which is now before us, putting out of view the comparative merits of sustaining the expenditure of the country by sheer taxation—or by the aid of the national credit. Let us forget the admirable management of the Secretary to the Treasury, and pass by for a moment his panegyric upon himself. What is the real question that has been brought before us by my hon. Friend the Member for Evesham and enforced by the hon. Member for Stoke? There is no doubt, notwithstanding the honied phrases and mellifluous sentences of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), that in March last the House of Commons was under the clear impression that there was a vote of £1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills of a temporary character, and which was to be defrayed from the accruing revenue of the year. This vote was past with the full understanding on the part of the House that it was a vote of Exchequer bills to be kept perfectly distinct from the usual vote of that character; and that, to use the language of the right hon. Gentleman, these bills were to be strictly and literally bills of Supply—which is a term still preserved, though not observed)—and not to be mixed up with the ordinary votes for the year—that in fact they were to be a provision of a temporary nature. I believe that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House will agree with me that there is no mistake on that point. But it is said that in May there was a great change, and a fresh statement was made. Now, I always thought that it was a very great error, considering the position in which the country stood—and I mentioned this opinion at the time—that we should have had a precipitate Budget in March, which was quite unnecessary. Under the difficulties of the period the right hon. Gentleman might have postponed his financial exposition, and need not have created that confusion which has since occurred, by reason of his rival statements of March and May. In May, however, you had a second statement from the right hon. Gentleman; and he tells us now that then virtually, although not in that distinct and formal manner which might have been wished, he intended to alter the plan which he had submitted to the House, and that that which was a temporary vote of Supply two months before for nearly

2,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills was, in fact, then changed in its character, although this House, and other persons beside this House, do not even now seem to be aware of it. The right hon. Gentleman has read passages—of course from authority—from his own speech, and, following those passages, as I heard them quoted, I am bound to say that I could not deduce from them that clear inference which he thinks they will bear. I have not now had an opportunity of referring to authority, but certainly my recollection of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was to this effect:—"The Government proposes to do nothing more now (in May that was) than it proposed to do in March—we propose to increase the permanent revenue of the country, and likewise to establish some temporary supply which shall be defrayed out of the accruing revenue of the year." Well, what happens? The right hon. Gentleman himself admits, whatever were his own intentions, the House and the country did not share them. We did believe that the temporary loan of the month of March was really a temporary loan, and was actually to be discharged out of the accruing revenue of the year. Now, in this year the usual Exchequer Bills Bill is brought in, and we find an increase of 1,750,000*l.* added to the ordinary amount of Exchequer bills. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury says, that this is not an increase of the permanent debt; technically it certainly is not so, but it is an increase of the permanent debt as compared with the temporary assistance that the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford at first projected. We are in this position—in March, 1854, a Vote for nearly 2,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills was taken, on the distinct understanding with this House, that the Vote was for the temporary aid of the public service, and that it was to be defrayed out of the accruing revenue of the year; but, early in the spring, the House of Commons finds that this sum is made a portion of what may be called the permanent debt of the country, and is any one to be surprised that an hon. Gentleman should come forward and call the attention of the House to what he considers a violation of faith on the part of the Ministry, or that he should come forward and ask for explanations with respect to this considerable sum, and should draw what appears to me to be the natural inference, that the principle on which the financial system of the Government was established—namely, that the expenditure should be defrayed from the annual revenue—had been departed from, and had, in fact, broken down? I do not object to a Minister, placed in the difficult position in which the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford was, borrowing 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills; and I am sure if he had come forward and thrown himself on the country, and asked for 17,500,000*l.* he would have been supported. It is not with regard to the amount that I object, nor will I say anything now as to extravagant expenditure, for until we have the formal statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer I decline to enter into that question. But I say that it is most unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman should have proposed a Vote of 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills as a temporary loan, to be defrayed out of the accruing revenue, and that this was to be a test and proof of the new financial principle on which the whole war expenditure was to be conducted, and that when a few months have elapsed we should find that this sum takes the shape not of a temporary loan, but really becomes a portion of the permanent debt. The right hon. Member for the University of Oxford says, that there have been great misrepresentations, and rather complained of the perverted view which has been taken of the course of his conduct on this subject; but let me remind him that he distinctly impressed upon the House that these 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills were distinct from the other 16,000,000*l.* Exchequer bills that were to be issued in the course of the year, and were entitled only to the name of Supply Bills in the strict sense of the term. I do think that after this statement had been made, if circumstances had altered in the interval—and I do not deny that such circumstances might not have occurred in conducting a war of such magnitude as that for which the right hon. Gentleman was responsible—but if circumstances had occurred so as to change the course originally determined on, was it not incumbent on him to have come forward and distinctly to have said so, and to have fairly announced it to the House? Although the right hon. Gentleman had quitted office, the Secretary of the Treasury, remembering the declaration that was made with respect to this particular Vote, that it was the keynote, the corner-stone of the financial system on which the war should be conducted—ought to have come forward and have said that, in consequence of the change of affairs and the difficulties that had arisen, the Government felt that it was no longer expedient to maintain this principle, and that they should recommend that this 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills should be placed with the rest of the Exchequer bills; but, as far as I can recollect, no statement of any kind was made. Under these circumstances, I do not think that there is anything that justifies what has been said by the hon. Secretary of the Treasury and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford on this subject, or that they were justified in objecting to the course taken by the hon. Member for Evesham, to whose objections no satisfactory answer has yet been given.

SIR FRANCIS BARING : Sir, I must make a few observations—but, following the example of the right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat—not upon the present question, because I think, with him, it will be better to wait until we have the financial statement of the year before us previous to entering into that question. I will only say, that when that statement is made, I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to present the same flattering picture which has been drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury. But there is a point to which a noble Friend of mine (Lord Monteagle) was the first to draw attention, and in which he is said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to have misrepresented his conduct, upon which I must say a few words in vindication of my noble Friend. It is the vigilance of my noble Friend that has shamed the House of Commons, and they were indebted to his attention that the circumstances with respect to these Exchequer bills, which had escaped the House of Commons, had been brought before them. The observations made by my noble Friend had no reference to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer individually, but to a sum of money voted for Exchequer bills under particular circumstances and under particular pledges. The point was—that a certain amount of Exchequer bills was voted by the right hon. Gentleman upon the distinct pledge that it was to be a temporary loan, and that afterwards this was departed from without any notice to the House, and the bills, which were to be temporary, were made part of the permanent debt of the country. The answer to the charge is, that an announcement was made to the House that the intentions of the Government were altered. Now, I will show to the House that the statement, as made by my noble Friend, was quite correct, and justified by the only information to which he could resort. I need not recur to what took place in March last year, and the distinct and repeated explanations made by the right hon. Gentleman that the Exchequer bills in question were to be paid off out of the ordinary revenue of the year. The words were clear and distinct—“These bills will be paid off out of the current revenue of the year, and you will never hear anything more of them.” This was a pledge most distinctly given, and it required an equally distinct and unequivocal withdrawal before these bills could properly be made part of the permanent debt. Let the House observe that the right hon. Gentleman himself drew a distinction between the mass of Exchequer bills which formed a part of the permanent debt and the Exchequer bills in question. But what took place on the 8th of May? The right hon. Gentleman stated that he then gave an explanation, announcing that he had altered his intention. What were his words?—

“ You then voted 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills (of which 1,250,000*l.* have been since issued), which makes a total amount of 58,400,000*l.* ”—[3 Hansard, cxxxii. 1465.]

It is true that in that calculation he included these Exchequer bills, but he at the same time told the House that there were 3,500,000*l.* applicable to any purpose Parliament might think proper. I must say I read over the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, with the view of finding out any announcement of an alteration of intention; but I could not find it out. Nay, more; I have read it over again, after the right hon. Gentleman referred to the passage in question as containing his explanation on the occasion, and I cannot see it even now. And I must say I think he would have acted better if he had distinctly stated his change of intention as to these bills.

MR. GLADSTONE : It was impossible.

SIR FRANCIS BARING : The right hon. Gentleman says it was impossible.

MR. GLADSTONE : Quite. Quite impossible.

SIR FRANCIS BARING : The right hon. Gentleman now tells us that he had counted the bills in question as permanent debt, and told the House he had done so; and now he says it was impossible for him to have told them so. Now I desire to know whether the right hon. Gentleman says he did tell the House so, or that he did not? If he did, then he was certainly unfortunate in his manner of doing so, for no one understood him to have done so. If he did not, then how can his defence be that he did so? At one moment his defence is that he did tell the House so, and the next it is that it was "quite impossible" to do so. Nay, after the speech in question, in which he says he did do so, there was a debate on the subject, in which he was charged with having made a loan in an improper manner; and it was said, "You have charged 6,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills." But if the House had understood the statement which the right hon. Gentleman now says he had made, that this amount of 1,750,000*l.* was to be added, hon. Members on that occasion would have charged him not with 6,000,000*l.*, but 7,750,000*l.* Yet no one in that discussion had the least notion that this sum of 1,750,000*l.* was to be deemed added to the permanent debt. The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to have made his case intelligible even to his late colleagues; for the defence they now make for him is not the defence he makes for himself. The right hon. Gentleman cannot have explained his defence to them, or they could not have understood him. And further, in the Queen's speech, at the close of the last Session, there was this passage—

"I fully recognise your Wisdom in sacrificing Considerations of present Convenience, and in providing for the immediate exigencies of the War without an Addition being made to the permanent Debt of the Country."

Now what is the permanent debt? The right hon. Gentleman, in his own speeches on the subject, drew the distinction between the Exchequer bills temporarily issued and these bills in question; and he said of the other bills (of which these now form a part), "they constitute a debt, permanent in itself, but renewable from year to year." In fact, then, the right hon. Gentleman converted 1,750,000*l.* of bills voted as a temporary aid into permanent debt. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Oh, oh!] Why, these are the right hon. Gentleman's own words, "A debt permanent in itself." Sir, under these circumstances no complaint can be more just than that the pledge which was given was not adhered to; and I confess I retain that impression myself. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman intended to convey the explanation which he says he did convey, but he is so quick himself, that he attributes to us more acuteness than we unfortunately possess in understanding his meaning. It is a misfortune that a measure of this kind should have been adopted without being sufficiently announced. I hope that in future it may not be so, and that we shall not have explanations which we cannot understand.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry, Sir, that what has fallen from the right hon. Baronet renders it necessary for me to explain what I said in May. The right hon. Gentleman says that on the 6th of March, I expressed an expectation that these Exchequer bills would not be renewed, and that I did not explain in May that they would. My answer is, that it would have been impossible and absurd for me to do so, because I could not then have known of the intention to renew them. I said, in March, that, according to the plan then proposed, they would not be renewed; and I said, in May, that after making full provision for the estimated service of the country, it was necessary for me to have a further command of cash to the amount of about 3,500,000*l.*; and in that 3,500,000*l.* I expressly included the 1,750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills, and yet the right hon. Gentleman, I am sorry to say, states that he did not understand me.

MR. LAING said, he wished to make an observation upon a matter with respect to which much interest was felt in the City of London—namely, the money that had been deposited in savings banks. The Secretary of the Treasury had laid down the doctrine that, inasmuch as the Government received as bankers the money deposited in those banks, they ought to have the same privileges as were possessed by ordinary bankers. But private bankers were at liberty to go into the market and sell or buy according to such information as they possessed relative to public matters. Would any one suggest that the Government ought to do that, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to make use of the information he possessed as a member of the Government in order to buy or sell to advantage? If he did he was sure that the greatest possible dissatisfaction would be caused, and if he did not he must be prepared at times to incur a certain loss in savings-banks operations. The Government could not conduct these transactions to any advantage, and he had no doubt that if all the operations relative to the savings-bank money were investigated, they would be found to entail a considerable loss. It was much more important for the Government to keep a high character in the City, and to put up with a small loss, than to seek to effect a profit upon such transactions. The best thing would be for the Government to deal with the subject by such an Act of Parliament as would remove the temptation to deal with this money.

Question again put.

SICK AND WOUNDED SOLDIERS IN THE EAST.

MR. A. STAFFORD said, that he rose in no hostility to the Government to call attention to the medical arrangements for the sick and wounded soldiers in the East. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War had succeeded to the possession of an office associated in the public mind with the extinction of more hope and the infliction of more misery than time permitted to describe, and, therefore, he must be prepared to admit that distrust and doubt attached to the discharge of the duties of his office at present. Not only was the appointment of the Committee upstairs a proof of that distrust, but the whole country had, during the winter, resolved itself as it were into a Committee to assist the War Office and to save the remnant of that army which had left this country with hopes so bright and had been reduced to a condition so "horrible and heartrending." They had been recommended by a noble Lord in the other House to assist in raising more troops to be sent forth, and the best way to assist in the performance of that duty was to elicit from the Government such information as would show that our fellow subjects would be properly cared for in the East. According to the accounts received and the opinions of those acquainted with the country, with the appearance of early spring and summer a new class of diseases would be developed, and a new chapter of horrors would be revealed, unless the Government had taken means to remedy the causes. He hoped he should be told that the unspeakable horrors of the hospital at Balaklava had been remedied, and that it was no longer a disgrace to any civilised country, as it undoubtedly was when he saw it. If the waters of the Black Sea were clear enough, it was his belief that a vessel might be steered from Balaklava to the Bosphorus simply by following the track of the skeletons of those thrown over from the transports conveying the sick and wounded. He hoped to hear that the sick and wounded were not now kept so long in Balaklava Harbour; that an adequate medical staff was provided for the transport service; that the orderlies were no longer invalided soldiers or boys, incapable of attending to the sick, and only increasing the sum of disease and death; that the debarkation of the sick at Scutari was more satisfactory than it had been, and that due provision was made for the removal of the sick and wounded soldiers from the quay at Scutari to the various hospitals. The tendencies to typhoid fever and other diseases might shortly be expected to develop themselves in these hospitals, and he hoped that, unless the Government were prepared with arrangements for the purification of those enormous buildings, no consideration of trouble or expense would prevent abandonment of them altogether. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) would be aware that the late Government had established what he (Mr. Stafford) might call an experimental hospital at Abydos, and it depended upon circumstances whether that hospital would be abandoned or be permanently enlarged. The advantages of this hospital were its being on the highway of the Dardanelles, its absence from any large town, and its being placed under the superintendence of one of the best public servants the Government had, Mr. Calvert. On the 6th of November last he wrote a letter to the War Office from Smyrna, calling attention to the fact that the French authorities had opened a hospital there, stating that he had visited it, and recommending the War Office to open a similar establishment in the same place. He pressed the same subject upon the attention of the authorities at Constantinople, but, meeting with no success, he was compelled to abandon it altogether. From communications which he had had with the residents there, he found that for three or four months in the year the climate of Smyrna was considered somewhat unhealthy, but that during the winter the temperature was not nearly so variable or severe as at Constantinople. Now, however, that the unhealthy weather was approaching, he understood that the Government had opened a large hospital at Smyrna. He did not blame them for having opened it, better late than never, and he believed that when they received information of the success which had attended the experiment at Smyrna, the result, as compared with Scutari, in regard to the health of the troops would be found to be most satisfactory. It appeared that the Government were about to adopt the plan of sending out wooden huts for the invalids, and during the time these huts were preparing the Government could receive information as to the most advantageous situations in the whole of the Levant upon which to erect them. He believed that well-ventilated wooden huts were better suited to warm weather, and more capable of being purified from contagion, than stone walls. It would therefore be false economy upon the part of the Government to stint the number of huts to be sent out, and they would not be discharging their duty to our brave troops in the East if they fixed the number for whom accommodation was to be found in these huts at less than 5,000 men. With regard to the propriety of imitating the French, and sending home as soon as possible all the invalids who were capable of bearing the journey, he believed, if they were sent home, the prospect of returning together with the change of climate would have a beneficial effect upon the spirits of the men, and numbers of transports now returning home empty might be employed thus at a comparatively small expense. He was bound, however, to state that, having spoken to several men who had come home invalidated in Government vessels, the information which he had received had not been altogether of a satisfactory character, and unless the Government made better arrangements for the transport ships, it would be dangerous to encourage the removal of the men further than it had gone as yet. They must be prepared to view the comfort of the human cargo they placed on board as the chief and main object of the voyage; they must select as physicians and officers men in whom they had confidence, and they must place in the hands of the officers they appointed full power with regard to the internal arrangements of the vessels. Otherwise a far grater risk would be run in sending home invalids in transports than if they were kept in the hospitals. He understood that a medical staff was to be sent to Eupatoria, and he, for the sake of the Turkish contingent, hoped that such was the fact. With regard to the hospital at Smyrna, he believed that the principle of employing civil surgeons had been adopted. Hitherto surgeons connected with the civil service had been very unfairly treated. The most noble and disinterested offers had been made upon the part of certain members of the medical profession to the late occupants of the War Office, but answers had been received to those offers which, far from expressing any feelings of gratefulness for the patriotism displayed by those Gentlemen, had excited the strongest feelings of indignation throughout the whole body: The War Office did not avail themselves of the services of civil surgeons until they were urged to adopt such a course by public clamour. As there was now a civil hospital at Smyrna, besides the military hospital at Scutari, it was not impossible that a feeling of rivalry might spring up between the medical officers of the two establishments. If all the serious cases were sent to Smyrna the civil doctors might complain, and if the worst cases were kept at Scutari the military doctors would be dissatisfied. It was, therefore, of great importance that an officer should be appointed at Balaklava or Scutari, or at both those places, who, in the apportionment of the patients between the hospitals at Smyrna and Scutari, would do justice to the civil and military services. He (Mr. Stafford) wished it to be distinctly understood that in putting these questions he was not actuated by any feeling of hostility to the Government, and that any information he could give to the War Office or to any other department he would most willingly afford. He had been sorry to learn that it was not the intention of the Government to remove the invalid soldiers who had returned from the Crimea from the casemented barracks at St. Mary's, Brompton, in which they had been placed. He had lately paid another visit to those barracks, and he was bound to say that everything had been done to promote the comfort of their inmates. He must say, however, that the ventilation of the barracks was exceedingly defective, and the atmosphere at night must be so unwholesome that it would be most satisfactory to him if he could receive an assurance that it was intended to remove the invalids to some more salubrious quarters. He was satisfied that all those persons who had friends in the Crimea would feel great interest in this subject, and it would be satisfactory to them, as well as to the public at large, to learn in what manner the Government intended to provide for the remnant of our army.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that it was quite unnecessary for the hon. Gentleman to disclaim being actuated by any spirit of hostility towards the Government, and from the attention he had bestowed upon the state of the military hospitals, both in this country and in the East, any suggestions which he might offer on the subject could not fail to be treated with respect and to receive attentive consideration. He agreed with the opinions which had been expressed in that House and in another place, that with the view of obtaining recruits for our military forces it was most desirable that the Government should be able to show that they neglected no means which either medical science, or the mechanical appliances at their command, rendered available, in order to enable invalid soldiers to regain their strength as speedily as possible and to rejoin the ranks of their regiments. He was not sorry that some delay had occurred since the hon. Gentleman gave notice of his questions, because in the interval the Government had received the Report of the Commissioners who had been sent out by the Duke of Newcastle to inquire into the state of the hospitals in the East, and during the last two days he had received authentic reports from Smyrna which enabled him to speak upon the climate of that place with some confidence. Before replying to the questions of the hon. Gentleman with respect to the hospital at Balaklava, he wished to say a word or two with reference to the regimental hospitals in the camp before Sebastopol. There had been in those hospitals a very large number of sick—at times, indeed, as many as 20 per cent. of the whole force under Lord Raglan's command. The numbers of sick and wounded men in those hospitals at this moment were not so large, but still they were very considerable. Although the Commissioners who had reported upon the state of these hospitals were in the Crimea during the first three weeks of January, when the cases were, he believed, of the most malignant character, and when the resources at the command of the medical officers were the smallest, it was plain that much suffering had been endured which a clearer insight into the amount of sickness likely to prevail during a winter campaign might possibly have obviated. The great defects with regard to the hospitals, it appeared, had not arisen from any deficiency in the number of medical men, for he believed there had been no deficiency in the number of surgeons attached to the different regiments, but from the want of means of housing the sick soldiers. Since the Report had been made, however, he understood that wooden hospital-huts had been provided for every regiment under the command of Lord Raglan. It was quite true that the general hospital at Balaklava had been in a state of great confusion, and that much which was necessary for the proper treatment of the sick had not been provided in that establishment. He believed the chief cause of the disorder which prevailed in that and in other hospitals was the overcrowding, which arose in the case of the hospital at Balaklava, not only from the number of sick sent down there, but also from that establishment having been made a dépôt for the reception of the invalid soldiers sent down from the camp, who were to have been conveyed to the hospitals on the shores of the Bosphorus, but for whose transport no immediate preparation had been made. With respect to the hospital at Balaklava, it appeared from a letter written by Dr. Hall in January that wooden huts had been erected in the town in a most excellent situation, and that steps were being taken to erect from twenty to twenty-five huts, which would provide accommodation for some 500 patients. The next point to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention was the state of the transports carrying the sick from Balaklava to Scutari. It was quite true, as he had stated, that there had been in very many instances a great delay between the first embarkation of the sick and the date of the transport leaving the harbour of Balaklava. A few sick being placed on board at first, the vessel remained in the harbour until it was loaded, and thus for several days those who were first placed on board were obliged to remain for some time in the confined atmosphere between decks. It was also true that the nurses on board in the transports were often unfit for their duty, and insufficient in number. But arrangements had now been made, according to which four or five vessels had been fitted up as hospital ships, to which were attached soldiers as orderlies qualified for the duty, and these vessels, exclusively appropriated for the conveyance of the sick, would run between Balaklava and Scutari. According to the statement of the Commissioners who had an opportunity of inspecting one of these ships, which no doubt was a fair specimen of the rest—five in number, he believed—they appeared to possess all the substantial requirements for the service in which they were engaged. The supply of hospital utensils was sufficient, and there was an abundance of medical comforts on board. He therefore trusted that the passage between Balaklava and the neighbourhood of Scutari would be conducted with as little suffering as possible, under the circumstances, to the sick soldier. The hon. Gentleman also complained of the delay in the disembarkation of the sick at Scutari, and he (Mr. Peel) believed that delays of that sort had occurred partly from the want of small boats to ply between the vessels and the shore, and partly also from there being no accommodation in the hospitals themselves at the moment. He thought the cause of that complaint would be remedied by the measures taken to relieve the hospitals at Scutari. The hon. Gentleman was aware that there was a great number of different buildings appropriated to the reception of the sick at Scutari. The Commissioners had gone very patiently into the consideration of the whole administration of those hospitals; and he anticipated from their Reports, and the measures taken by the Government, that great improvements would be effected in all the different branches of administration. Some time since a gentleman was sent out from the War Office with a view to place the purveyor's establishment on a fit footing, and he believed that there would be no reason to complain of that for the future. The hon. Gentleman had observed that it was important that some means should be taken to relieve these hospitals as the warm season approached. He believed that they were at present overcrowded, and in connection with this subject he had to state the Government had made arrangements by private contract with Mr. Brunel, the civil engineer, to provide wooden huts without delay for the reception of 1,000 persons, and huts for a further number of 4,000 persons would be provided by public competition with as little delay as possible. Whether they would be erected on the Asiatic or European side of the Straits would depend on the advice of the local authorities. The hon. Gentleman had made some inquiry respecting the hospital at Abydos, but he (Mr. Peel) knew but little of that establishment, and he was not able to say whether it ought to be enlarged in the way suggested by the hon. Member. With respect to the hospital at Smyrna, an impression prevailed that the Government had selected for it a place which was unhealthy and where fevers were very prevalent; but he believed that impression to be entirely erroneous, and unfounded. He had collected several documents bearing on this subject, but he would dispense with reading them, because he was in possession of the Reports of the Commandant and the principal medical officer, which had been received so late as Saturday last. The Government had not established the hospital at Smyrna without making some previous inquiry with respect to the salubrity of the place. Dr. Morehead was sent to report on the place, and the information he supplied to the Government was very favourable. That gentleman stated:

"There are tanks in the barrack square containing water, which is of good quality; and the Pasha of Smyrna, himself a medical man, states that the supply can be increased to any amount, it being conveyed by means of aqueducts from the neighbouring hills; he states that the convalescents from wounds recover very rapidly here, and that the situation is most healthy."

He had also a letter from a gentleman who had resided thirty years in Turkey, his head-quarters being Smyrna, and who stated:—

"My experience tells me that Smyrna, instead of being the most unhealthy climate in the Levant, is without exception the most healthy of all the large towns in that country. Indeed, although I have travelled a good deal, I do not think I ever met with any place, situated in a hot climate, more so."

He would now read an extract from the Report of Dr. Macleod, dated the 3rd of March:—

"I have put myself in communication since my arrival, not only with Drs. Wood and M'Raith, two intelligent and respectable medical men, who have long practised in Smyrna, but also with the consul and many of the chief merchants, with a view of obtaining their opinion of Smyrna in a hygienic point of view. All express their most unreserved conviction, that, except during certain visitations of plague, which fortunately of late years has become very rare, Smyrna will be found to be one of the most healthy places of the Mediterranean. Nay, many do not hesitate to assert, that if its inhabitants take only certain easy precautions, to be afterwards referred to, it may be accounted equal in this respect to the salubrious parts of England. Malaria is the chief and almost sole source of disease."

Colonel Storks, the commandant of the hospital, stated that Smyrna was a most desirable place to occupy, and as far as their limited experience went in the conveyance of sick, the voyage, though a long one, had not produced so bad an effect as was anticipated. This, however, he added, must depend in a great measure upon the transport-ships not being overcrowded. He believed the building in which the sick were placed at Smyrna was one of the most considerable, for a hospital, which was to be found in that country, but the number of sick there (about 750) was certainly more than that building could well accommodate. It had been suggested, therefore, that the Government should obtain from the Turkish authorities the loan of the lazaretto and other buildings more to the south; and wooden huts would also be erected in a large open space within the hospital walls. A letter from a gentleman who went out from the War Office, dated March 5, stated that the best results had been obtained from the hospital at Smyrna, and that the greater part of a batch of invalids arriving there on the 14th of February were then on their way back to head-quarters as convalescents. This gentleman stated that the air of that place was excellent and invigorating, which was not the case at Scutari, where the men lingered but did not rally. The greatest credit was due to Colonel Powell, who was sent out by Lord Raglan to organise this hospital, and who had been relieved by Colonel Storks, the present commandant. He believed he had already stated that the hospital at Smyrna was a civil hospital. About twenty-five physicians and surgeons had been sent out there, and the rates of pay which those gentlemen were receiving, though not fabulous in their amount, as had been hinted at by some, were very liberal. He was quite unable to account for the remarks made by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Stafford) as to the treatment which certain civil practitioners received from the War Office when they offered their services to the Government. He was quite sure that no intentional slight was offered to those gentlemen; on the contrary there was every disposition on the part of the Government to avail themselves of such offers. He would now say a few words with regard to the convalescent stations which the Government had established. At present the only two places assigned for the reception of convalescents were the two ships in the Bosphorus. It was, however, absolutely necessary that the soldiers should be received at some convalescent station previously to their return to camp. It had been represented with great truth, that the confinement of persons between decks in hospital ships was very prejudicial, and the Government had therefore given directions that convalescent stations, capable of accommodating 1,000 persons each, should be established on the island of Gozo, near Malta, and also at Corfu. With regard to the transports for the conveyance of invalids home to this country, it was very possible that, as they were now fitted up, they were not suitable for the reception of sick and wounded; but the Government had arranged for the fitting out of two steamers, which were now preparing at Liverpool, and they would be provided with surgeons and with proper fittings, and would, it was believed, by the month of June, bring some 4,000 sick from the hospitals in the East. In that way great relief would be afforded to those establishments. With regard to the army under Omar Pasha at Eupatoria, the Government had sent out twenty medical men, placed under the charge of Dr. Fuller, and those gentlemen had already left this country. As to the casemates at St. Mary's, Brompton, he had understood that those barracks were not appropriated to the reception of soldiers under medical treatment, but that those who were waiting for their discharges were placed there temporarily. He had now, he believed, answered the different questions which had been put to him by the hon. Member, and it only remained for him to repeat, in conclusion, that Government would be always anxious to give the fullest information on this subject, while they were equally resolved that no unwillingness to owe improvements to the suggestions of private persons should deter them from accepting any recommendations that might come from the hon. Member, or any other Member, which were calculated to mitigate the sufferings of the sick and wounded.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I trust the House will rest assured that Her Majesty's Government will take effectual measures for the recovery, the cure, and the treatment of those brave and gallant men who have either suffered in conflict with the enemy or whose constitutions have been impaired by exposure incidental to the service. I can assure the House that my noble Friend at the head of the War Department feels that to be one of the most incumbent duties which he has to perform. Besides those different measures which have just been stated by my hon. Friend—I think it has already been stated to the House, but I wish to repeat it—there were not long ago sent out three distinguished civilians to examine into the state of the hospitals in the Levant. They were men who had made it their study to investigate all the circumstances connected with sanitary arrangements, and they have been sent out to the Crimea to look into such matters there. They are—Dr. Sutherland, Dr. Gavin, who was employed on a similar service in the West Indies; and Mr. Rawlinson, a civil engineer. These are gentlemen of the highest attainments in regard to the matters on which their attention is to be turned. The specific object they will have in view is precisely that to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stafford) has adverted, namely, to ascertain if those arrangements have been made in the hospitals, in the barracks, and in the transports, upon which mainly depend the question of sickness or of health. The immediate purpose, indeed, for which they were sent out was to examine all the hospitals at Scutari, at Constantinople, at Balaklava, and at the camp, and to suggest those measures which they might deem essential for placing these buildings in such a condition as to be healthy and perfectly consistent with the purpose to which they are devoted. I wrote myself to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to Lord William Paulett, and to Lord Raglan, recommending those gentlemen to their particular care and protection, and requesting that whatever arrangements—whatever improvements—these gentlemen might point out as necessary for the health of the sick or the comfort of the soldiers, should be carried into effect immediately, without reference to any professional jealousy, or any professional obstacles that might be thrown in their way. What they recommended was forthwith to be done; and whether the carrying out of their suggestions depended upon any communication with the Turkish Government, or upon the report of the medical officers in the service or not, I requested that no impediment whatever should be placed in the way of effecting such arrangements and such changes as these gentlemen might recommend. I cannot, then, but hope that when these very distinguished men have arrived at their destination, and have examined these places and pointed out the changes they think necessary, that a very rapid and great improvement will take place in the health of the persons laid up in the hospitals.

COLONEL KNOX said, he wished to call attention to one point connected with the arrival of wounded soldiers home from the war. It was the system of the service upon an officer returning home from the field of action, when he had been reported as having been dangerously, seriously, or slightly wounded, to require him to go again before a medical board. It often happened that when a man was blessed with a good constitution, though reported dangerously or seriously wounded, he was able to recover in a short space of time. In such case a great act of injustice was frequently committed by the medical board, who perhaps said to him, " You are looking remarkably well, we will not give you so much as we would give to others." On the other hand, a general returning home but slightly wounded, and not blessed with so good a constitution, on presenting himself to the board, might be accosted thus—" You are looking very ill;" and they would give him a higher rate. Now he (Colonel Knox) wished that some plan should be laid down by which the report made by the medical authorities upon the field of action as to the wounds of those persons would be considered final. There was great discontent felt upon this subject, and he hoped the Government would cause an inquiry into the matter so as to prevent any injustice being done to these parties. A circumstance had come under his own knowledge at that moment which exposed the injustice of this system. A most distinguished officer of the Guards was shot through the lungs at the battle of Inkerman; but he was allowed no compensation, because it was said that he had recovered very well, and that the wound did not signify. He held that gentlemen wounded in the service of their country, and sent home, should not be exposed to the caprice of those medical men, who were not very nice as to how they ought to assess the damage. He also thought that some arrangement should be made for granting pensions for wounds to non-commissioned officers.

CAPTAIN DUNCOMBE said, he thought he understood the hon. Under Secretary of War to say that in the hospital ships the berths were placed at right angles amidships. Now, he hoped that they were placed fore and aft, as being more healthy and convenient for the men themselves. With regard to the hospital at Smyrna, he had some experience of the climate there, and instead of its being the unhealthy place as noticed by the public papers, he did not think it was at all deserving of that character. He would recommend the erection of an auxiliary hospital at Buona Beshi, a healthy spot on the hills near that town.

MR. PERCY said, he would beg to point out that unless the landing pier at Scutari was repaired the boats of which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) had spoken would be of little use. If the Spring Palace at Scutari was to be taken as a hospital, he hoped the Government would take care not to retain it for that purpose after the month of May, as it would then become unhealthy. If wooden huts were erected within the hospital walls at Smyrna most injurious consequences would assuredly follow. He believed this plan was attempted at Scutari, but had to be abandoned. These places were all built in the form of a court, and the erection of huts greatly interfered with and impeded the ventilation. Another point to which he was most anxious to direct attention was the ventilation of transport and hospital ships, to which he recommended that Dr. Arnott's plan should be applied. It was at present most defective, from its being impossible to keep the hatchways open in a gale.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, there had been hospital huts erected in the yard of the infantry barracks at Scutari; but the moment the Government were made aware of it, their removal was directed. The huts proposed to be erected at Smyrna were to be on a parade ground adjoining the hospital, but not within its precincts.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to know if it were the intention of Government to provide an increased number of chaplains, and also to send out additional nurses to the hospitals?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, it appeared that the number of chaplains was not sufficient at Scutari; the Government had it under consideration whether any addition should be made to the number. He was not aware that any arrangement was in contemplation at present for sending out an additional number of nurses.

plain that in consequence of the late hour of the night he agreed to postpone the first two Votes—namely, for the Customs and for Inland Revenue. He proposed, therefore, only to take a Vote for the Post Office.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that that was the very Vote which he wished to have postponed, as he was anxious to bring before the House the many abuses that existed in the Irish Post Office system. He should, therefore, move that the Chairman report progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 72: Majority 53.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he could not at that hour enter into a discussion of the abuses connected with the Post Office in Ireland. The management was as bad as could be. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that numerous representations had been made from all quarters on the subject of the Irish mails. After the decision that had just been come to, he would merely content himself with protesting against the system, reserving further remarks till a better opportunity.

MR. WILSON said, he willingly admitted that reformation was required as regarded the postal arrangements for Ireland. Numerous representations, which he believed well founded, had been made on the subject. He knew that the Postmaster General was of opinion that a searching inquiry ought to be made into the subject. At the same time, no part of the postal arrangements of the United Kingdom had a larger share of attention than those relating to Ireland. He could state that every attention would be paid to any representations on the subject.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that what the hon. Gentleman had just stated fully justified him in the course he had taken.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he wished to know why the superannuation allowances were placed in a separate Vote, and not included in the present Vote.

MR. WILSON said, that it was in consequence of the alteration made in the schedule of the Bill last year by the House of Lords.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to call attention to the conveyance of mails by coaches and cars over districts where they might be carried by the railway. He had no doubt that the railways were partly to blame, but there was no point in the reforms of the Post Office in Ireland which more required redress than this.

MR. F. SCULLY said, he could confirm this statement, for he knew that in some parts the mails were carried, not by coaches or cars, but by men, and that valuable letters were in consequence often lost.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he must express a wish that the accounts should be simplified, and those of England and Ireland kept distinct. He trusted that means would be taken to compel the railways to carry the mails at a reasonable rate, for he believed that it was owing to their high demands that the mails were not carried by them at present. He hoped that some statement would be made of the reforms intended.

MR. KIRK said, he could not avoid complaining of the arrangements by which the mails were sent from London to Dublin. The correspondence of merchants and others was, in consequence, unnecessarily delayed. He thought it was quite practicable to obviate these delays by a very easy alteration in the hours of their departure.

MR. GROGAN said, the anomalies of the Post Office were general all over Ireland, and should be taken into immediate consideration, with a view to their removal.

MR. VANCE said, a great many complaints had been made that the Report of the Commissioners intrusted, some time ago, with investigating the condition of the Dublin and Edinburgh Post Offices, had not as yet been acted upon, and the public were consequently the sufferers. Another matter calling loudly for complaint was the paltry sum allowed for salaries to provincial postmasters in Ireland. In some instances he could state these persons were paid as little as 4*l.* or 5*l.* per annum; while they were permitted to supply the deficiency by charging private individuals so much for depositing letters in their bags. He wished to know when the Report of the Commissioners would be laid upon the table of the House?

MR. COWAN said, he begged to be allowed to ask whether there was any likelihood of the promised revision taking place in the salaries of the Edinburgh Post Office officials, or whether there was any immediate prospect of their being increased?

MR. HUTCHINS said, that without reference to the comparative merits of the complaints coming from Scotch and Irish Members, he could not help stating that, at all events, the estimate for Scotland was much less than that for Ireland. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Irish Members.]

MR. VANCE: For example, if the hon. Member will look to the printed statement, he will find that whereas the secretary in Scotland receives 1,000*l.* a year, the Irish secretary gets but 800*l.*

MR. MICHELL said, he wished to ask how it came to pass that the salaries of all the higher officials in the London Post Office had been raised, while such paltry sums were paid to country postmasters and letter-carriers? The whole establishment, in his opinion, required revision.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he could only describe the Irish Post Office arrangements as a "Heaven-born mull;" and he must complain that, although steps had been taken to accelerate the mails in England, no similar steps had been taken in Ireland, and it was actually a fact that in some districts the towns were further apart than they were 100 years ago. This was perfectly disgraceful to the Government. Things were done in Ireland which would not be tolerated by the most contemptible constituency of the meanest district in England or Scotland.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that even if the cost of the Irish establishment was greater than that for Scotland, there was sufficient reason for it in the fact, that the population of Ireland, and the business transacted by the Post Office in the latter country, were much greater than in the former. But in reality the fact was not as had been asserted. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the inadequate remuneration of the provincial letter-carriers, both in England and Ireland. They were actually often paid less than ordinary field labourers. It was really holding out a premium for dishonesty, to pay men, intrusted often with registered letters containing money, some 9*s.* or 10*s.* per week. These wages were obviously very insufficient for men who had frequently to travel ten or twelve, or in some cases as much as twenty, miles a day.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the whole Post Office system was so ordered as to cut down the public accommodation in order to swell the public revenue. He wished to call attention to the necessity of some measure for sending the mails by railways, satisfactory to the railway companies and to the public.

MR. HUTCHINS said, if he, as an English Member, put a finger on a grievance, whether it referred to Ireland or England, he should not be deterred from pointing it out by disapproval of Irish Members.

MR. WILSON said, that the most important point upon the subject of the Post Office which had been discussed that night was with reference to the conveyance of mails by railways. Last year a great many discussions arose upon the matter, and a Committee was appointed to investigate the whole question on the broadest basis. The Report of that Committee had been for many months upon the table of the House, and doubtless many hon. Gentlemen had seen it. One of the recommendations advanced by the Committee was, that some general basis should be laid down by a Commission of scientific men to serve as a guide to the referees appointed by the railways and the Post Office to determine the rate of payment to the railways. The duty of that Commission which had been recently appointed would be to examine the case with reference to the postal communications, and to lay down as clearly as possible some general rule of charge for the employment of railway carriages under three or four circumstances: first, carrying the mails by the ordinary passenger trains; secondly, by trains appointed specially for Post Office purposes, but carrying passengers; and thirdly, for carrying letters by railways without any passenger communication whatever. When the Government had obtained the Report of that Commission, he thought the House would be disposed to pass some Bill which should render it more compulsory and more easy than at present on the part of the railways to give their services upon reasonable terms to the public. There could be no doubt, as he had already stated, that there was some inconvenience attending the arrangements respecting the transmission of mails from London to Dublin, but the Government had made repeated efforts to effect improvements, many of which had worked well, and at the present moment there was under the consideration of the Government a plan for accelerating the mails by a more rapid transit from Holyhead to Kingstown. It would, however, be attended with considerable expense. The Government was most anxious that the Post Office service in all parts of the United Kingdom should be made as efficient as possible, and there was no practical suggestion for that purpose which they did not adopt without delay. With respect to the salaries of letter-carriers in country districts, they were, no doubt, small, but the men had important emoluments, and the places were eagerly looked after.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—8<sup>a</sup> Commons Inclosure

CASE OF MR. CARDEN.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he wished to put a question to his noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the case of Mr. Carden. He was anxious to know whether his noble Friend would have any objection to state what were the circumstances under which that criminal had been liberated before a considerable portion of his sentence had been carried into effect? He hoped to be quite understood, as not in the remotest degree imputing improper motives or want of due care to his noble Friend.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN said, that so far from having any objection to answer the question, he was very much obliged to his noble and learned Friend for giving him an opportunity of explaining a case with respect to which very much misconception prevailed. Mr. Carden, as their Lordships were aware, had been convicted at the Tipperary assizes last summer of attempted abduction, under circumstances of violence, of a young lady, and had been sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour; and it had been the intention of the Government to have allowed him to undergo the full measure of that sentence. Some time ago, however, it had been represented to him by several magistrates of the county of Tipperary, who in their official capacity had visited the gaol of Clonmel, that Mr. Carden's health was very seriously impaired, and that a prolongation of his imprisonment might prove fatal to him. To those representations he (the Earl of St. Germans) had paid no attention. But subsequently a certificate reached him from the medical officer of the gaol of Clonmel to the same effect, and then he found that he could no longer decline to institute an inquiry into the case. It was said that in Ireland there was one law for the rich and another for the poor ; and in the present instance that saying was in a certain sense true, because if Mr. Carden had been a poor man he should at once have ordered his liberation from confinement on the receipt of the certificate of the medical officer. But as Mr. Carden was a rich man, it was a case in which he thought that he ought to take unusual precautions for the purpose of seeing that justice should not be unfairly evaded ; and he had, therefore, sent down to Clonmel a medical man of the first eminence in Dublin, Sir Philip Crampton, to inquire into the state of Mr. Carden's health. Sir P. Crampton, after having instituted that inquiry, reported that he had no hesitation in saying that there was so grave an accumulation of symptoms that a prolongation of Mr. Carden's confinement for a few months would be fatal to him. Under these circumstances he believed he should have been perfectly justified in ordering the release of Mr. Carden. But he had not done so. Knowing that Mr. Carden was a man of large property and had many wealthy friends, he had thought himself at liberty to require that he should enter into securities for his future good behaviour. He had accordingly caused it to be intimated to Mr. Carden that he was prepared to order his liberation if he would enter into recognisances, himself in 20,000*l.*, and two sureties in 5,000*l.* each, that he would leave the country for the remaining period of his sentence, and that he would keep the peace towards all the subjects of Her Majesty, and more especially towards the young lady whom he had attempted to abduct, for a period of ten years. He understood that, in the first instance, Mr. Carden had acquiesced in that proposal ; but before he (the Earl of St. German) had left Ireland, he had been informed that Mr. Carden had taken exception to a clause in the recognisances, and had refused to accept the change of punishment on the conditions in question. Those were the facts of the case, and he believed they were far from showing any disposition on his part to frustrate the ends of justice from a partiality in favour of a man of rank and property.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that the statement of his noble Friend was a complete answer to any suspicion which might exist, that the course pursued had been influenced by the station of the criminal—indeed, he thought that the noble Earl had shown that there was evidence enough to justify him in discharging Mr. Carden without entering into recognisances. Now that he had refused to avail himself of the permission, his case came under the consideration of the Home Department.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE thought that the proper course had been taken, and hoped that the certificates of the medical men would be produced.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON said, he believed that great caution ought to be exercised in dealing with medical certificates of that description. He knew from his own experience that certificates were in many cases given by medical men to the effect that prisoners were in a very dangerous state of health, although it afterwards appeared, on full inquiry, that no such danger existed. He would suggest that the medical certificate in this case should be produced.

THE COURT OF PRUSSIA AND THE CONGRESS OF VIENNA.

LORD LYNDHURST,* in rising, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the position of Prussia with reference to the approaching negotiations at Vienna, said—

My Lords, I have been for some time desirous to call your attention, in the terms of the notice, to the position of Prussia with respect to the negotiations that are now pending at Vienna. I shall do this with the more freedom, because, not being connected with the Government, nothing that falls from me as an individual can cause embarrassment or inconvenience to Her Majesty's Ministers.

I need scarcely remind your Lordships that the Prussian Government has urged in the strongest way its claim to attend at these negotiations, and not merely to attend the negotiations, but to take an active part in them. This claim has been most strenuously opposed, and properly opposed, by the Allied Powers. It is a question of deep interest; but this and other matters connected with it have been thrown into so much obscurity by the diplomatic mystification of the Court of Prussia, that I think I shall perform an acceptable service to your Lordships if I endeavour to disentangle them from the complications in which they are involved, and state them plainly and simply to your Lordships.

Two circumstances have occurred within a recent period which have added to the interest of this question. One of these is the message sent by the late Emperor in the last stage of his illness to the Prussian Court, exhorting the King of Prussia to remain the same for Russia, or, in other words, to continue the same line of policy that he has hitherto pursued with respect to that Court; and, further, recommending strongly to the King of Prussia to remember the counsels of his late father, who was, we all know, warmly and zealously attached to Russia. The other circumstance to which I allude is the manifesto of the new Emperor, in which he has declared his intention to uphold, at the highest pitch, the glory and honour of his kingdom. And for what purpose? For the purpose of enabling him to accomplish the views and desires of his illustrious predecessors—Peter, Catherine, Alexander, and his immediate predecessor, the late Emperor. Now, my Lords, we know that the prominent and never-ceasing wish and desire of these respective sovereigns was to overthrow the Ottoman Empire, and to establish the Russian Government in Constantinople, or, in the words of the Czar Peter, to obtain the key of his dominions.

I confess, my Lords, that I, for one, never anticipated any active or cordial support to the Allies from the Court of Prussia, and I think that I could state to your Lordships reasons, satisfactory and convincing, in support of that opinion. But this would lead me too much into detail, and too far from the immediate object I have in view. I cannot, however, forbear reading to your Lordships part of a diplomatic despatch from an eminent diplomatist of Russia, addressed to Count Nesselrode immediately before the last war between Russia and Turkey. I read this because it not only describes the view taken by that diplomatist, at the period to which I refer, of the policy of the Court of Prussia, but because I consider it to be descriptive, and almost prophetic, of the course which Prussia has recently pursued. I have stated that the despatch was written when Russia was preparing to make war against Turkey on the last occasion. The diplomatist, after alluding to the good disposition of the Court of Prussia, proceeds in these terms, which I think are well worth the attention of your Lordships—

"Suppose, then, that Russia should undertake alone to put in execution those coercive means, there is every reason to believe that the Court of Berlin would not in any manner oppose it."

Not only does the diplomatist say that the Court of Prussia would not in any way oppose them, but he proceeds thus—

"On the contrary, her attitude, at once unfettered and friendly, would operate as a powerful check on other States, and bring them to submit to results suited to the dignity and interests of Russia."

How descriptive, my Lords, of what we have observed with respect to the conduct of Prussia for the last twelve months, during which she has been acting constantly as a check upon Austria, opposing her measures, and preventing her from joining in active co-operation with the Allies for attaining the great objects of the war. He concludes thus—

"It will be necessary to let the Cabinet of Berlin, to a certain extent, into our confidence, and to convince it that the part we assign to Prussia will contribute to increase the happy intimacy between the two Sovereigns and the two Courts."

Is it possible, my Lords, to conceive anything more anticipatory—more prophetic of the course that has for the last twelve months been pursued by the Court of Prussia?

It was supposed by many persons that Prussia, having become a party to the protocols of the 5th of December, the 13th of January, and the 9th of April, would actively co-operate with the Allies. But a little consideration would, I think, have led those who entertained that opinion to see that such an inference was wholly fallacious. In a contest between Russia and the other great Powers of Europe, it was impossible that Prussia should not take a part; she must have been content otherwise to have been placed in a position of absolute isolation, derogatory to her character, destructive to her influence, and reducing her, in fact, for a time, to the state of a second-rate Power. On the other hand, considering the conduct of Russia, the violent course she had pursued, the indignation felt throughout the dominions of Prussia, throughout Germany, and throughout Europe in general, at her conduct, it was impossible, as my noble Friend opposite has repeatedly stated, that she could openly espouse the cause of Russia. She had no alternative, therefore, but to attend the Conferences; and, attending the Conferences, to sign the protocols to which I have referred.

What, then, was the object of those protocols? It was to declare that the parties to them would procure the evacuation of the Principalities, and would obtain guarantees for the protection of the independence of the Sultan and the integrity of the Turkish Empire. These were the declared objects of the protocols. In what manner has this intention been followed up by the Court of Prussia? In pointing this out, I cannot do better than refer to the language of Baron Manteuffel, the Prime Minister of Prussia, upon the occasion of proposing the loan of 30,000,000*l.* for military purposes.

Upon that occasion he stated in distinct terms that Prussia, by expressing her sentiments upon the conduct of Russia—referring to the protocols—had done all that was necessary; he did not think she was called upon to go further, or to take any active measures. He further stated—and I would press this upon your Lordships' attention—that he did not conceive the independence of Germany or German interests to be involved in the contest, and that Prussia was therefore not called upon to make any sacrifices. That statement was made in the Lower Chamber, and there can be no misapprehension upon the subject; it cannot be said that this is an incorrect representation of what passed, for it was repeated in substance upon two other occasions, namely, in the Committee upon the loan, and afterwards in the Upper Chamber.

I beg, then, to draw your Lordships' attention to the situation of Prussia and her obligations at that time, and to her conduct in pursuance of those obligations. She had been a party to the treaty of 1840 and to the treaty of 1841. By the preambles of those treaties she was engaged in the strongest manner; not, indeed, in specific terms, but by the strongest implied engagements, in point both of interest and of honour, to maintain the independence of the Sultan and the integrity of his dominions. The Principalities had been invaded without any pretence of right, but in the most flagrant violation of all principle, by the armies of Russia. The revenues of the Principalities had been seized, private property sequestered, and the inhabitants compelled to join the Russian armies for the purpose of making war upon their own Sovereign. Such was the actual state of things. In addition to the obligations I have stated, arising out of the treaties to which I have referred, was the additional engagement entered into by the signature of the protocols.

In this state of things the Prime Minister of Prussia was not ashamed to declare that, although a great wrong had been committed, his Government having expressed their sentiments upon the subject, they did not think it necessary to go further, or to take any active measures. Is it possible, my Lords, to conceive a greater neglect of duty, an act more derogatory to a great Power—more degrading, than, after having admitted such a wrong, which she was bound by treaty and by repeated engagements to redress, to satisfy herself with admitting and lamenting that wrong, without taking any means whatever for the purpose of redressing it?

But this is only part of the case. German independence and German interests, the Minister adds, are not involved in this question, and therefore we are not called upon to make sacrifices. German independence not involved in this question! Why, my Lords, I said on a former occasion, and I now repeat, that the interests and independence of Germany are much more closely involved in this question than those of the Western Powers, either of England or France, who have made, and are still making, such large sacrifices for the purpose of promoting German interests, establishing German independence, and defending the cause of civilisation throughout the European world. Let the Czar once be established at Constantinople, and it would be worse than idle to talk of German independence. It was a well-known saying of Frederick, the most sagacious of the Prussian monarchs, that "in that event the Russian would be at Konigsberg."

If, in saying that German interests are not involved in this contest, the Minister means commercial and material interests, how is it possible that even, in this restricted sense, such an assertion can for a moment be maintained? Is not the freedom of the navigation of the Danube a question essentially connected with the material and commercial interests of Germany? It is true that, as far as Prussia is concerned, her commercial interests are not connected with the Danube, for her rivers flow northwards, and that is the direction of her commerce; but with respect to Central and Southern Germany, the great channel of communication outward and homeward is by the Danube. How, then, can it be said, even in this limited sense, that her interests are not affected by the encroachments of Russia, and involved in the present contest? If it were necessary to refer to authorities on this subject, I might refer to that of Baron Manteuffel himself, expressed in a document to which I alluded on a former occasion, and part of which I will now read to your Lordships. It states—

“The interests for which we are labouring, amid impending complications, are, from their very essence, the interests of entire Germany.”

Referring to the navigation of the Danube, it then goes on to state—

“That a well-regulated state of affairs in the countries on the Lower Danube is of essential importance to the material interests of Germany.”

How are we to reconcile these inconsistencies? How explain this extraordinary conduct on the part of a great Power like Prussia? I can only understand it upon the supposition of the existence of some secret and overpowering influence which Prussia has either not the wish or not the power to resist—the influence, perhaps, of a strong, of a powerful and determined mind, over one of a weak, fluctuating, and irresponsible character.

There are, my Lords, some circumstances connected with this part of the question, which, though of a more personal character, I must bring before your Lordships. At the Committee on the Prussian Loan Bill, the late Minister of War (General Bonin) ventured to say, what my noble Friend opposite has often stated—

“That it was impossible that Prussia could co-operate with Russia on a question of this kind; that it would be an act of paricide towards the States of Germany.”

What were the consequences of the expression of this honest opinion—what followed? He was desired to attend the King; he was received in the usual kind manner by his Sovereign, almost embraced by him; he was complimented for his able and active services, for his talents, for his devotion to his duty. The conversation for some time proceeded in the same strain; but towards the close it was intimated to him that it would be inconvenient to the Government that he should continue to hold the office of Minister of War. What was the result? In a few days afterwards he sent in his resignation.

Need I remind your Lordships that the representative of Prussia at our own Court, a man of great learning, great talents, and attainments—a profound statesman, well conversant with the interests of his country and of Europe—finding the course pursued by Prussia to be inconsistent with the opinions he had expressed as to the policy which it ought to pursue, and not choosing to be an agent to carry into effect that which he disapproved, or to defend that which he had condemned—resigned his office, and is now pursuing his valuable literary labours at the University of Heidelberg. This is in the same character with the other instance to which I have referred.

At a more recent period, towards the close of last year, the King of Prussia, in a Speech from the Throne, with his usual eloquence—for which, I am told, he is remarkable—enlarged on matters of family and domestic interest and other affairs. As a matter of course, according to the usual courtesy, it was expected that an Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne would be presented; but, as it was supposed that the Address might contain observations which might not be quite agreeable to the Royal ear, it was stated by the Ministers that the Address should be dispensed with—that it was wholly unnecessary—that it was not required. Leaving your Lordships, then, without further comment of mine, to draw your own conclusions, and to form your own opinions from the facts which I have stated, I will close the first act of this political drama.

I will now pass to the next step in these proceedings. It was considered by Austria, after a certain interval, that it would be proper to call on Russia to evacuate the Principalities. The demand was drawn up and sent to the Court of Berlin for the Prussian signature. This was considered to be rather a strong measure, and she did not choose to put her signature to such a document; but in more gentle terms proposed, either through the resident Minister at Berlin, or by a special envoy, to support the demand. In what terms this support was conveyed, with what earnestness and zeal, will probably never be known, but must be left to your Lordships to conjecture. The result was, that the demand was rejected by Russia—but though rejected, it was not rejected in terms, but by certain counter-propositions being sent for the adoption of Austria. These counter-propositions applied only to a part of the case—only to some of the questions that were in controversy between the Allies and Russia, and were clearly inadmissible. But it being considered proper that the Allies should be consulted, it would, of course, require some time to return an answer; and Prussia pressed Austria in the strongest manner to stop the march of its troops collected on the borders of the Principalities, and not to cross the border until this question should be finally decided. To this proposition Austria acceded. Russia then gave notice that she should evacuate the Principalities, and withdrew beyond the Pruth, and stated that she would act only on the defensive.

Now, my Lords, mark what, upon this, was the conduct of Prussia. Although the propositions related to only a part of the subjects in controversy, and were evidently insufficient, still it was contended that they contained all that could reasonably be required; and that, as Russia had evacuated the Principalities, and said that she would only act on the defensive, the result was satisfactory; and Prussia availed herself of these circumstances to excuse herself in withdrawing from the Confederacy. Having thus detached herself from the Confederacy, what was her next step? She immediately set herself in opposition to the policy of Austria. Austria was endeavouring to induce the minor States of Germany to co-operate actively with the Allies, for the purpose of restraining the aggression of Russia, and securing the tranquillity and independence of Europe. She exerted herself to the utmost for this object; while Prussia, having taken the course which I have pointed out, made use of every artifice and intrigue to frustrate these measures, making propositions not only to the Diet, but separately to individual States, with the view of persuading them to refuse their assent to the proposals of Austria; and in this, I regret to say, she was, to a great extent, successful. Now, I do not ask your Lordships to come to the conclusion, that Prussia was acting in concert with Russia; I do not ask you to say that she was acting as the servile agent and instrument of that Power; but this I may venture to assert, that if she really filled that character—if she were so acting in concert with, and as the instrument of Russia, she could not have served that power more effectually, than by the course which she has thus pursued. And further, my Lords, at the very time when Prussia was thus acting, and calling upon the minor States of Germany to withhold their active co-operation from Austria, Russia was engaged, as if in unison with Prussia, in thanking publicly and ostentatiously two of the German States for refusing to take part in the war.

I have said that I had concluded the first act of this political drama; I may now observe that I have reached the close of the second; and I will now call your Lordships' attention to the third and last. Austria found it necessary to take a further very important step in this business in conjunction with the Western Powers. The Allies appointed a meeting to be held on the 8th of August, at Vienna, for the purpose of deciding on what should be required of Russia as the basis of any preliminary negotiation. Notice of this appointment was at first given in the usual way to the Court of Prussia, and was repeated on a second occasion. Prussia, however, did not think proper to attend the meeting. She did not, indeed, expressly state that she would not be present, but she did not, in fact, attend; and in consequence of her absence, instead of drawing up a protocol, a note was signed by the three Allied Powers, laying down as the basis for future negotiation, the "four points," respecting which so much discussion has arisen. These four points, thus settled, were sent to Russia for her acceptance, and were at once rejected. What course did Prussia then adopt? She published and circulated a document, objecting, on her own part, to the four points; objecting in particular to the joint protectorate; and taking various other exceptions to these proposals; and not only so, but continued to carry on, in the Diet at Frankfort and throughout the States of Germany, the most active opposition to all the attempts made by Austria to induce those States to co-operate actively with the Allies. She thus separated herself from the Allies still more widely than before; for not only did she refuse to attend their meeting, but she objected to the result of that meeting, and to the decision to which they came, and further endeavoured in every way to thwart and defeat their policy.

The next step, and the final one, in this history, is the treaty of the 2nd of December. The Allied Powers met and negotiated that treaty, the object of which was to call upon Russia, within a month from its date, to make such proposals for peace as they could accept; and stipulating that in the event of failure they would concert as to the future measures to be adopted; obviously meaning coercive measures. When that document was signed, notice was given to Prussia that room had been left for her to give it her adhesion. She refused, however, to join in the treaty. Some formal objections were raised; and in the result she stated that she would not object to conclude separate treaties with this country and with France to the same effect as the joint treaty. An answer was returned that if she would accede to a separate treaty, having the same effect, with France, and also to another with England, no objection would be made to that course; yet from that day to this she has never done so. She has, indeed, carried on various negotiations, and made various proposals of a different character, with numberless qualifications, and with exceptions such as she must have known the Allies could not by any possibility accede to.

This, my Lords, then, is the position in which Prussia stands at the present moment. Now the observations that I have made must be understood as applying solely to the Court and the Government of Prussia. I have reason to believe—indeed I have reason to know—that the national feeling of Prussia is not at all in accordance with that of the Court. I gather this, my Lords, from various sources which are open to us all. But this very day I have seen a copy of an address drawn up by the Committee of the Lower Chambers of Prussia, to which the subject of the army estimates was referred, which expresses in the strongest terms what I believe, and always have believed, to be the national feeling of that country on the matters to which I am alluding. A part of this document I shall take the liberty of reading to your Lordships. It is couched in strong language, and is in conformity with the view that I take of this subject. It runs thus:—

"We cannot refrain from expressing the anxiety with which your Majesty's faithful people have followed, during the last ten months, the policy of the Royal Government in the great European question. It has seen with sorrow Prussia leave the community of the great Powers represented last year at the Vienna Conferences, and thereby renounce the most efficacious means of assisting by a firm attitude the speedy attainment of the object so ardently desired by the whole country—namely, a peace which shall offer durable guarantees against the renewal of the disturbance of established order in Europe, and in a manner conformable alike to the dignity, the interests, and the position of Prussia as a Power, and to the declarations made by the Government of your Majesty at the commencement of the year, concerning its future line of policy."

Such, my Lords, are the sentiments and opinions of the Prussian nation, as reflected by the Committee in this address, with regard to the conduct and the policy of their Government. I have one more fact to mention, which brings the matter to a close. Russia, in the first instance, rejected the proposal as to the "four points." She afterwards required a fuller statement and explanation of their meaning by the Allies. Such an explanation was accordingly returned to her, upon receipt of which she declared herself ready to accede to the proposal, and it was agreed that negotiations should be opened upon this basis at Vienna.

Prussia appears to have been taken by surprise in this consent on the part of Russia. She soon, however, recovered her self-possession; and claimed to be admitted as a party to the negotiations. Your Lordships will naturally ask, upon what ground? Principally, because she had been a party to the protocols. But how could this give her a right to what she claimed? True, she had subscribed the protocols, and, up to a certain point, had concurred in the acts of the other Powers; but then she afterwards abandoned and deserted them in all the subsequent stages of these transactions, as I have already detailed. She separated herself from the Allies, in the first instance, on the question of the answer to the demand for the evacuation of the Principalities: again, she refused to attend the meetings for the purpose of settling the basis of the negotiations; she publicly objected to the basis so settled; and continued to conduct active operations against the policy of Austria at the Diet. She refused to be a party to the treaty of the 2nd of December. The object of that treaty was, that if Russia would not propose or accept reasonable terms of peace, the Allies would pledge themselves to concert measures—coercive measures—to enforce such terms upon her. She not only refused to accede to that treaty, but has declined to enter into any corresponding separate treaty after having intimated her readiness to do so. On what pretence, then, since the pending negotiations have arisen out of the basis, as settled at the meeting of the 8th of August, which she declined to attend, and to which basis she publicly objected, and out of the treaty of the 2nd of December, to which she refused to accede, can she claim a right to be admitted as a party to these negotiations? There are other grounds still less tenable upon which she relies, but I refrain from adverting to them, because they are answered with such admirable effect in the despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, and, I have no doubt, in the corresponding despatch of my noble Friend.

I earnestly hope and entreat, therefore, that the Allied Powers will adhere to the decision to which they have come, and not upon any pretence allow the Prussian diplomatists to become parties to these negotiations. I feel confident that if Prussia were admitted she would act in concert with Russia, as her ally, her instrument—nay, I might almost say, as her slave; and that she would contrive so to complicate the questions to be discussed as to render utterly hopeless the prospect of any satisfactory or beneficial result.

It is a singular circumstance in the history of nations—but not the less real—that their diplomatic character and their foreign policy have frequently a permanent form, surviving successive monarchs and successive administrations. The diplomatic character and the foreign policy of Russia may be traced back to the time of Peter, confirmed and strengthened by the Empress Catherine II. retaining the same form and the same character, and carried on upon the same principles down to the present day. In like manner, the diplomatic character and the foreign policy of Prussia may be traced back as far as Frederick, whom the flattery of the French philosophers, in exchange for patronage (capriciously accorded and withheld) gratified with the title of "Great." It must never be forgotten that he was the contriver, the instigator, and the active instrument of the partition of Poland—the most flagitious political transaction of modern times—prepared by intrigue, founded in falsehood, and executed with atrocious violence. In tracing the foreign policy of Prussia from the reign of that monarch down to the present time, it will be found ever to exhibit the same features of unblushing fraud and unscrupulous selfishness. But I will confine myself to instances in which we ourselves have been concerned.

As far back as the year 1794, it was considered to be of the utmost importance that we should be able to employ a large military force to act in the Low Countries against France. Application was made to Prussia. She complained of her poverty, of the emptiness of her treasury. The ancestor of the noble Earl who sits below me (the Earl of Malmsbury) conducted the negotiation. He stated in answer that England was ready to furnish the means upon one condition, and one condition only—that the army should act in the Low Countries upon such points as the English Government should point out. This was the very essence of the treaty. It was consented to by the Prussian Government, and the money was paid into the Prussian treasury. The troops were marched to the Rhine, and there they were detained for purposes peculiarly and solely Prussian. Notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of the noble Earl to whom I have referred, addressed to the King personally, to the Prime Minister, and to the commander of the forces, they refused to allow the troops to stir from that position, and the object of the treaty was entirely defeated. The correspondence of the noble Earl, in which these transactions are detailed, will amply repay the trouble of the perusal. The noble Earl gives vent to the bitterness of his feelings on the conduct of Prussia in a short note addressed to the Duke of Portland, which, though published, I should scarcely venture, from the strong terms in which it is expressed, to read to your Lordships.

The next transaction to which I shall refer is the conduct of Prussia antecedently to the battle of Austerlitz. Nothing could be more degrading than the vacillation which she exhibited during this anxious period; entering at one moment into engagements with the Emperor Alexander, and at another into opposite engagements with Napoleon. In the correspondence between Napoleon and his brother, King Joseph, your Lordships will find this conduct of Prussia described in the most contemptuous terms.

At length she decided upon adopting a course of policy similar to that which she has attempted in the present instance. She put herself forward as mediator between the contending parties, and Count Haugwitz was sent to the French headquarters to negotiate in that character; but the victory of Austerlitz having taken place, the whole scene was changed. And what, then, was the conduct of Prussia? She immediately abandoned her character of mediator; entered into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the French Emperor; and accepted as a bribe for so doing the cession of Hanover—a territory belonging to her friend and ally, England. I well remember the stream of indignant eloquence poured forth on that occasion by Mr. Fox, so characteristic of his generous and noble spirit. The utter selfishness and vacillation of Prussia at that period, professing one thing and doing another, playing the game of fast and loose, corresponds in principle—is in accordance with the conduct—which she has pursued throughout the whole of these negotiations. My Lords, I have no faith in the Prussian Government, and if my noble Friend should be tempted to enter into any engagement with that Power, I should be disposed to address him with words of caution, “Hunc tu, Romane, caveto.”

I have drawn the facts which I have presented to your Lordships in this statement from public documents in circulation in this country and on the continent of Europe. If there are others, of which I have no knowledge, in the possession of my noble Friend, the foreign secretary, which may have the effect of placing the conduct of Prussia in a less unfavourable light, I shall listen to them with the utmost attention and candour, and receive any explanation which my noble Friend may have to offer, with the respect which his position and his high character demand.

It is a great satisfaction to me that these negotiations are to be conducted by the noble Lord the late President of the Council, but who, since he left this country, has, if I may venture upon the allusion, started up, by a touch of the spear of Ithuriel, in his former shape of Secretary for the Colonies. It requires but little of a prophetic spirit to foresee that he is destined, at no distant period, to occupy a still more elevated and commanding position in Her Majesty's councils. These things fill me with wonder, and when I contrast the noble Lord's present situation and future brilliant prospects, with his modest, retired, and anxious appearance, a few weeks since, on the fourth row behind the Treasury bench, I almost insensibly murmur to myself a well known poetical description—

Ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit.*”

I rely on the sagacity of the noble Lord, on his firmness, his vigour, his decision, and upon the strong language which he held not long since in the other House of Parliament, as a sure pledge that he will not consent to any terms of peace short of those which shall fully secure the great objects for which the war was undertaken. To accept anything short of this, “would,” to quote the words of my noble Friend opposite, “only be to patch up a hollow truce, and lead to new wars and new sacrifices.” We must have a peace corresponding with the more than once repeated description of my noble Friend—“solid, lasting, and every way honourable.” Above all, I trust that our recent disasters will not induce the Government to recede one iota from our just demands. Rome was never more unyielding than in the season of adversity. I have the utmost confidence in the vigour, the energy, and unflinching resources of this great nation, and I feel satisfied that at no distant period they will place us in a position even higher than that from which we have declined in consequence of the mismanagement of the war under the direction and auspices of the late Government. There may be those who, envious of our prosperity, regard our reverses with complacency and even with satisfaction. Let us teach them to respect the fortitude with which we bear our disasters, and admire the vigour with which we repair them.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, though my noble and learned Friend said he could cause no embarrassment to the Government by the observations he would address to the House, I think that your Lordships will understand the difficulty under which I rise, not to answer the speech of my noble and learned Friend, but to speak on the subject which he has brought under your Lordships' consideration; and if I do not follow my noble and learned Friend through his lucid narrative of Prussia's shortcomings, I trust he will not attribute that to any want of respect to himself, or to any want of recognition of the importance of the subject, and still less to any intention on my part to become the apologist of the Prussian Government. I think, however, my noble and learned Friend will admit that between the position he occupies and the one I have the honour to fill some difference exists, and that less responsibility attaches to what falls from my noble and learned Friend than to the words which I may have occasion to utter. Not that I agree, on the other hand, with my noble and learned Friend, who seems to think that no responsibility attaches to what he says;

on the contrary, I think that there is not one of your Lordships, on whatever side of the House he may sit, who is entitled to consider himself irresponsible for the language he may hold, or the opinions he may express, particularly with respect to foreign countries. Since I have had the honour of holding the seals of the Foreign Office I have had various opportunities of observing what great importance is attached abroad to speeches made in both Houses of Parliament, and this always in proportion to the political eminence and personal character of the speaker, the weight his opinions have in his own country, and the respect which those opinions are considered to carry with them. Therefore, we must admit, that under these circumstances the speech of my noble and learned Friend will produce a great sensation in foreign countries throughout the Continent; and that more particularly the Prussian Court cannot fail to be, I will not say gratified, but struck by the industry, with which my noble and learned Friend has mastered, and the dexterity with which he has laid bare their proceedings of the last year. My noble and learned Friend has, at the conclusion of his speech, made an appeal to me in reference to any documents which I might have in mitigation of the opinions he has expressed. He may possibly think that I am allowing judgment to go by default when I say that I have no such documents to produce; and I do not believe that my noble and learned Friend has misstated—certainly, he would not do so intentionally—any matter he has brought before your Lordships. But I think I shall best discharge my duty on the present occasion with the due reserve imposed on me, if, instead of following my noble and learned Friend through the various matters he has treated on, I venture to supply certain deficiencies with respect to the communications which have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Court of Prussia; for, after all, that is the point to which your Lordships must attach more interest than to the precedents of Prussian policy. I shall endeavour to explain precisely to your Lordships the result of these communications. They are certainly far from satisfactory. Nevertheless, I do not despair of still establishing better relations with Prussia, for I cannot regard the Prussian alliance with the indifference which my noble and learned Friend seems to think it merits; and I should be happy if that alliance were established on the same footing as that on which it stood at the early part of last year, when Prussia joined with us in declaring that the war against Russia was politic and just, when she denounced quite as strongly as Austria the aggressive policy of Russia, and when she joined with Austria in summoning, in terms much more positive and energetic than my noble and learned Friend seems to be aware of, Russia to adopt a more moderate course. Whether Prussia calculated that this united appeal would be irresistible and its success complete I am unable to say, but the positive refusal of Russia to comply with it appeared to stagger the resolution of Prussia, which never since that time has shown any signs of recovery. When the answer of the Russian Cabinet was received at Vienna, Count Buol, in accordance with a previous promise, was prepared to communicate it to the English and French Governments. A conference was summoned to receive the communications, and the English and French representatives obeyed the summons; but the conference could not be held, because the representative of the Prussian Government would not attend. Various telegraphic messages and special missions followed in rapid succession, but there was no result, and at last the Austrian Government, tired of waiting, sent the answer to London and Paris. The English and French Governments lost no time in pronouncing on it in the most decisive manner. It is true that the Prussian Minister at this Court afterwards told me that the representative of Prussia would be allowed to attend the conference, but the answer I gave was the only one I could give, that "It was too late." That the English and French Governments had been invited to give, and had given their opinions some weeks before on the despatch of Count Nesselrode, that the assembling of the Conference for the purpose of making a communication on the same despatch would be simply ridiculous, and to such a course we did not intend to consent. The notes of August the 8th were then interchanged between the three Governments, and the assent of Prussia was invited to them, but declined. Then came the series of correspondence to which my noble and learned Friend has alluded, of great length and uncommon complexity, between the Courts of Austria and Prussia. That correspondence has been most justly characterised by him; but the Court of

Austria steadfastly adhered to the policy and engagements it had undertaken, while Prussia gradually diverged, and the result was German disunion, as my noble and learned Friend has stated, which served the cause of Russia. Communications in the meanwhile took place between England, France, and Austria, which led to the treaty of December 2nd. Before that treaty was signed, Prussia was asked to give her concurrence, but she declined. After it was signed her assent was again sought for, and again it was refused; but she afterwards informed the English and French Governments that her honour and dignity had not been consulted in that treaty, that there was in it a clause with which she had no concern, and another which was offensive to her dignity, and that she had generally great cause of complaint against Austria. She added, that, though prepared to enter into an analogous engagement, she demanded unconditionally to be admitted to the Conference, which was a continuation of the former Conference which had not expired, and from which it was an error to suppose she had withdrawn. Our answer was, that there was no error with respect to her withdrawing from the Conference, because on a former occasion the Conference had not taken place at all because she would not join in it, though entreated to remain, and that it was a mistake to suppose that the Conference about to be held was a continuation of the former Conference; for, so far was that from being the case, that when the Austrian Government invited the French and English Governments in October and November last to continue that Conference, our answer was, that the time for conferences and protocols had gone by, but that if Austria joined us in an engagement for war, we would undertake to see if peace were practicable by negotiation. This led to the treaty of the 2nd of December. But we further said to Prussia that, so anxious were we to obtain an analogous treaty with her, that if there was anything in the treaty to which she objected we would be ready to correct it; that if she had any complaint against Austria the treaty should be made with England and France; that we would give her the same explanations of our views, and sign with her the same protocols; and that, having placed herself in the same position as Austria with the Western Powers, she might then enter into the Conference in a position of independence. But to admit Prussia to claim all the privileges without incurring any of the risks of a great European Power—to admit her unconditionally to a Conference that might end in peace, but which might lead to war on a more extended sphere—without her telling us what were her intentions or her policy—without entering into any engagement with us, either immediate or prospective—without knowing whether she entered on the Conference as a neutral, as a foe, or as a friend—was utterly impossible. That is the footing on which matters stand now, and that is my answer to my noble and learned Friend as to Prussia being admitted unconditionally to the Conference. Subsequently special missions have been sent to this country and to France, and I need not tell your Lordships that the most friendly reception was given to the honourable and excellent gentleman who came to this country from Prussia. The same course was pursued in Paris; and I am certain that if the settlement of this question had been in the hands of these negotiators, or if they had been empowered to admit the proposals made to them, the treaty would have been by this time arranged. But, unfortunately, that was not the case. I do not consider, however, that the negotiations with Prussia are come to an end. Further arrangements may yet be proposed, and, indeed, fresh proposals were made only two or three days ago. But, in the meanwhile, these important negotiations—important, whatever be their issue—have commenced, while Prussia, by her own act, continues excluded. I know, my Lords, that great satisfaction has been expressed here and elsewhere at the position which Prussia now occupies, but we can have no such feeling. We can have no object or interest but to be on terms of friendly relation with Prussia, and to see her properly occupying the high position which she is entitled to hold. Her great territorial extent, the amount of her population, and her vast military organisation, entitle Prussia to be considered as one of the great Powers of Europe. For nearly a century she has taken part in all the great questions of Europe; she has aided in maintaining the equilibrium of power in Europe; and it has really been a melancholy spectacle to see Prussia abdicating the high position she has hitherto held, and endeavouring to reduce the greatest question of modern times—for it is a question, as my noble and learned Friend says,

whether Europe shall be independent or shall succumb to the aggressive policy and sinister influence of Russia—endeavouring, I say, to reduce and restrict this great question within the narrowest limits of German exclusiveness. Remonstrances have not been wanting, but the uniform answer of Prussia is, that her policy is peace. My Lords, I do not doubt the sincerity of that answer. Perhaps there is no country in Europe where war should be more justly dreaded than in Prussia. It is one of the great advantages of our insular position that we have never realised among ourselves the horrors of war; but there is no country in Europe that has more reason to remember and dread the recurrence of these calamities than Prussia. That feeling must not, however, be carried too far, for a mere policy of sentiment will never fulfil the obligations incumbent on a great European Power, or maintain the honour and independence of a nation. Prussia has always said that peace was her policy. I have already said that I do not doubt her sincerity; but, my Lords, France and England are equally sincere in their desire for peace, and Prussia knows they will not continue this war one single day longer than is necessary to secure a safe and honourable peace. But the best way of arriving at such a peace is to prosecute the war vigorously, whereas the course pursued by Prussia can have no other tendency than to enlarge the theatre and protract the duration of the war. I am not questioning the right of Prussia to pursue any policy she may think best for her own interest, but I may express my own inability to understand the drift of that policy, for it appears to me to be neither European, nor German, nor Prussian—a policy neither of war, of peace, nor of neutrality. It seems to me more calculated to thwart Austria than to keep Russia in check. But, however eccentric her course may be, Prussia is still a great European Power, and cannot long remain insulated when great European interests are involved: she cannot side with Russia. She cannot trample on the feelings of her own people, or run counter to the views held with so much unanimity by 20,000,000 of Germans, with respect to their powerful neighbour. She cannot side with Russia against Austria, because she knows well that at the close of such an unnatural and fratricidal war she would be at the mercy of Russia, and become a dependency of that Power. On the other hand, she will not side with Austria; on the contrary, she has herself assumed, and has induced other Powers to assume, an unfriendly attitude towards Austria; and the general result hitherto of Prussian policy has, I fear, been to frustrate the union, and to prevent the vigorous tone and the uniform language on the part of Germany, which would have gone far to secure for us that peace which we are so anxious to obtain, and would have secured for Germany those guarantees of which she stands so much in need. I say, then, that Prussia is in an insulated, and therefore in a false and powerless position. This may be satisfactory to her enemies, but it is deeply regretted by her Allies, and must be felt, keenly felt, by the enlightened, the brave, and the patriotic people of Prussia. It is from this position, from which neither honour nor dignity can be derived, that the Governments of France and England are most anxious she should be relieved; and it is to this object all our efforts have hitherto tended. I assure your Lordships that no exertion shall be spared to secure the co-operation of Prussia, and that these will always be made in a friendly spirit, and with every regard to the honour and dignity of a great and independent Power.

HARTLEPOOL PIER AND PORT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. HEADLAM said, he should oppose the Motion, for the following reason. It was proposed to raise the sum of 800,000*l.* for the purpose of improving the harbour and converting it into a harbour of refuge. In order to pay the interest of this sum three several sources of taxation were originally proposed, namely, duties were to be levied upon ships availing themselves of the advantages afforded by the harbour, upon goods exported from the port, and a rate was to be made upon the owners of property in the town; but, in consequence of the opposition which had been raised, the two latter sources of taxation had been abandoned. He did not think the amount which would be received from vessels using the harbour would anything like pay the interest of the debt to be incurred, and the ordinary annual outlay; and, even if it did, it would be inflicting a gross injustice upon the individuals engaged in the shipping trade in that port. He should therefore move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. FARRER said, he should support the second reading of the Bill. He thought the measure was justified by the rapidly increasing prosperity of the town and port. Eight years ago the revenue enjoyed by the two great dock companies in Hartlepool was 65,000*l.*, which had now increased to 200,000*l.* There was no intention by this measure to levy a passing toll, the only object being to extend the trade and afford conveniences for sheltering distressed vessels on that coast; neither was toll leivable till 250,000*l.* had been expended, and no shipowner, he thought, would object to pay a reasonable toll when he found that the cost of insurance was materially lessened, as it would be by reason of the increased safety of the port. The harbour had been inspected under the direction of the Admiralty by a competent engineer, and the report, he believed, was very favourable as to its capability as a harbour of refuge if the proposed improvements were carried into effect. He therefore trusted the House would not throw out the measure, which was, he conceived, one of great public importance.

MR. INGHAM said, he should oppose the Bill, not seeing how the interest and the sinking fund for the repayment of the capital and the working expenses were to be raised. That amount would not be much short of 60,000*l.* a year. He believed, practically, the whole cost would fall upon some half-dozen coal proprietors in the immediate neighbourhood, and it was most unjust to saddle them with the expense of making this a harbour of refuge, which, if it were required as a national undertaking, ought to be made at the cost of the nation.

Mr. Headlam

MR. BOUVERIE said, he thought a Private Bill, unless it contained some general public principle, should not be rejected on the second reading, but should be investigated in Committee. The facts regarding Hartlepool were very striking, and the trade of the place had increased in a most extraordinary way. In 1835 it was a mere fishing town; docks had been made, and last year no less than 10,177 vessels entered the two docks of that port; and he found that the trade, foreign and colonial trade alone, without including the vast coasting trade in coal, was so great, that, as regards the export trade in foreign ships, Hartlepool was now the sixth port in the United Kingdom; and as regards the export trade in British ships, it was the tenth in importance. Now, it was proposed to make a great harbour by enclosing the bay. To effect this object, the Commissioners would lay a tax on the ships entering the port; they had power to do so, to a certain extent, by an Act of Parliament passed three years ago, and this Bill would only be an extension of that power.

MR. LINDSAY said, he should oppose the Bill. No parties had a right to come to Parliament and ask permission to raise the enormous sum of 800,000*l.* without being able to show by what means they would raise it. He understood that the tax proposed to be laid would raise 15,000*l.* a year, if it were levied on all the shipping in the port. But how could any body of men, upon an annual revenue of 15,000*l.*, be enabled to borrow 800,000*l.*? The result would be that, after having got 250,000*l.*, or at most 300,000*l.*, and having expended that, the Commissioners would be obliged to come to Parliament again, and say, "We have expended upon the security of our own tolls 250,000*l.*, the whole of which will be totally lost, unless you give us fresh powers." What would those powers be? They must be allowed to levy a passing toll; or else it would be demanded that a certain sum of money out of the public funds should be granted to complete this work, on the plea that a harbour of refuge would be very advantageous to all the shipping that frequented the north of England. Now he had great suspicion of such plans, for there had been too many jobs of that kind. He had not had any representations from his constituents respecting this Bill, but he opposed it because it related to those shipping interests to which he had devoted his exclusive attention, and on which he was accustomed to speak in the House.

Mr. J. FORSTER said, he hoped the House would not assent to any such proposal as this, by which persons who did not derive any benefit from the scheme were to pay the expenses.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that viewing this matter on public grounds only, he thought the Bill ought to be read a second time. He was quite sure it would provide an admirable harbour of refuge, where one was most wanted, and a great public desideratum. Judging from the opinion of Mr. Rendell, the engineer, who had investigated the site, he had confidence in the utility of this work; and the only question was, with respect to the funds by which it was to be executed. A passing toll was not asked for, and there were strong checks on the operations of the Bill. The Board of Trade had reported on the matter, and the report of Mr. Rendell had just been presented to the Admiralty. The outlay of 800,000*l.* was indeed large, but the rapid growth of the trade of this harbour justified the parties applying for this Bill, who had no personal interest in the speculation.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

OUR RELATIONS WITH AUSTRIA— QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he begged to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Austrian Ambassador had called upon Lord Clarendon for any explanation of the words stated to have been used by a Member of the Administration, that "no settlement of the Eastern question would be satisfactory unless Hungary and Poland were restored?"

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, in regard to that Member of the Administration to whom the noble Lord refers, I shall merely say that it has caused me great satisfaction that that hon. Friend of mine has accepted service under the Crown, and that I have the most confident expectations that his great natural abilities and the remarkable energy of his character will render him an ornament to Her Majesty's service, and will enable him to do honour to the memory of his illustrious father. The question of the noble Lord, however, refers to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and upon that I am prepared to give him the fullest information. The Austrian Government know, and have all along known, that the Government of Great Britain would consider it a great misfortune to Europe if Hungary were separated from the Austrian empire; because I consider the Austrian empire, as an aggregate body in the centre of Europe, to be an essential element in the balance of power of Europe. The Austrian Government, therefore, have no doubt as to what are the policy and views of Her Majesty's Government in regard to Hungary. With respect to Poland, I have no hesitation in stating my own opinion that the kingdom of Poland, as at present constituted, and as at present occupied, is a standing menace to Germany. It is for the Powers of Germany to determine how far they may think that constitution of Poland is or is not dangerous to them, and whether, under circumstances which may lead them into war with Russia, they will think it for their interests to endeavour to change that position of affairs. But, undoubtedly, no stipulations in regard to a new arrangement of Poland form a part of those points upon which Her Majesty's Government are now, in concert with the Government of France, negotiating at Vienna. Those negotiations are carried on upon the basis of the Four Points, which have been frequently published and are well known to everybody; but the two Powers have reserved to themselves the right, according to circumstances, and according to the events of the war, if hostilities, either owing to a prolongation or a rupture of negotiations, should continue—they have, I say, reserved to themselves the right of adding in future to these Four Points any other stipulations which they may think essential for the future security of Europe. At present, however, the negotiations are going on upon these Four Points, and that is the policy of the Government with respect to this subject.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, the noble Lord had not answered the question put to him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I have stated that the Austrian Ambassador and Government are perfectly cognizant of what is the policy and what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, and there has never been any secrecy on our part, or any doubt entertained on the part of the Government of Austria upon that subject.

THE HOP DUTY—QUESTION.

MR. FREWEN said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it was his intention to introduce any measure during the present Session to alter either the excise duty on British hops or Customs duty on foreign hops; and also, if he would be good enough to explain the object that the deputation from West Kent had, that waited on the right hon. Baronet last Thursday, on the subject of the hop duty? He observed, that, some accounts had appeared of a deputation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the hop duties, at which it had been stated by some one, that the growers were indifferent to the repeal of the duties. Now, he knew the reverse to be the fact; and a year or two ago large meetings had been held to promote their repeal. He, therefore, begged to ask whether the Government contemplated such a measure, seeing that it was calculated to be a far more important benefit to the country than the repeal of the newspaper stamp duty, which certainly did not seem to be at all desired by the principal parties concerned; and which would entail a loss to the revenue of from 200,000*l.* to 300,000*l.* a year, whereas the repeal of the hop duty would only involve a loss of not much more than 100,000*l.*; and it was much more vexatious in its nature than it was oppressive in amount.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government had no present intention of making any alteration in the excise duty on hops. In respect to the customs duty, it would be 1*l.* per cwt. until August 1, when, unless intermediate legislation took place, it would be 2*l.* 5*s.* per cwt. He could not state that circumstances might not arise which, in a fiscal point of view, might make it desirable to prolong the lower rate of duty.

COLONY OF NEWFOUNDLAND—
QUESTION.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House to Thursday,

MR. ROEBUCK said, he rose pursuant to notice, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what was the intended policy of the administration with respect to the Colony of Newfoundland and the complaints made by the House of Assembly of that Colony, and set forth in a petition from that Assembly to the Home Government? He should put the question to the noble Lord in preference to the Secretary of the Home Department, as he considered the noble Lord responsible. The noble Lord who was nominally at the head of the Colonial Office was now on a mission at Vienna, and at that moment they had not in that House anybody representing the Colonial Office, neither a Colonial Minister nor an Under Secretary for the Colonies. If the Colonial Office were kept open for any person who had in his former career shown any peculiar fitness for colonial administration he should have felt more confidence in the present administration of colonial affairs; but seeing that the noble Lord who was now at the head of the Colonial Department was flourishing away at Vienna as Ambassador, and seeing that when the noble Lord some time ago was at the head of the Colonial Office, the largest Colony we had was driven into rebellion, he thought it was not very advantageous to the country to keep open the Office for the noble Lord. Some years ago he (Mr. Roebuck) proposed to that House to concede to Canada certain demands which the people of that Colony made respecting their own government. When he made that proposition, it was received unfavourably by the then Government and unfavourably by the House; but subsequent events proved that the proposition he then made was what prudence demanded, and since that period all those demands had been conceded. Among them was that which had been denominated responsible Government—that was the power on the part of the colonists themselves to conduct their own Government; and one of the questions that he wished to put to the noble Lord was, whether that responsible Government which had been conceded to Canada was about to be conceded, according to promise, to Newfoundland? The next question was, whether or not the complaints made by the people against the present Governor were about to be listened to. He would not enter into the complaints, he would bring no charge against the Governor, except this, that he had made himself unpopular to the colonists, inasmuch as when the Duke of Newcastle had promised to the Colony a responsible Government he had expressed opinions unfavourable to the adoption of that course. In fact, so unpopular had he made himself, that in the course of the two years during which he held office no fewer than three delegations had been sent to this country to complain of his conduct. He would wish to submit to the noble Lord that the fact of the Governor of a colony opposing the wishes of the Home Government to concede to the colonies a system of responsible Government might unfit him for a continuance in office. He asked the noble Lord, in the second place, if it were the intention of the Government to remove the Governor, not entirely from the government of any colony, but to make an exchange from the Colony of Newfoundland to the Colony of New Brunswick, in which responsible Government had been introduced, and in which, therefore, the same difficulties would not arise. There was one reason which seemed to give great force to the representations of the Colonists. It was well known to the House that we had entered into a treaty with the United States with regard to the trade between the North American Colonies, and the United States; but the introduction of the provisions of that treaty depended on the Colonial Legislature. In Newfoundland there was at present a party who had an interest in monopoly, but the people of the Colony desired free trade. For the purpose of free trade they must have a local Government in accordance with the wishes of the people. The Governor had declared himself in opposition to their wishes. He (Mr. Roebuck), therefore, asked the noble Lord, with regard to the people of Newfoundland, not to go through the long agony that he went through with regard to the people of Canada. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would be wise in time; that they would not continue the dispute that had now existed between the people and their Governor of Newfoundland for years to come, and so at last, after twenty years' fighting between the people and the administration, the people should at length obtain that which they desired.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he willingly accepted the responsibility which his hon. and learned Friend said he ought to bear with respect to the Colonial Department, but he could not admit the reflection which his hon. and learned Friend had cast on the policy of his noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) who was not amusing himself at Vienna, nor neglecting any duty at home, but was performing abroad duties of the most important character, and which he had undertaken previous to his having accepted the seals of the Colonial Department. It was not likely, however, that he would long continue absent. With respect to the question put, it was the firm intention of Her Majesty's Government to keep faith in all respects with the people of Newfoundland in reference to the system of responsible government which had been promised them. Steps had been taken to carry that promise into execution. There was to be a reconstruction of the popular assembly—an enlargement of the numbers of that body. There was, it was true, a difference of opinion on the part of the people and the Governor as to the time when this reconstruction should take place, but the Governor was correct in law in the decision which he took to have the elections in the spring and not in the winter, for as regarded the objection that some of the voters would necessarily be absent in the spring, the same might be said of others in the winter, because many could not attend for physical causes. With respect to the Legislative Council to be constituted, an intimation had been given by the Governor that he postponed the nominations to the Council till after the elections, in order that the two assemblies should be in harmony. He did not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman was rightly informed as to the feelings and opinions of the Governor on the question of free trade, for he believed that the Governor had not the slightest indisposition to carry out the principles of free trade, but, on the contrary, was disposed to carry those principles out to their full extent. With regard to the last question, he felt convinced that the House would not expect him to state the intentions of the Government as to the removal, continuation in office, or exchange of Colonial Governors; all that he could say was, that it was the intention of the Government that the colony should enjoy all the advantages of that system of responsible government which had been promised to them by the Duke of Newcastle.

MR. BRIGHT said, the House would observe that there was a difference of opinion between the statement of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) and that of the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown. There was a gentleman in this country as a delegate from no less than two-thirds of the Assembly of Newfoundland, with regard to the conduct of the Governor; and the House, he thought, might take it that the statement of his hon. and learned Friend with regard to the Governor was true. The Governor (Mr. Baillie Hamilton) had been in office only two years, and during that time three deputations had visited this country to seek redress against his conduct. He (Mr. Bright) was not about to find fault with the noble Lord the Member for London, in that he did not happen to be present to perform the duties of his office. He agreed with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that the good he might do at Vienna would more than balance any harm he might do by his temporary absence from this country. But he was one of those who thought that gentlemen who came from the colonies to the Colonial Office ought to be treated in a different way. They had had within a few months at the head of that office the Duke of Newcastle, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Sir George Grey, and now Lord John Russell, so that when delegates came from the colonies there were so many changes in the Colonial Department that they did not know where to go to, or to whom to apply. In his opinion, the people of a colony, who found that representations made to the Home Government were, by such a state of things, rendered of little or no use, had good cause to wish to get rid of the Home Government altogether. Generally, the Governor of a colony was chosen in a peculiar manner. Often his best qualification was that he had a bad banking account, but had at the same time some claim upon a political party. The Government frequently found it extremely difficult to appoint a good man to a colonial governorship, and there was no reason why the Legislature of Newfoundland should not be allowed to appoint their own Governor. They would be enabled to appoint a better Governor than they had at present, at one-third of the salary, and he, therefore, recommended the Government to take into consideration the propriety of allowing, he would not say all, but many of the colonies to appoint their own Governors. He agreed in all that had been said by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield, and he thought it was the duty of the Government to remove from office the Governor of Newfoundland, who appeared to some extent to possess a disposition that prevented him from working harmoniously with the Legislature over which he presided.

MR. LOWE said, he hoped the turn which the debate had taken would justify him in saying a few words upon a subject of the most pressing importance, to which he begged to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. On the 31st of May in last year there arrived in this country the draught of a constitution for the great colony of Victoria. Since that time events had taken place there of the greatest importance and of the most lamentable character. In fact, something very like civil war had arisen in the colony, owing to serious differences between the gold-diggers and the Government. It was found expedient to send a large body of troops to the diggings at Ballarat. The diggers had entrenched themselves in a stockade. The troops had attacked them in regular martial array. Volleys of musketry had been exchanged for ten minutes between the diggers and the troops, the result of which was that several of the troops, including one officer, were killed, and at least thirty of the diggers were left dead upon the spot, and many others had since died of their wounds. This lamentable occurrence happened recently, and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman if they were to have a repetition of it, or were they to take measures for putting an end to a state of affairs which might lead to its repetition? The remedy must be applied by the Government immediately, without waiting for the termination of the Vienna Conference. The only measure that could prevent it was immediately to pass a Bill settling a constitution for the colony, and to send it out forthwith. The Government of the colony had fallen into contempt. The population at large sympathised with the diggers and held meetings to express their sympathy. In consequence of this state of things the secretary and other functionaries of the Government had withdrawn, and the colony was now almost at the mercy of the people. The only remedy that could be applied to this state of things, the only course which could prevent a recurrence of such struggles, and preserve the Queen's Government from being brought into contempt—was immediately to pass a measure to establish a new constitution for the colony, and to send it out without delay. He, therefore, desired to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would take into consideration the propriety of giving such a measure precedence over the other Bills for establishing Australian constitutions, in consideration of the greatness of the emergency and the danger that threatened the union of the mother country with the colony in question, and consequently with all our Australian colonies?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could not give a pledge to the House that the Bill referred to by the right hon. Gentleman would be considered separately. There were certain leading principles which it was desirable to consider in the first instance, but he hoped that no great time would elapse before the attention of the House would be called to all the measures about to be adopted in regard to the constitution of the colonies. When the Bill alluded to by the hon. Gentleman was brought to this country it was accompanied by a measure relating to the extension of the elective franchise, which the Governor hoped would be taken into consideration immediately and returned to the colony. A partial consideration had already been given to the subject to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention, but by law it was necessary that the Act in question should remain before the House for thirty days before effect could be given to it by Parliament. With regard to the disturbances which had recently taken place in the colony of Victoria, no doubt they had been of a very serious character, but they had only been of short duration. They arose in part from the refusal of many of the diggers, chiefly foreigners, to pay the license fees, and when the outbreak occurred prompt measures were taken to quell it. He regretted, however, to state that the disturbances were not put down without loss of life. He had every reason to believe that the colony was at present in a more satisfactory state.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, that these disturbances arose altogether from the want of good faith on the part of the Government in not giving a constitution at once. Within a few months from the present time the colony of Newfoundland had been assured in a despatch from the Duke of Newcastle that responsible government would be granted to them to the fullest possible extent. Although, however, there was not one of our North American colonies more interested than Newfoundland in the alliance which had recently been concluded between England and France, according to the latest accounts the Governor of that colony had never acquainted the House of Assembly with the message of Lord Clarendon communicating the fact that such an alliance had been established; and, although the Assembly had agreed upon a Loyal Address to Her Majesty, he believed it had never been transmitted to the Home Government. He thought, if the Government of this country were supporting the Governor of Newfoundland in a struggle with the colonists, they ought at least to provide for the payment of the Governor, but he found that the colony of Newfoundland was required to pay the Governor a sum equal to ten times the salary which was paid to the Governor of the State of Maine. He considered it most important that the Government of this country should do all in their power to promote the prosperity and to insure the loyalty and attachment of the North American colonies, and, although Newfoundland formed a comparatively small portion of those colonies, he thought it most essential to the safety to the British empire that the inhabitants of Newfoundland should not have any cause for such remonstrances as they had addressed to the Home Government.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was glad to hear the noble Lord's statement characterised by so much fairness to the Governor of Newfoundland, who had been made the subject of very harsh accusations by other speakers. He had no personal or private feeling with regard to Governor Hamilton; for though in the year 1852 he had recommended him to Her Majesty for the office, he had done so solely on account of the ability and success with which he had conducted a small government in the West Indies. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had charged him with misconduct and unpopularity, and the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) had referred to several deputations which had come to this country to complain of him. But nobody that had studied the history of Newfoundland for the last twenty-five years would be surprised at the unpopularity of the Governor; for the colony had unhappily been torn with parties, whose strife had been aggravated by religious dissensions. One of the charges against Governor Hamilton was, that he had opposed the introduction of responsible government. But he had only followed the course which all other Governors before him had previously taken. Sir Gaspard le Marchant, one of the ablest Colonial Governors this country had ever possessed, had done precisely the same; and Lord Grey had also refused the colony a responsible government. The Duke of Newcastle had, however, conceded it; and he (Sir J. Pakington) most sincerely hoped that it would succeed; but he must confess he had considerable doubts of it. When a colony took so strong a course as to request the Imperial Government to recall their Governor, they ought to be able to allege some very powerful reasons for it; but he must declare that he thought those which had been adduced on the present occasion were wholly insufficient. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) had disposed of the charge against Governor Hamilton of having delayed the appointment of the Legislative Council; and he (Sir J. Pakington) believed that to have appointed it earlier would have been a breach both of law and of justice. He hoped, therefore, that the public character of the Governor would not suffer on account of the unfounded charges which had been brought against him.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he must express a hope that Her Majesty's Government would give instructions to the governor of Newfoundland to afford the French fishermen on the banks of that island all the facilities that were extended to the subjects of the United States of America.

MR. F. SCULLY said, he thought great mistakes had been made with respect to the government of Newfoundland. The colonists had made frequent complaints upon the subject, and they had repeatedly sent over delegates to this country to demand an alteration in the constitution of the colony. It was, in his opinion, a very strong case which would justify the recall of a Governor, but in this instance he thought a strong case had been made out. In February last year the Duke of Newcastle sent a despatch, desiring the governor to call the Assembly together to pass the Constitution Bills, in order that they might be considered by Parliament; in the month of June they were passed by the House, but, being resisted by the Governor, were eventually thrown over, and the consequence was, that the House refused the Vote of Supply, which caused great inconvenience in the colony and much disarrangement of money affairs. Subsequently a despatch was sent out by the right hon. Baronet now at the head of the Home Office, after seeing delegates from the colony, directing the Governor to call the Assembly together again. He did so, and in November the Bill was passed; but, without any just ground, the Governor, before it had gone through the necessary stages, dissolved the Legislature, and, instead of proceeding at once to an election, when the voters, who were mostly fishermen, were disengaged, he postponed it to a period when they could not avail themselves of their privileges, thus inflicting great injustice upon them. He mentioned these facts as instances of misgovernment with regard to this colony, and he could not avoid expressing his regret that the Duke of Newcastle, who deserved great credit for his vigorous administration of the Colonial Department, had ever left it. He wished to point out the injustices done to the colony by so long withholding from it a responsible Government, which had for some years been granted even to the little dependency of Prince Edward Island, and he must complain that the consequences of deferring a constitution in Newfoundland had been most disastrous; that its revenue was rapidly declining, while its poor rates had during the last ten years increased from 1,000*l.* per annum to 12,000*l.* Another grievance was, that while the majority of the population were of the Roman Catholic faith, the offices were principally distributed among Protestants, for, while fifty-four officers of the Roman Catholic faith were placed in situations the aggregate remuneration of which amounted to 4000*l.* a year, 121 Protestants filled offices bringing to them 18,000*l.* annually. At the same time there was no religious acerbity in the colony, for in many instances Protestant constituencies returned Roman Catholic representatives, while Roman Catholic districts returned Protestants. He would conclude by expressing his belief that a continuance of such mismanagement would tend to alienate the feelings and affections of persons who had hitherto been most distinguished for their loyalty and devotion to the Crown and country.

Motion for the adjournment of the House till Thursday was then agreed to.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE (SANDHURST).

COLONEL NORTH said, he would now beg to move that the House should resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to Her Majesty with reference to the future management of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst—1st. That ten orphans, sons of officers of our army, navy, and marines, shall receive their education, board, and clothing free from expense to their friends. 2nd. That the number of cadets at Sandhurst, who are now admissible into the first class, be increased to fifty. 3rd. That departments in the civil branches of the public service shall be open to those cadets who may entitle themselves to them by their good conduct, and by having passed those examinations which may be required of them; those cadets who prefer the military service to receive commissions as at present upon passing the necessary examinations; and to assure her Majesty that this House will make good the expense of the same. If he had not considered his proposition to deeply affect the interest of the orphans of officers, he should not again have brought forward a Motion which had previously fallen to the ground, owing to an informality in the mode of proceeding. The establishment of the college was due to the zeal, talent, and untiring perseverance of the late General Le Marchant, who fell at the head of the heavy cavalry brigade at Salamanca in the year 1812; and its scheme had been approved by the late Duke of York. The first warrant establishing the college was dated the 27th May, 1808, and divided those who were to share in its benefits into three classes:—First, the sons of subaltern officers; secondly, the sons of officers; and thirdly, the sons of noblemen and gentleman, who were admitted as a matter of favour. But the intentions of its founders had been perverted, and the change which had taken place in the regulations practically shut the door against the entrance of any orphans of officers who had not held high rank in the army. Youths were now called on to pay 40*l.* a year; and as the means of the widows of such officers were unequal to such an outlay and accompanying expenses, the benefits of the college were denied to deserving persons. His object, then, was to restore the conditions and regulations of the college to their original form and scope, namely, that a certain number of young men should be educated thereat at the expense of the country.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I have much satisfaction in seconding the Motion now before the House; I consider it one founded on the strictest principles of justice and national gratitude and such as at this time is specially demanded. According to the present constitution of the sister services, only the more fortunate, the few who have resources of their own, can look to have their families independent of want. In the army especially, an officer in the purchase of a commission buys a poor annuity on his capital, he receives the interest on the money thus invested, his services to his country are in fact gratuitous. After his death the Government virtually confiscates his income, it appropriates his commission but does not reimburse his survivors. In the navy, promotion is seldom the reward of merit and actual service; too often it is the consequence of family connexion, influence and patronage. At this moment the College at Sandhurst is self-supporting; the country, to some extent, greatly to its discredit, suffers the maintenance of a national establishment at the expense of the widow and orphan. It may be said that the children of officers who have died in adverse circumstances are received at a small cost—what is that sum? 40*l.*—Let me remind hon. Members that pensions to widows of captains and subalterns are slightly beyond that sum, and to field officers under 90*l.* When the Duke of York presided over the foundation of Sandhurst, such boys were received free in board, clothes and education. Now the House is asked to sanction the admission of only ten orphans, the sons of officers in the army, navy and marines, gratuitously. With the recollection of the services rendered of late and acknowledged by this House, I cannot believe such an application will be refused, rather I should hope, will be deemed too insignificant, too unworthy. How would you animate the officer if you would assure him that a grateful country will be a parent to his child if he falls in her cause! The private soldier, the seaman and marine, knows that his boy shall be received at Greenwich or Chelsea and enabled to earn his livelihood; the poor subaltern, sinking down to die on the couch or battle-field, knows that now the agony of bereavement will be enhanced by lessened means in his humble home; that after all his sacrifices, his anxious thought by day and night, bereaved of their protector, he leaves his widow and children to the mercy of a hard world. Reverse this conviction, and show by your vote that England through you accepts his legacy, and whilst the Sovereign gives medals and honours to the survivors, the House never forgets those who have perilled and lost life in their country's cause.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions, "1. That ten Orphans, Sons of Officers of our Army, Navy, and Marines, shall receive their education, board, and clothing free from expense to their friends;

" 2. That the number of Cadets at Sandhurst, who are now admissible into the first class, be increased to fifty;

" 3. That Departments in the Civil Branches of the Public Service shall be open to those Cadets who may entitle themselves to them by their good conduct, and by having passed those examinations which may be required of them; those Cadets who prefer the Military Service to receive Commissions as at present upon passing the necessary examinations; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the same."

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, if the only question involved in the Resolutions of the hon. and gallant Member was whether or not such an appropriation might be made of the income of the Military College at Sandhurst as would secure for the orphan children of the officers of the army the means of receiving a gratuitous education there, he did not think there would be any difference of opinion on either side of the House with regard to the Motion. The present arrangements of the college did enable the sons of officers in the army to receive an education at Sandhurst at a very reduced cost, and he was sure it would be satisfactory if the advantages of this college could be extended and the objects of the hon. and gallant Gentleman accomplished. It appeared to him, however, that before the House agreed to Resolutions which would involve a grant of money, it should be clearly ascertained whether or no the object could not be attained by some other means. They ought, for example, to inquire whether the income of the college might not be so appropriated as to secure the object of the hon. and gallant Member without calling upon the public for any assistance of this sort. At present the college was self-supporting. The first class of students there comprised twenty-five cadets, who each paid 40*l.* a year, in return for which they were provided with an excellent education, boarded, and clothed; and, such was the anxiety to obtain admission into this class that, although the number of vacancies was not more than seven or eight annually, there were at this moment at least fifty applications for admission. The boys admitted into that class were children of captains and subalterns in the army. Then there was a second class, containing fifty cadets, who paid sums varying from 50*l.* to 80*l.* a year, the young men who were admitted into that class being the sons of field and general officers; and next came a third class, comprising 105 students, the sons of private gentlemen, who each paid 125*l.* a year. The income derived by the college from the contributions paid by the sons of private gentlemen was sufficient to enable it to educate the cadets in the first and second classes, the cost of whose education was not covered by their own contributions. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was to increase the number of the first class, paying 40*l.* a year, from twenty-five to fifty, and that there should be a class of orphan children who were to receive an entirely gratuitous education. This it was proposed to accomplish by calling upon Parliament to make good whatever deficiency might arise. But he wished to know, in the first instance, whether the income of the college could not be applied to the same purpose. Now, the income of the college averaged about 18,000*l.* or 19,000*l.* a year, and, with the exception of some 70*l.* derived from the rent of land, this sum was entirely drawn from the contributions of the different students. Some years ago the income of the college did not more than cover its expenditure, because, at that time, it was called upon to undertake the expense of repairing the buildings. Latterly, however, that charge had been thrown upon the Board of Works, and there was now an average surplus of income over expenditure to the amount of about 1,200*l.* a year, which was at present paid into the public Exchequer, and was carried to the credit of the country. Now, it would be a fair proposal to consider what scheme could be adopted by means of which this sum should be applied to the gratuitous education of officers' sons, or to the reception of a larger number of that class of students who paid a reduced contribution. When the Vote with respect to this college was before the Committee, objections had been taken to the expensive establishment maintained at Sandhurst. It certainly appeared that those expenses were considerable; and, although it would be impossible to touch the interests of existing incumbents, it would be a very fair engagement on the part of the Government to promise, when any vacancies occurred, that the propriety or not of filling up those vacancies for the future should be considered. But supposing they were to adopt the plan of these Resolutions, he doubted whether any collegiate institution ought to be made dependent on the liberality of Parliament, unless there was some assurance that Parliament would be likely to vote year by year the money which would be required to maintain it, because without some such assurance the usefulness of such an institution might be increased by a grant of public money this year, and next year the vote might be withdrawn. He would remind the House that not many years ago this college was supported by a Parliamentary grant. Twenty-five years since the House of Commons used annually to vote for its maintenance a sum of between 8,000*l.* and 10,000*l.*, which was systematically opposed by the late Mr. Hume, and was at last withdrawn and the college thrown upon its own resources, the consequence being that it was necessary to discontinue gratuitous education there. Seeing, therefore, that Parliament had taken this course, he could feel no confidence that at some future time they would not do the same if a public grant were now allowed. He would also express a doubt, looking at the terms of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's Motion, whether the public could fairly be called upon to provide free instruction for the sons of officers. The hon. and gallant Member did not confine his proposed gratuitous education to the orphans of officers killed in action; it was made applicable to the sons of officers generally. Now, in his opinion the sons of civil servants had as great a claim to be educated at the public expense. He thought that the object of the hon. and gallant Gentleman could be effected by means of the surplus which the Government then had, and he hoped that he would leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and not press his Motion to a division.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he was opposed to any such grant as was asked for by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel North). He quite concurred in the view taken by the hon. Under Secretary for War, believing that Sandhurst was able to maintain thrice the students now educated there. The grossest extravagance prevailed in that institution. No less than seventy-three officers, including professors, masters, servants, clerks, and others, were employed to take care of about 180 boys, at an expense of upwards of 13,000*l.* The boys paid for clothing, washing, &c. about 4,000*l.*, making in all near 18,000*l.* The governor had 1,000*l.* a year and forage for four horses; this alone would maintain double the number of cadets proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire. What need was there of such a governor? As he was a general of dragoons, he had his salary of 1,200 a year, independent of the college. Many such officers would only be too glad to go and live at Sandhurst, and enjoy the advantages of that situation, without any salary whatever. A great reduction might also be made in the other salaries.

MR. BRADY said, he objected to the governor receiving such large pay when the duties he had to perform were so slight. He could not understand why an allowance should be made to him for forage for his horses. He was astonished to hear the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the War Department speak of the moderate cost of education at Sandhurst when the annual expense of each pupil was 98*l.* 15*s.* He hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would press his motion to a division, for in his opinion there was in the management at Sandhurst a vast amount of jobbing and abuse.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, that although the question before the House was a very small one, it nevertheless involved a principle which he hoped would meet with its support, and that was, whether they were to go on according to the same jog-trot fashion as of old, or whether they would alter that plan to the very limited degree now proposed? The request made to them was, what were they prepared to do for the orphans of officers who fell in the service of their country? And let them remember that request was urged at a moment when those orphans were daily increasing. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary at War had called upon the hon. and gallant Member not to divide the House. He (Captain Scobell) hoped the House would divide, if it was only to prove whether or not they had regard for those who fell in the service of the country. They were told, indeed, that there was already a class to admit students at 40*l.* a year. He was ashamed, however, to hear such an argument urged; and it could only proceed from persons who had their thousands a year. Why, how could the poor widow pay 40*l.* a year, who perhaps had only a pension of 60*l.* a year to maintain a whole family. Let them, then, look at the question as practical men. He had not been long in Parliament; but this he would say, that he had never seen a grant withdrawn which was for a deserving object; and he could not help feeling that if Mr. Hume was still amongst them he would not at such a moment grudge the expense of giving a gratuitous education to the orphans of officers. He offered his most cordial thanks to the hon. and gallant

Member for having brought the Motion forward.

COLONEL DUNNH said, he only rose to say that he entirely concurred in the feeling of shame at hearing the argument used by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Peel). Instead of raising the character of the army, the speech of the Under Secretary at War tended to its degradation, and he trusted that the House, by its vote, would tend to show that it joined in that opinion. The college at Sandhurst, forsooth, had been styled a public establishment, while in truth and reality it was a mere private one, and it was so because the institution had to bear the expense of supplying rewards for long services to gallant officers, whom the niggardliness of their country either could not or would not otherwise provide for. It was a perfect disgrace that the college should be administered as it was, while there need be no concealment of the fact that the army was not in the slightest degree indebted to the country for the fact of its maintenance.

MR. RICH said, he must confess that he had never heard a more narrow view taken of a question than that urged by the hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Peel). The practical effect of the present system of management at Sandhurst was to deter altogether the sons of the gentry who enjoyed but small fortunes—and who invariably made the best officers in the army—from entrance to that institution. Its advantages, therefore, were exclusively confined to the children of the richer classes, and those of officers. For no one would pretend that the small gentry of the country could afford to pay 125 guineas annually for the education of their children. He would certainly vote for the Motion, and he hoped that there would be a complete investigation into the whole system pursued at Sandhurst.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the present discussion was in reality an instance of a remark made in reference to the House of Commons—namely, that it was apt to be exceedingly liberal at one moment, and very niggardly at another. For the establishment at Sandhurst was founded originally upon a much larger scale than that on which it now existed; and there was an annual vote of a considerable amount towards its maintenance. Well, his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Scobell) had said that if Mr. Hume was still with them he would now, at a time of war, not hesitate to support a vote of the public money for the gratuitous education of the sons of officers. [Captain SCOBELL said, he meant that Mr. Hume never grudged a proper payment for a proper object.] But he could say he remembered fighting many battles with Mr. Hume during a time of peace in reference to this establishment, when his lamented Friend was accustomed to urge upon Parliament, year after year, first, the reduction of the grant, and then its withdrawal altogether. It was contended then that the college ought to be self-supporting. Well, the House of Commons agreed with Mr. Hume, and all assistance from the public revenue was withdrawn from it, and the college was made self-supporting. Now, there was a certain degree of reason in this, because certain privileges were attached to education at Sandhurst; for young men who had gone through their course of studies there were entitled to commissions without purchase, and it was a very fair equivalent for this that they should contribute towards the expenses of the establishment during the period in which they pursued their studies at it. To the assertion, then, that it was not fair to compel young men to contribute towards the expenses of that establishment, his (Lord Palmerston's) answer was, that a great portion of the young men educated at the college, if they distinguished themselves in their examinations, received their commissions without any payment whatever. Now that he considered was a good reason why they should be called upon to contribute towards the expenses of the establishment in which they were instructed for the military service. His hon. Friend (Mr. Peel) stated that those contributions exceeded, in point of fact, the whole expenses of the institution; and it might be reasonable for the Government to consider whether, out of the surplus of the revenue, there might not be found some means of accomplishing the object which the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire had in view by his Motion. Surely, nothing could be fairer than to ask the House to suspend its decision upon the Resolution before it, while it was possible that the object of it might be accomplished without any contribution whatever from the public revenue. Now, with regard to the Resolutions before the House, one portion of them referred to the qualifications of young men educated in the college for the army, while another part goes to say that those young men were entitled to appointments in the civil service. Now that proposition seemed to him to be an extraordinary one. He could very well understand how young men who upon examination proved themselves well qualified should obtain commissions in the army gratuitously; but he should like to know by what arrangements the hon. and gallant Gentleman proposed to carry out his plan by which those young men should be appointed to situations in the civil service? What part of the civil service was thus to be disposed off? What qualifications were to be required for the civil service, different from those that were tested by the usual examinations in the college? A young man might be most competent for a commission in the army or navy, but not for employment in the civil service; at all events, that portion of the Resolution was one to which he thought the House would, under no circumstances, be disposed to agree. He put these facts to the House—namely, the institution originally was maintained upon a much larger scale than it at present was. It was subsequently reduced by the votes of that House; and it was now self-supporting and more. There were now funds belonging to the college which might be applied towards effecting a large amount of gratuitous instruction. Under all these circumstances Her Majesty's Government were not disposed to agree to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member.

COLONEL NORTH said, the noble Lord seemed to forget that the balance was paid into the Treasury. If the Government would bear the expenses of these ten orphans, and extend the first class by twenty-five, it was perfectly immaterial to him from what source the money was obtained. As to his proposition that these young men should be employed in the civil service, he could not see any objection to it. [Mr. F. PEEL: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War apparently objected to that part of the scheme, and perhaps thought the orphans of officers required no consideration. He thought otherwise, and as long as he had the power he was determined to fight their cause in that House. When pressing questions arose, on which votes in that House were required, situations in the civil service were obtained without difficulty, and why were the orphans of officers to be debarred from that service? The instruction at Sandhurst fitted a man for anything, no matter what it might be. If a young man showed proficiency in languages let him be employed in the War Office, and if another possessed other qualifications, let him enter those departments where his requirements would be of service. The Government seemed to feel no sympathy for the families of officers who fell in the field, or under the influence of unhealthy climates to which they were exposed. But he would take the liberty of reading a beautiful expression of sympathy on the part of Her Majesty. After the battle of Inkermann Her Majesty wrote thus:—

"Proud of the victory won by Her brave army—grateful to those who wear the laurels of this great conflict—the Queen is painfully affected by the heavy loss which has been incurred, and deeply sensible of what is owing to the dead. Those illustrious men cannot, indeed, receive the thanks of their Sovereigns, which have so often cheered the soldier in his severest trials, but their blood has not been shed in vain. Laid low in their grave of victory, their names will be cherished for ever by a grateful country, and posterity will look upon the list of officers who have fallen as a proof of the ardent courage and zeal with which they pointed out the path of honour to no less willing followers."

He would certainly divide the House, and let the army see who did and who did not appreciate their gallant deeds.

MR. WATSON said, he would suggest that it would be most desirable that an inquiry upon the subject should take place before a Select Committee, and if the noble Lord at the head of the Government would not consent to such inquiry, he (Mr. Watson) would certainly vote with the hon. and gallant Member opposite. He was an old cadet; his father died in the service of his country, and he was left an orphan in the establishment at Sandhurst. His education was good, and he there learned the principles of honour under the gallant old soldier who had gained his victorious laurels upon the fields of Salamanca. He, however, considered that it was a disgrace to the country that they had not a proper establishment for the orphans of officers. Those who had spent their lives in the service of their country had a right to expect that their families would be received and protected in an adequate asylum. We had brave and noble officers, but the education of the staff officers was lamentably deficient. Because he had a respect for the establishment in question, and a warm heart towards the army, he felt indignant at the scandalous system by which nepotism and patronage monopolised those places which merit alone should possess.

He hoped that the noble Lord would assent to the appointment of a Committee.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : I have not the slightest objection to such a proposition—so far from it, I think it both reasonable and advantageous that the whole arrangements of the institution should be inquired into; and I myself shall have no objection to make that Motion.

COLONEL KNOX said, he must express a hope that, under such circumstances, his hon. and gallant Friend would withdraw his Motion. He would request of his hon. and gallant Friend to accept the offer of the noble Lord.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would accept the offer of the noble Lord for a Committee of inquiry, and would not divide the House upon his Motion.

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND).

SIR DENHAM NORREYS rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to relieve Grand Juries in Ireland from fiscal duties, and to place the administration of local affairs in elected councils. As he understood that it was the intention of hon. Gentlemen opposite to take the unusual course of dividing against the Motion, he should be compelled to enter upon some explanation relative to the general spirit of the grand-jury system in Ireland—a system which afforded a curious illustration of the opposite views which might be taken of the same object by opposite parties in the same country;—for while the grand-jury system was described by some as an institution disgraceful to a free country, demoralising in its working, beneficial to the few and oppressive to the many—on the other hand it was represented by the opposite party as a venerable institution, beneficial in its effects, and loved by the people. He wished the House to be guided by neither of these statements, but to listen to him while he described the general system and working of the grand-jury laws, and then to say whether such a system ought to be allowed to continue in any civilised country.

Under the grand-jury system in Ireland all their public roads and works were made and maintained; it built and regulated all their court-houses and county establishments; it provided the funds for the payment of prosecutions and witnesses; their gaols and bridewells were constructed and regulated by them; and they had, at least, the power of checking all such expenditure:—they had, moreover, considerable power in respect of a portion of the medical charities. It appeared by the Report of the Devon Commission, that the amount of taxation levied by the grand juries for these purposes amounted on the average to more than 1,100,000*l.* yearly. This large sum was levied upon the holders of land. Hon. Members were aware that in Ireland every man contributed to the poor-rates who was rated at 4*l.*—or in some cities at 8*l.*—and it appeared from the poor-law returns, that there were, in 1843, 564,144 persons who were rated at and under 6*l.*, and 401,291 who were rated above that sum—in all, very nearly 1,000,000 persons who were liable to be taxed by the grand juries to the expenses he had before alluded to. Now, by whom was the amount and destination of this large sum determined on?—by those who pay? Not at all. By the gentry or the magistracy? No Peer could sit upon the grand jury—though his agent could, and thereby it frequently happened that a gentleman totally unconnected with the county might be put upon the grand jury—the ratepayers had no right to interfere; and as for the gentry and magistracy, except they happened to be selected by the sheriff, they had no right to take any part in the management of this local expenditure. The grand jury were thus constituted—the high sheriff for the time being selected twenty-three gentlemen of each county, and in these vested the whole power of local taxation—and the ratepayers of the county had no right and no power to interfere with this selection. It must not be supposed that the sheriff was obliged to select the largest ratepayers, or, indeed, any ratepayers at all—or that he took the men most popular with the ratepayers; so far is this from being a recommendation that any man who had been elected to that House on popular influence was nearly certain to be rejected. In some counties rank was the leading motive, and the sheriff who should omit certain persons from his list would be certain to give offence: in other counties the choice rested on mere caprice. There was but one restriction imposed by law upon the sheriff, and that was that from each barony there must be one 50*l.* freeholder—who that one should be was left entirely to himself; and as there were, on an average, ten baronies in each county, ten of the twenty-three grand jurymen were selected under this restriction—the rest were left entirely to his caprice. Was it likely that such a system would be either popular or satisfactory? The sheriff, moreover, held office for only one year; he could not, therefore, do justice by selecting the gentlemen of the county in turn—he generally took a few personal friends, and for the rest he had recourse to the names of those gentlemen who had usually appeared on the grand-jury lists. Was a system which placed the taxation of the county, and the granting or refusal of its public works, in a body so constituted, likely to be popular? Was it in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, which boast that no man shall be taxed without the consent of his representative? But it might be said that the matters submitted to the grand jury must have been previously brought before the ratepayers at the sessions. But this was a mere mockery—for how did the House suppose that the members of the sessions were chosen? At each assizes a list of the highest ratepayers was put before the grand jury, who selected from twelve to twenty-four persons to be associated with the magistracy. Thus all that connects the public expenditure in Ireland with the ratepayers, was a body selected by the grand jury themselves; and in practice the selection of the ratepayers for each barony was left to the grand jurymen who was connected with the barony, who, of course, selected those persons who agreed with his own views. The crowning absurdity was, that the grand jury selected double the number wanted, and when the sessions came, if the whole twenty-four should attend, as only one half of the entire number can serve, their numbers were reduced by ballot—though nobody did attend unless canvassed to carry some job; and, finally, as if to take away all responsibility, all check and all interest in the county affairs, those who attend one session must be struck off the next list. The sessions thus composed of magistrates, and of ratepayers thus chosen, have only the power of deciding whether the work shall or shall not be submitted to the grand jury, they frequently knew nothing of the matter on which they were called to decide, they felt that the real decision did not rest with them, and that power merely of rejection placed them in an inferior and little creditable position—and the magistrates took very little interest except they have some personal interest to serve. Such was the Irish grand-jury system. There is no responsibility, and none of that moral feeling which resulted from responsibility. The grand juror and the ratepayer at sessions are alike ephemeral, they exist but for the day; they are not responsible for the results of their acts—they are not under the control of public opinion, for before it can be expressed they have ceased to exist. How could such a system be popular? He did not go into particular cases of abuse—he attacked only the principle—hon. Gentlemen around him, no doubt, did all they could to carry on the business of their counties honourably and well. But they deceived themselves; their influence enabled them to get what they wanted themselves, and to reject what they disapproved of, and they thought everything went on right. But the mass of the people thought otherwise—they saw nothing in the system but what worked well for the few and the wealthy, but which utterly ignored the interests of the great body of the ratepayers. The grand jury, then, was an irresponsible body; and an ephemeral body; it had no continuity of thought or action, and what was rejected by one grand jury as worthless might be carried by the next. It was totally irresponsible for the results of its acts, and acted therefore without conscience; it had no connection with the wants and wishes of the ratepayers; it was ignorant of the subjects on which it had to decide, and was led by those directly interested; it was a demoralising system, destructive of public opinion and public honesty, and compelled every man to resort to influence and combination; and it was utterly at variance with the spirit of our institutions, and was calculated to destroy all respect for them.

This was the system under which one-half of the local taxation of Ireland was administered. Compare it with the other half. The grand-jury rates were about 1,000,000*l.*, the poor rates amounted to about the same sum. The grand-jury rates were levied on the barony, which is composed of parishes and manors, which again are subdivided into townlands or ploughlands. The framers of the poor law found the baronies to be so unequal in size, so irregular in form, and so inconvenient—the portions so little connected in interest with the rest, and the chief places so ill situated, that they determined to discard them, and to form an entirely new territorial organisation. They took as many of the chief towns as they required, and made them centres, placing the workhouses there; they surrounded them as nearly as the physical features of the country, as identity of interests and consideration of property would admit, with combinations of townlands, forming them into electoral districts. The electoral district elected one or more guardians according to its size, property, and value, and these guardians with an equal number of magistrates formed the Union Board. It was not necessary to defend now the introduction of the magistrates; but as he proposed also to adopt the same principle, he might say that as the poor rates were paid by the non-occupying landlord as well as by the occupying tenant, he held it to be right that property, as distinguished from occupation, should be represented. Here, then, we have the occupier electing their representatives, and the intelligence and education of the country represented by the magistracy. This system was entirely new among us. Opposing and repulsive elements have been brought together, and men trained under the grand-jury system to believe that favouritism and the total abstinenace of all public considerations where the interest of a friend was involved was a simple duty, have had to conduct a system which was open to every system of malpractice. The landlords, who thought that their tenants were bound to be their followers, and that as the land was theirs those who occupied it were theirs also, were brought into contact in the board-room. No doubt, at first, collisions and jobs occurred; but what had been the result? All classes were now acting well together, business is well transacted, personal interests are not allowed to interfere, but above all a public spirit has been created, which was unknown before. He believed that this half of our local taxation was as honestly and as well administered as its authors could have anticipated—nay, he thought it did honour to the Irish character; they had been allowed to govern themselves; and they had done so well that the Government proposes, even to a greater extent than he approved of, to take away all restraint from the board of guardians, and to give up their power of supervision. We have only been eighteen years in existence as guardians, yet we can manage our own affairs, and can be trusted.

Such were the two systems under which the local affairs of Ireland were managed in nearly equal proportions. Under the one the taxation was carried on through an irresponsible body, totally unconnected with the body of the rate-payers and ephemeral; under the other they had responsibility to the ratepayers by representation; on the one side, we find their own affairs not managed by the ratepayers; on the other, we find the ratepayers managing their own affairs—generally with much prudence and good sense.

All he proposed was, that the system which was in operation in respect of poor-law affairs should be extended to the other half of the local taxation of Ireland.

Mr. Wyse, Mr. Smith O'Brien, Sir R. Musgrave, and others, had long since proposed county boards: there was nothing new in his proposition. If they failed, and if he (Sir Denham Norreys) hoped to succeed, it was not from any superior merit of his plan, but that he took advantage of an organisation which did not exist in their days.

The fact was, we have hitherto distrusted our countrymen, and have thought them unfit for self-government. It had been tried, and they were found quite capable of doing so. What was more calculated to elevate the character of our countrymen than to place in their hands all the powers of self-government which were not inconsistent with the general interests? What is so calculated to make a man throw aside the consideration of selfish and personal interests and views as the feeling that he is acting for the community—which would reward him with its approbation if he acted well, or disgrace him by rejection at a future election, if he was found incapable or dishonest? If they could not make men really honest, at least they could make them assume its semblance; and no society was so degraded, but that honesty and integrity were appreciated. They might be sure that the same desire to be well thought of by their country which actuated hon. Members in this House, also acted on the humble guardian, and that it would act on his class more largely in proportion as they the more entrusted to them the management of all their affairs.

He proposed to entrust to his countrymen the power of managing all their own affairs. Nay, he went further, and would propose to entrust them with far greater powers, with much larger discretion, than had been hitherto entrusted to grand juries. This might startle those who have no confidence in their countrymen.

The people of this country have begun to feel that they might learn from foreign nations. Unhappily we have had a severe lesson in the Crimea as to war—so, in questions of peace, they were, on the subject of education, copying not only from America, but even from Austria. He would tell them how local affairs are managed on the Continent.

The system of dividing the country into small districts called communes, and giving them the power of electing their own council of management, subject to the control of superior councils also elective, was one of the greatest and most lasting results of the French Revolution. He would not speak of it as it exists in France, first, because they would not feel much inclined to follow the example of France in respect of its civil institutions; and, secondly, because he had had less opportunity of studying it—besides the present Emperor proposed to change its organisation, and assume more power over the communes.

But the House would probably allow him, as it was so connected with his plan, to refer to the communal system as it now existed in Belgium—it a country where the people were as free, as industrious, as steady in character, as moral, as intelligent, as in their own or in any other country in the world. He could do so with the more confidence, as Belgium, since the establishment of communes, had passed through many political vicissitudes; but then each change had been for the political amelioration of the people. The communal system had also been altered from time to time. He did not consider it perfect, but at least it had received such gradual amendments as the representatives of a free people had thought it prudent to make in it. He did not, therefore, hesitate to avow that he had borrowed as much from the Belgian communal system as he thought could be engrafted on the Irish poor-law organisation. Belgium was about the third part of the size of Ireland, and had not more than half its population. It was divided into nine provinces, each of which had its elected conseil, and into about 2,500 communes, each also having its council elected by the ratepayers. The provincial council was elected for four years, one-half going out every two; the communal council for six years, one-half going out every three years. The governor of the province was selected and paid by the Government. The council elected a permanent body called the "deputation permanente," which he might call its Executive Committee. The members of this Committee receive small salaries, one-half of which depends on the regularity of their attendance. The members of the council receive a small allowance for their reasonable expenses, and for the cost of travelling to and from the place of meeting. The number in the provincial council varies from thirty-four in Luxembourg to seventy-six in East Flanders, and there are in all 461. The number of councillors to each commune varies, according to population, from seven to thirty-one. Each commune has its burgomaster and two or four echevins. The burgomaster and echevins form the Executive Committee of each commune; the burgomaster and echevins are nominated by the Crown. This would at first view seem to be a faulty arrangement, but it would be unwise for a stranger to offer a decided opinion against its propriety. Perhaps its justification may be this; the communes have much power not only in respect of the administration of the law generally, but also in respect of general taxation, and the administration of hospitals, schools, the general militia, the maintenance of the churches, and so forth. The selection of the burgomaster and echevins by the Crown, is the representation in each commune of the general Government. Now these are great powers. He would give the House an idea of the classes by whom they were administered. There were 1,305 communes, with a population of 1,000 and under.—Nay, out of 2,524 communes, 2,250 have populations of only 3,000 and under; in fact, however small a commune may be, it finds seven persons within it who are competent to act as councillors—if its population amounts to 3,000, it has nine councillors, and so on to thirty-one.

There are nearly 21,000 persons who act as councillors—and so well do they act that the system is one of the most valued institutions of Belgian institutions—so well does it act that Holland has within a few years adopted the Belgian system; but he could not speak of this. He would not detain the House with the powers of their councils. They had generally the complete management of all the local affairs, subject to the supervision of the State; they are intrusted with most of the powers which poor-law boards, grand juries, ecclesiastical commissions, national education commissions, and municipal councils enjoy in Ireland. When, in Belgium, such powers are entrusted to the smallest communes, and that men are found everywhere who honestly execute them, why should he doubt that in the far larger districts which he proposed to form in Ireland, we should find men able and willing to manage their own affairs?

He had, he trusted, established that the grand-jury system was bad; that there existed in Ireland an organisation for the management of local matters which acted well; that the organisation which worked well might be transferred to that which worked ill; and that in a country smaller—certainly not wealthier than Ireland—the system of self-government worked well, and therefore might be copied.

He would now proceed to show how he proposed to make the change. He proposed that the Lord Lieutenant should have power to divide Ireland into districts, formed of electoral divisions, and as nearly the same as the present poor-law unions as possible; into counties which would be the same as the present counties, with such alterations of outlying portions as he might consider requisite. Each electoral division would elect one or more wardens. These wardens, together with the magistrates, would form the board or council of the district. There would then be two councils or boards in each union—the poor-law board and the new district council. Their districts would not in all cases be the same, but as nearly so as the retention of the old county boundary would admit; but, hereafter, he had no doubt that one council will suffice to administer all the affairs of the district.

In reference to the county, he proposed that the several district councils within a county should each select a deputy—one or more—who, together with an equal number selected by the magistrates of the county, should form the council of the county. He did not propose that either the district council or the magistrates should be confined to select from their own bodies; but that they should be at liberty to select the best men. There will thus be two classes of councils in the county. To the district council he assigned the care of existing roads and the formation of new ones, and also the levy and appointment of all rates required for the purposes hereafter described. To the county council he assigned all those powers and duties of grand juries, in which general interests, or works of a more permanent and expensive character, were involved; all county establishments, all expenses connected with the administration of justice, bridges and public buildings, piers, and harbours; also such roads as the council should determine to be of county importance.

Although the county council would be a superior council, and, on appeal, have power to coerce the district council, yet the district council would be, to a great extent, independent; e. g. at present a work proposed was approved by the sessions and brought before the grand jury; the grand jury knew nothing about it, passed or rejected it on the advice of one or two grand jurymen. Instead of this, application would be made to the district council in sufficient time to allow a general consideration by the engineer, and every councillor would have had notice of it. It would be brought before the first council.

The first council would simply approve or disapprove. If approved, it would be referred to the engineer and executive committee. The former would check the plans and examine the proposal; the executive committee would ascertain its cost and obtain contracts for it. The proposition brought before the council at its next meeting would have been well considered, and its full cost would be known by the court; it would then be granted or rejected. If granted, there would be a power of appeal to the county council, by a given portion of the council, by any electoral division at its own risk, or by any individual aggrieved, also at his own risk.

As the district council will thus be the representative of the wishes and feelings of the district, he proposed to give it considerable powers. In respect of these powers he would very nearly adopt the Belgian words, "le conseil règle tout ce qui est d'intérêt communal." The district council will determine on all subjects connected with the interests of the district, subject to appeal to the county council, or, in respect of general interests, to the Lord Lieutenant in Council.

Every portion of the district will have its warden to protect its interests. In addition to this he would make the engineer of the district also responsible to the public. That is to say, if he neglects to bring the state of the roads of any portion of the district under consideration of council, he may be sued for neglect of duty; and if the council neglects its duties, the county council may interfere.

Each council will meet four times in the year. Each will elect a chief officer, called in the county, chairman of the county in the district chairman of the dis-

strict. Each council would also elect an executive committee, with considerable powers. Each council may depute, by special minute to its executive committee, to act in the name of the council. As the chairmen and executive committees will have heavy duties, he proposed that their necessary expenses should be paid by the county, or the district, as the case may be.

He would not fatigue the House by going further into the details of his proposed measure; for, as the efficiency of the plan depended entirely upon those details, it would be better to let the House judge of them in their printed form. He would therefore now move for leave to bring in a Bill.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART, in seconding the Motion, said, that the Bill of his hon. Friend sought to promote self-government in Ireland. The principle had been tried with success in England under the Municipal Corporations Act, and he saw no reason why it should not be followed by the same beneficial results in Ireland. The poor ratepayers in Ireland exercised care and caution in the selection of the board of guardians because they had an interest in keeping down the rate, and the same principle should be applied to the grand-jury system.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to relieve Grand Juries from Fiscal Duties, and to place the Administration of Local Affairs in Ireland in Elected Councils."

MR. MACARTNEY said, that he did not think it would be for the benefit of the country that so important a subject should be taken up by a private Member. There were a great many Members who thought that the grand-jury system of Ireland required amendment; but the Bill for that purpose ought to be introduced on the responsibility of Government. He begged, therefore, to move a negative to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mallow.

MR. FRENCH said, he fully concurred in the opinion that it was exceedingly inappropriate for any private Member to attempt to deal with the extensive and difficult legislation necessary to carry out the objects of the Bill. The grand-jury system in Ireland had often been represented as a nest of jobbing from which no benefit whatever was derived. He thought that was a most unfair representation. The grand-jury system was doubtless susceptible of improvement, but no one could deny that it was a cheap, safe, and expeditious system. They should not change a system which had been established for over 100 years for the mere sake of change. The grand-jury system was a representative and open system, and the works which it sanctioned must be approved of by the county surveyor. Under such circumstances, the grand jury were not likely to pass a work which was not necessary. But beforehand the cesspayers must in the first instance have sanctioned it, and, after all this, there was an appeal to the Judge of Assize. As an instance of the great superiority of the system pursued in Ireland, he would refer to the cost of the public roads. They kept in repair 40,000 miles of road in Ireland, at a cost of 327,000*l.*, according to the last Report. In England, 26,000 miles of road were mortgaged to the extent of 9,000,000*l.* He would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, which showed a great deal of research, but he did not think that his hon. Friend had made out a sufficient case for the abolition of the present system.

MR. M'MAHON said, the county cess, amounting to near 1,000,000 of money, was paid nine-tenths by occupying tenants, who had no voice in the assessment or in the apportionment of that sum. In fact it was assessment by one class, and payment by another. His (Mr. M'Mahon's) impression was, that Ireland would never be right or prosperous until it was approximated, in point of local government, to England. The grand jury jobbing in Ireland was at the base of all the other jobbery which caused the misery and the misfortunes of that country. He thought much good would result from the measure.

MR. HORSMAN said, as he understood the hon. Member for Mallow, he did not ask the House to do away with the grand-jury system altogether, but to put it on a better footing. The grand jury were selected by the sheriff, who was an annual officer. The control of the expenditure of a vast sum of money was therefore in the hands of the sheriff, who was elected for the year, and the grand juries who were selected only for the assizes. The counties in Ireland complained that the money advanced by the Government was expended without their having any control. That was an argument in favour of the Bill of his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend proposed that there should be a direct responsibility instead of the present system of irresponsibility, and that was so reasonable a principle that the Government would not oppose the introduction of the Bill. It was admitted by all that the present system was defective and required amendment, and no one who heard the speech of his hon. Friend could deny that he was competent to deal with it. Of course he did not pledge himself to the details of the Bill, of which they could not properly judge till the Bill was before them.

Leave given, Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Denham Norreys, Mr. Pollard-Urquhart and Mr. Fagan.

BRITISH MUSEUM, &c.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY, in moving the following Resolution—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it would promote the moral and intellectual improvement of the Working Classes of this Metropolis if the collections of Natural History and of Art, in the British Museum and the National Gallery, were open to the public inspection after Morning Service on Sundays."

observed, that the Motion was on the table of the House, during the greater part of the last Session, in the name of His late lamented friend the then Member for Montrose, but who was unable to find an open day for its discussion: he felt it to be his duty to bring forward the Motion as an eminently practical one, and one which he had promised his friend Mr. Hume to support. It was not intended to advance any speculative opinions, to interfere with the observance of the Sabbath, or militate against religious feelings in any way, but was introduced at the earnest request of numerous bodies of workmen in the metropolis and young men in offices, who, in the petitions which they had presented to the House, had stated that it would be of great benefit that the British Museum and National Gallery should be thrown open upon Sundays after divine service. They looked upon those collections as public property, and thought they ought to be thrown open to the great bulk of the community on those days upon which alone they had leisure to examine them. No one could deny that it was most desirable that the working classes should be furnished with abundant means of recreation and improvement, in which their wives and their families might freely participate. Nothing could have a more humanising tendency, be better calculated to draw closer the ties of mutual affection, or more effectually lessen those degrading and brutal scenes of which our police reports gave such ample evidence. In these galleries

they would find objects of interest to wean them from other and less desirable pursuits: it might be from vice to virtue. The study of the works of creation would lead their minds to the love and veneration of the Creator, and, therefore, he thought that throwing open such exhibitions as the British Museum, so far from injuring the morals and bringing religion into disrespect, would raise the people in the scale of human beings, render them thoughtful and observant, and, by leading them to the contemplation of the wonderful power, skill, and adaptation shown in the works of the Creator, would tend to the improvement of their moral and religious condition. Those most interested and most anxious for the success of the Motion, declared they were actuated by no spirit of irreligion, no contempt for established forms of worship, or the sacred expression of private devotion, but by the firm belief that the proper study and contemplation of the creations of nature and works of Art, powerfully enlarge the mind, and open it to a true perception of the Deity. Apart from the religious consideration of the question, there were many reasons why we should give to the workman the means of improving his knowledge, his science, or his taste. Why, he asked, were the ornamental productions of other countries so sought after in England but from the fact that the workman of the Continent, having more opportunities of improving his taste by the contemplation of the public collections, was able to produce designs of a more elegant character than our own workmen, with whom the struggle of life was so incessant that no other day but Sunday afforded them the least leisure to improve themselves. He admitted that considerable diversity of opinion might exist upon the religious view of the question, still he assured the House that it was from no indifference to religion, but because he believed it would promote the welfare and lead to the regeneration of the large class whose cause he was advocating that he had brought forward the Motion. He would venture to urge upon those who enforced upon others the pharisaical observance of the Sabbath the divine doctrine of Him who taught that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. He was persuaded that great numbers of those who upon Sundays pursued a course of vice and dissipation might be saved from such degradation if fitting opportunities were afforded them. The proposal which he made involved in a very slight degree the attendance of the officials upon the Sabbath. A few police officers would be ample for the purpose, and not one individual would be deterred from attending divine service. Having quoted the opinion of Dr. Gray in 1841 in favour of this view, he reminded the House that the Committee of last Session upon public-house licences had urged the opening of these nurseries of science as calculated in a great degree to mitigate the evils of immorality, intemperance, and crime; and he contended that the throwing open of Kew Gardens, Hampton Court Palace, and the Painted Hall at Greenwich afforded evidence of the wisdom of that. He contended that such a recommendation, deliberately reported to the House, should not be lightly regarded, especially when they remembered the highly intelligent and practical character of the men who sat on that Committee, and agreed to that report. Many good, and wise, and pious ministers of the Gospel had declared their opinion that, so far from desecrating the Sabbath, such a measure as he proposed would hallow that day; and many most eminent living Statesmen, of all views of polities, had recorded their opinions in favour of innocent recreation upon the Sabbath. He had supplied himself with a great number of authorities upon this branch of the case, but he would only trouble the House with a few brief extracts. That excellent man Dr. Arnold, in reference to railway travelling on the Sunday, which some regard as desecration, said—

"That it should be a day of greater leisure than other days, and of the suspension, so far as may be, of the common business of life, I quite allow; but then, I believe that I should have much greater indulgence for recreation on a Sunday than you might have; and if the railway enables the people in the great towns to get out into the country on the Sunday, I should think it a very great good."

A great authority on this subject, the Rev. Mr. Holden, says—

"No express permission is found in the law of Moses, but that they were at least allowable, to a certain extent, may be inferred from several considerations; as a total abstinence from all amusement would render it a day of gloom and sadness, productive of melancholy rather than of religious comfort, no such enactment, it may be presumed, would be promulgated by a benevolent Deity."

Again, he says—

"Many writers and preachers condemn without restriction, all secular pleasures on this sacred day: but, that amusements are, to a certain extent, permitted, is implied in the sabbatical command; for the injunction to remit the accustomed toils of life, not only is, but must have been intended to be a source of delight, and it is in perfect harmony with this design, to allot some portion of the day to proper recreation and refreshment."

That astute and learned man, one of the truly enlightened dignitaries of the Church, Archbishop Whately, says—

"There are two volumes, as it were, both by the same divine Author, spread out before us for our instruction and benefit, from each of which we may learn something of his dealings, so as to apply what we learn to our own practical advantage. One of these may be called the book of Nature, the system of the Created Universe; the other, the Record of Inspiration."

And, elsewhere, the same distinguished divine and scholar, says—

"Other things being equal, you will find that those who have had the best general mental training are the best prepared for a correct and profitable reception of religious instruction, and that those who have been taught little or nothing beside what are called the general principles of religion and morality, not only do not embrace those principles so well as those of more cultivated understanding, but will be 'still more deficient in the right application of such principles.'

He would only trouble the House with one more, although he might well read such evidence as he believed likely to carry conviction to those who would fairly reason on the question. The Rev. John Griffith, vicar of Aberdaire, in addressing his own flock on the general question, said—

"I have spoken my mind honestly on the subject; I think it is time the clergy should speak; I will yield to none, in doing all and everything to keep holy the Sabbath-day, and I am quite sure my parishioners will bear me witness in this; but there is a vast difference between keeping this day holy, and that rigid Sabbatarianism which has nigh threatened more than once to bring back the vapid emptiness of the days of the Roundheads: the question is not one of desecration of the Sabbath, but the enlightening, the recreation, the rest, and the elevation of the working man. Lord Derby has done a noble act, and I trust he will be supported therein. I fear nothing for continental desecration, I fear nothing for religion or the Church; open people's minds, and let us, the Clergy, pray God to open ours as well, and the City that is set on a hill can never be hid."

It might have been observed that in some of the petitions which had been presented it was forcibly remarked, that a constant familiarity with beautiful forms was one of the readiest means of acquiring all that was graceful and most applicable to art, since it was through the eye that the perceptive and moral faculties were the most easily reached. Doubtless there were Gentlemen in that House who would bear witness to the moral and religious influence which had been produced upon the minds of many who had flocked to witness the glories of the late Crystal Palace. Among them were men, who, sullen from suffering, were so ignorant as to confound order with oppression, and wealth with injustice; but yet those men, whose minds religious teaching had never softened, were subdued at the grandeur of the sights which they there beheld, and, for the first time, they learnt to reverence genius, intellect, and property. This question was one of high and growing importance, and whether the present Motion succeeded or was rejected he had no doubt of its ultimate success. He asked the House, however, fairly to consider this question, and to decide in favour of a course which he believed would promote the moral, the intellectual, and the religious character of the people.

MR. BIGGS seconded the Motion. He considered that the course advocated by his hon. Friend was one which would tend to raise the condition, moral as well as physical, of the lower classes of this country, and ultimately to benefit them in a religious view. Notwithstanding this he was well aware that the chief opposition to the Resolution would be based on religious grounds. The House would doubtless be told that the course proposed would lead to a desecration of the Sabbath. But this statement assumed that the Sabbath of the Christians was like that of the Jews. That was entirely a false idea. He would remind the House that upon the Continent, Sunday was observed in a far different manner to what it was here, and even in this country its observance was very different from what it had been. In Catholic times it had been a day of rational devotion and amusement. But unfortunately for us in this respect the Scottish feeling had penetrated here, bringing in its train religious fanaticism. He did not deny but that in other respects we had received advantages from Scotland. With reference to the question as to the manner in which the Sabbath should be observed, he would quote the opinion of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby. That rev. gentleman said, upon being asked whether he objected to Sunday travelling, that it was a question of degree, and that he for one would never use his influence to put a stop to all railway trains upon a Sunday, although upon many accounts he should wish to see their number diminished upon that day. For the satisfaction of his Scotch friends he might mention that Mr. George Coombe gave a similar opinion upon the question. After a most careful perusal of the Scriptures, he found with pain and regret that there was no written Christian injunction or command to keep the first day of the week as a Jewish Sabbath at all. All their Beer Acts and other similar legislation were founded on the fallacious idea that there was some such written injunction. But he would surprise the House still more. There was no written Christian injunction or command to keep sacred the first day of the week at all. There was the same reason for keeping Wednesday or Thursday as a Jewish Sabbath as Sunday. The only rule for observing the first day of the week as a Sabbath was the universal custom of the Church for 1,800 years, and the custom had been to devote the morning to worship and the afternoon to recreation or even amusement. This observance was founded on a knowledge of human nature. To that statement he defied contradiction. He was stating that fact in a spirit of seriousness and as the result of his own inquiry into the subject, and as it was necessary to come to close quarters, he would again state that the obligation upon Protestants to keep holy the first day of the week rested entirely upon the universal custom of the Christian Church. He did not wish to be understood as in any way undervaluing the Sabbath; so far from doing so, he thought that if it were even a human institution it was founded upon sound and wise principles, but at the same time he did not consider that that day was set apart for gloom and fanaticism, but rather for devotion and enjoyment. The Roman Catholic Church in respect to the Sabbath acted upon a much better judgment of human nature; for, in his opinion, millions of the working people of this country were repelled from the Protestant Church by the ill-judged asperity it displayed with regard to the observance of that day. It was not right, nor was it, he believed, in accordance with Holy Writ to deprive the working man of rational means of enjoyment and instruction on the only day of the week which was at his own disposal. He hoped that he should not be answered by vulgar declamation, but that the House would approach this subject with the desire of doing all that could be done to elevate the minds of the lower class, and to raise them from the state of wretchedness and debauchery in which too many of them were plunged.

Sir J. Walmsley

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That, in the opinion of this House, it would promote the moral and intellectual improvement of the Working Classes of this Metropolis, if the collections of Natural History and of Art, in the British Museum and the National Gallery, were open to the public inspection after Morning Service on Sundays."

MR. LLOYD DAVIES said, he must ask the courtesy of the House, as a new Member, to bear with him while he read a letter from a Welsh clergyman, surrounded by a primitive congregation, whose habits, thank God! had not yet been corrupted by too much admixture with the world, but who still devoutly followed the observances taught them in youth. That rev. gentleman said he viewed this proposition as part of the great scheme of Sabbath desecration, which tended, in his opinion, to bring the divine vengeance upon us as a nation. He could not avoid expressing his apprehension lest the pious injunctions the people might have received in church should be soon destroyed by their going in crowds to a place of amusement. He said this Motion, so rashly brought forward and so feebly sustained with declamation, but without argument in support of it, had no claim to be adopted.

MR. DRUMMOND: Sir, an expression fell from an hon. Gentleman—I do not know whether accidentally or by design—which marked the spirit in which this question is brought forward. For the first time in my life did I hear that which has been by universal consent of all Christians up to this hour called the Lord's day, designated, in the most extraordinary way, the "people's day." Now, Sir, I am going to speak of it as a question of the Lord's day. I have always been as much convinced as any man of the impropriety of the puritanical way in which the Lord's day has been observed in Protestant countries—that is to say, that whereas it was held in the universal Christian Church as a festival, since the Reformation it has been considered as a fast. But, of course, it was not called the Sabbath, because Sabbath is the seventh; and it would have been a mere misnomer to call the first day of the week the seventh. The principle remained the same. It is of no use hunting for texts about it. Texts, Sir, are very much like precedents, and precedents are very much like quotations, of which Payne Knight said, that they are "the remembrancer of the scholar and the oracle of the dunce." Whatever texts may be cited, the principle is that the seventh part of every man's time and the tenth part of his substance, is due to God. [Suppressed laughter.] Oh, Sir, I have not the least doubt that the derisive smile—suppressed out of good breeding rather than from any sense of truth—is connected with the question of the "people's day." There is a thorough contempt for tithes as an institution of God. It may be, or may not be, a convenient way of paying parsons. That is the people's affair, however. The religious aspect of the question is rejected altogether. Sir, I have great difficulty on this question—not as to what I myself think right, but in saying what ought to be the determination of the House; for when I see them constantly entertaining questions for refusing support to the national churches—those churches which are for the benefit, almost exclusively, of the poor—and then seeking a substitute for the churches which they will not give—going to the British Museum to see the gentlemen just arrived from Nineveh—those red men with green beards—when I see them, by way of improving the morality of the nation, encouraging incestuous marriages—when I see them year after year, bringing in Bills to rob the Church of her property, and, I am ashamed to say, those who are the trustees of that property defending it on the ground that it is private property—I am at a great loss to know what an assembly which recognises such principles ought to do on this occasion. But still I think there is a very great distinction between what an individual feels in his conscience it may be right to do on the Sunday, and what is public desecration. There is a distinction between that and his uniting as a member of a national assembly in a measure for opening public institutions on the Lord's day, and thus aiding in its public desecration.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, he was not desirous of imputing any unworthy motives to the hon. Gentlemen who had thought it their duty to bring forward a Motion of this nature, but of all the arguments used for the promotion of this measure certainly the last which should have been resorted to by its supporters (though no doubt their ideas, which were peculiar, might be sincere) was the religious argument. Their attempt to resort to such an argument he considered most extraordinary; and he considered this as an underhand, circuitous, and subtle mode of introducing the "thin end of the wedge," with a view to the desecration and destruction of an institution the pride, the treasure, and the glory of every Christian nation. He felt that it was an important matter to consider in this case whether their acts would be in conformity with that religion they professed, and that Word of God they revered. It had been endeavoured to show that the Sabbath was a part of the Jewish law which had been repealed by the Christian dispensation. That he entirely denied. The word "Sabbath" did not mean the "seventh day," but was the Hebrew word for "rest:" the substance of the Divine institution was a day of rest, and the fourth commandment mentioned it in that manner. That commandment was in the midst of others, which, it was admitted, belonged to the moral law of God—binding on men in all ages and countries, as much so as the command to honour parents or the prohibition of murder. The hon. Member who had denied that there was any passage in the New Testament recognising or reaffirming the obligation to observe the Lord's day, had forgotten that solemn text, "Whoever shall break one of the least of these commandments"—of the moral law—"and shall teach men so, the same shall be called least in the kingdom of God." It was quite true that the "Sabbath was made for man," but in what sense? Not as a mere day of amusement and entertainment; in a higher, and holier, and more sacred sense—as a day of rest and nourishment for the soul; the six days being for the sustenance and support of the body, the seventh was for the rest, and nourishment, and refreshment of the soul—for its exercise, for its spiritual support and sustentation. The question might also be argued upon social grounds. The House must not forget the views of the Legislature, formed for a long period by a series of Acts of Parliament, passed for promoting the observance of the Sabbath, from the age of Edward III. to the present time. Those Acts related to a variety of subjects, and though in terms they might be obsolete, yet in principle they were not effete, for they were passed to put down abuses of the Sabbath which had arisen at different periods, and proved the anxiety of the Legislature to preserve its due observance. A great part of the question related to public-houses and the Report of the Committee on the subject, which had shown the grievous evils arising therefrom. There had been a similar Committee in 1832, another in 1847, and a Committee of the House of Lords in 1851. Their Reports showed how necessary was legislation on the subject, in order to restrain the vices which were rampant in public-houses, and the great abuses which especially arose from their being open on Sundays. It also appeared that the opening of places of amusement did not diminish the attendance at public-houses on Sunday. It was said that the Zoological Gardens had been opened on Sundays at Dublin, but it had not appeared that the public-houses had been less frequented in consequence. On the contrary, it had been proved, that when the Crystal Palace was being built, and there was a great resort to it on Sundays, the public-houses in the neighbourhood were much frequented. Nor was there ever a more irrational conclusion than that come to by some Members of the Committee, that when the Crystal Palace was completed, its being opened on Sundays would not lead to similar results. If before the opening of the Crystal Palace such was the state of things, what might not be expected when, after its completion, greater crowds still would be attracted? With regard to the opening of Kew Gardens on Sundays, a gentleman who had taken the trouble to observe the visitors remarked that they consisted of persons above the lower classes of life, who, tired with walking all the afternoon, refreshed themselves in the numerous public-houses of Brentford, and often remained in them all the evening. [Cries of "Divide!"] There was only one other subject to which he would call attention. Last Session an important Act was passed for the closing of public-houses for a greater number of hours on Sunday, and the effect in the metropolis had been an immense decrease in the number of drunken cases brought before the police magistrates on Monday morning. The effect in Scotland of closing public-houses on Sunday, under the Forbes Mackenzie Act, had been most extraordinary, and had shown how remarkable a connection existed between crime and drunkenness. The sanctity of the Sabbath was the ground on which the Legislature interfered to close public-houses on Sunday, but if the British Museum and the National Gallery opened their doors, every other place of amusement would follow their example, and the sanctity of the day would be entirely destroyed, and the ground on which the legislature would interfere removed. The Motion before the House was specious in its appearance, but fatal in its results. He trusted that Parliament would never sanction such a measure, but would pursue the policy of sanctifying the Sunday as a day of rest, believing that such a policy would bring its abundant reward, according to the promise, "Them that honour me I will honour."

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he should regret exceedingly if this Resolution, candidly brought forward and peculiarly seconded as it had been, should diminish in the minds of the working classes that reverence for the sanctity of the Sabbath, which was the honour of this country. He had mixed a great deal with the working classes, and was of opinion that opening the British Museum and other places on Sundays was taking the wrong course in order to enlighten their minds. What was wanted was, that such places should be open in the evening, and on Saturdays and Mondays, but particularly on Saturday afternoons. A movement for early closing in the City was in progress, and another movement was gaining ground for half-a-holiday on Saturday afternoon. Unhappy should he be if we lowered ourselves to the standard of France and Germany in the reverence of the Lord's Day, and happy should he be if we could raise them to our standard. There was at present a movement in Paris to lessen the amount of Sunday trading, which he was gratified to find was regarded with favour by the French Government. As a proof that the opinion of the country was opposed to propositions similar to that which was brought forward, he would refer to the fact that the number of petitions against the opening of the Crystal Palace on the Sabbath amounted to 835, which were signed by 186,048 persons, while the number of petitions in favour of opening it were 127, to which were attached only 24,249 signatures. He would, therefore, move an Amendment to the Motion in furtherance of his views on the subject.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the National Gallery and the British Museum should remain closed on Sundays as heretofore, and that they should be opened every day in the week except Sundays; but, at all events, they should be open on Saturdays and Mondays, those days being most convenient for the Working Classes;" instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. KINNAIRD said, he had persuaded his late Friend (Mr. Hume) not to bring forward this Motion last Session. He was glad he had done so, because the question in the hands of the present Mover and Seconder had received a blow from which it would not now recover. He would read to the House a few lines from The Times, which set this question at rest, and was perfectly satisfactory to his mind. The Times said—

"The opening of museums on Sundays would preclude the possibility of closing other exhibitions equally innocent and attractive. Why should private collectors be debarred the licence assumed by the nation? If Sunday visitors are able and willing to spend a shilling of their weekly earnings in the purchase of a harmless gratification, why should they not be as free to do so as to avail themselves of a gratuitous exhibition? Why should not Madame Tussaud's be open? Why not Vauxhall? The line of demarcation would grow more and more difficult to draw. Under our present institutions we can very justly close the theatres on a Sunday, but after the proposed infraction of them we should be in a strange dilemma even on this point. If scenic representations are abstractedly innocent, why proscribe them on a Sunday? If abstractedly otherwise, why encourage them on the other six days of the week? But each of these exhibitions would entail a proportionate extension of traffic and trade, till at last a closed shop on a Sunday would be a rarity resulting from the circumstances of the district or the position of the individual."

Let these hon. Members look at Paris. He had been there during two Sundays, on both of which the building of the new streets was going on. This was a question for the working men, and the result would be that they would have to give seven days' labour for six days' wages. This result might be seen carried out in Paris, for there the working classes laboured every day in the week, and the same effect would follow here if the Government withdrew its protecting arm from the rapacity of individuals. When the marriage question was under discussion, an opponent of the Bill asked the supporters of it why they did not act like men, and propose at once that men should be enabled to marry their grandmother; and he (Mr. Kinnaird) would say with respect to this question let them act like men, and look its full bearing in the face. He believed the object of the promoters of this scheme was to cause people to work on the Sabbath day, for it was supported principally by those who had resisted every effort to protect the poor people employed in factories; and he, consequently, distrusted their professions of attachment to the labouring classes. He hoped his hon. Friend (Sir J. Walmsley) would not withdraw his Motion, after having kept Members waiting, week after week, in expectation of it, but that he would allow the House at once to express a straightforward English opinion upon a question which was of vital importance to the country.

LORD STANLEY said, he thought he was entitled to infer, from the last two speeches which had been delivered, that whatever considerations might be involved in this question it was entirely removed from considerations of a party nature. He was anxious to say a word or two upon it, because, if they came to a division, his would be a vote unpopular, he believed, in that House, and, perhaps, still more unpopular in the country; because he conceived that a Member of that House had no more important or sacred duty to perform than that of combating what he thought was a prejudice, although it might be entertained by persons for whom he had the sincerest respect and might be grounded upon the most conscientious motives. All the arguments he had heard or read against the proposition of the hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Walmsley) might be summed up under two heads—first, the abstract argument of the sanctity of the Sabbath; and next, the argument, that by opening these institutions unnecessary labour would be thrown upon Government officers. The most important of these questions was, of course, that which related to the desecration of the Sabbath, or, as it was called, Sabbath breaking; and, with respect to that question, he thought something too much had been conceded by the mover and seconder of the Resolutions. Those hon. Members had argued the question as if it was in fact a question of the desecration of the Sabbath, and the dispute was whether that institution was binding upon us, and whether that desecration was permissible or not. He thought that idea belonged to a theory utterly false and unfounded, although not uncommon in this country—he meant the theory which attempted to establish a kind of antagonism between things secular and things sacred. He did not mean to say that a man would learn in a museum or a picture gallery that which would be so important or so valuable to him as what he could learn in church, but he said that, taking it for what it was worth, intellectual and moral improvement was itself a part of religion. When he was told of the sanctity of the Sabbath, he would admit that he regarded that institution as, perhaps, the most venerable and valuable which had come down to us from past ages; but why was it so venerable and so valuable? No institution, however sacred, could be in itself an end; it must be a means to an end, and the end for which that sacred day was to be reverenced was the moral and intellectual improvement of those who observed it. What was the leisure of the working man upon a week-day? Out of the 168 hours which composed the week about sixty hours were employed by him in work, and at least two-thirds of his entire time would therefore be taken up by the necessities of that labour by which he earned his bread, and by the repose necessary to recruit his strength after it, and enable him to undergo the succeeding day's labour. When it was said that the working man ought to educate himself upon a week-day, let those who thus argue make the case their own, and ask themselves what would be their capacities for self-education and self-improvement after ten hours of manual labour? It was perfectly true that mechanical improvements might in the progress of time operate to diminish the amount of human labour. That was a consideration for the future, as up to the present time they had certainly not operated in that direction, and he believed the amount of manual labour now performed was as great, or greater, than it had been at any previous period. Neither the labourer nor the employer had any option as to reducing the hours of labour; both were driven on by that competition which urged us all forward, man against man, in this country, nation against nation in the markets of the world. As matters now stood, if they were to lay down the principle which lay at the bottom of all argument about the sanctity of the Sabbath, namely, that the whole of the day of rest was necessarily to be appropriated to subjects and studies of a theological character, they were thereby deciding that the education of the working man should virtually terminate in his youth, which was equivalent to saying that his intelligence and knowledge should in future remain very much upon their present footing. He believed that this exclusive appropriation of the day of rest, in popular opinion, to subjects exclusively theological, lay infinitely more than the want of an Education Bill, or the want of proper schools, at the bottom of that ignorance which they all lamented ; and he believed that, unless they applied some remedy in this direction, all educational measures, even such as that which his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) had lately introduced, would be comparatively useless. Was it asserted that the objects proposed by this Resolution would necessarily interfere with the performance of any religious duties ? Did it follow that the opening of a picture gallery or a museum upon a Sunday afternoon would take away from the attendance of churches ? What was done now ? They allowed Hampton Court and Kew Gardens to be opened on the Sunday, they encouraged, by allowing excursion trains to run, the inhabitants of the town upon their only holiday to breathe the fresh air of the country ; but the argument of desecration on the Sabbath applied much more strongly in these cases, for an expedition into the country generally occupied an entire day. This was not, however, a mere question of what had been permitted by previous legislation. Did hon. Gentlemen mean to apply to themselves the same rules which they applied to working men ? If any Gentlemen would say that they passed the Sabbath in such a manner that they should regard it as a comparatively profane occupation to visit a museum or to look at pictures, he would not dispute the question with them ; although even in that case he might observe, that there was a wide difference between doing that which we ourselves thought right, between obeying the dictates of our own consciences, and endeavouring to force others to obey them. But to force on other persons, especially if they belonged to a class not represented in that House, the rules of a morality more strict than we ourselves practised, did not appear to him to be conduct which had in it much of religion or of honesty. And who were to be the real gainers by the prohibition it was sought to enforce ? Was it the belief of hon. Gentlemen that they would either send to church or keep at church any man who would not be there if these institutions were opened ? A man who went to a place of worship, simply because he had no other place to go to, was not likely to profit much by what he heard there. An attempt had been made to close the public-houses upon Sundays, but he believed that the practical difficulty of the question of what constituted a traveller would be an obstacle in the way of such preventive legislation, and would compel them, whether they would or no, to keep the public-houses open during a certain portion of the day. It was his belief, that where the proposed measure would have the effect of taking one person from the church, it would take ten from the public-house. If he wanted proof of this, he found it in the nature of the opposition made to this Resolution. This opposition came from perfectly opposite quarters. There were those who were anxious for the interests of religion, and on that ground voted against the Resolution ; and he had nothing to say against their sincerity ; but there was also a large class who opposed this and similar Resolutions, and though he did not regard their opposition with the same respect as he did that of the first class he had mentioned, yet he thought they were more correct in the results which they apprehended from these Resolutions—he meant the publicans. A circular had also been issued by a society for the due observance of the Sabbath which had threatened all persons who voted for this measure with public exposure. He was not acquainted with the working of this society, but if this was the way in which they carried on their proceedings, he thought that they should change their name and call themselves a society for the promotion and encouragement of intemperance. He had endeavoured to speak on this matter without exaggeration, because he knew that in every part of England, especially in the manufacturing districts, if they asked a sensible man what was the great social evil of the time, ninety-nine out of every hundred would give the same answer, "It is drunkenness." He knew from returns that in a single town in Lancashire, with between 70,000 and 80,000 inhabitants, 1,000l. was daily spent in intoxicating drink. If they asked the Judges what was the cause of the greatest amount of crime, they would answer, "Drunkenness." If they asked medical men what was the cause, directly or indirectly, of disease and of more than one-half of the cases of insanity in our hospitals and asylums, they would give the same answer, "Drunkenness." He believed that the trouble of finding the cure for this evil was the great problem of our time. How were they to do this ? Not by restrictive laws, though, perhaps, they were useful enough in their way ; but prohibitory legislation would assuredly not effect the cure. In order to apply the remedy, they must first find the cause, and he believed that, more than anything else, the great cause was the want of right intellectual occupation for the working classes. It was hardly possible for hon. Gentlemen, leading the lives they did, engaged as they were in intellectual pursuits, to conceive the intense, the utter weariness that came over a man without any intellectual pursuit—who was engaged in an unending and unvarying routine of bodily labour. The first requirement they ought to have in view ought to be to afford some means of recreation and self-instruction to the people; he said, and he asserted it without fear of contradiction, that for such improvement and self-instruction time was not given in any week-day. As regards the question of desecration, he did sincerely and earnestly say, with deep respect for the feelings of those who desired to see the Sabbath kept holy, that the purpose for which that day was intended was carried out when it was applied to any purpose of moral and mental improvement. As to the labour question, he thought that he could easily show that the opening of a museum or picture gallery required the employment of a very limited number of persons. All experience as to the conduct of the people in such instances always proved that they conducted themselves admirably, and that little mischief was ever done. The presence, therefore, of curators and managers would not be wanted; they would require no skilled superintendence, only the supervision, as in all places of public resort, of a limited number of police. He was quite ready to allow that they had no more right to do an injustice to a few than they had to a many; but, after all, this was only a question of degree; the police, under existing laws, had duties to discharge on Sunday as well as on other days: the same persons would not be employed week after week, and relays could easily be obtained for the limited number that would be required for such a purpose. He did not know on what ground hon. Gentlemen could argue against the employment of attendants in a national institution to wait on the public, because there was not a family or household in the country that altogether dispensed with domestic services on that day; even those who advocated the strictest observance of the Sabbath did not hesitate to employ a domestic servant; and if a family of eight or ten persons did not scruple to give employment to some one domestic servant during a part of that day, he did not see on what general ground or principle it could be contended that, perhaps, more than 20,000 persons who entered a museum or picture gallery had not a right to command the services of the limited number of servants they required, as this would probably not amount to more than one attendant to every 500 persons, or not more than one-tenth of the labour, proportionate to the advantages and conveniences derived, which is required in every ordinary family. He could only say that he should vote for this Resolution, believing it to be, educationally and morally, a most important measure; believing it would be a precedent which would be applied not only to this metropolis, but to all the great towns of the country, and believing that the line of demarkation which an hon. Gentleman had told them it was so difficult to draw between places of an innocent and improving recreation and those of a wholly opposite nature, would be easily defined by those who were not wilfully blind to it.

MR. E. BALL said, this was one of the most important questions that could engage the attention of that House, because it concerned the due observance of the Sabbath. The hon. Mover of the Motion had claimed the advocacy of Dr. Arnold, on the ground that the doctor was not averse to the running of mail trains on Sunday; but Dr. Arnold had never said or done anything to justify a violation of the Sabbath, and therefore he considered that an unfair use had been made of his name. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion had reminded them that originally the Sabbath was held on Saturday, but the hon. Member forgot that the original Sabbath was held in commemoration of the creation of the world, while the Christians changed the day—not the purpose of the day—in honour of the salvation of the world. Therefore, the one day was just as sacred as the other. He was admonished by the clock that they were rapidly advancing upon the fast day, and it seemed somewhat strange to him to find the House on the eve of a fast day discussing the question of a due observance of the Sabbath. The speech, however, of the noble Lord who had just addressed them he had listened to with so much sorrow and pain, that he felt constrained to continue the discussion, if it was only for the sake of exposing the evil tendency of that speech. It advanced principles which he considered to be adverse to all good government, which were opposed to all true religion, and which he believed to be detrimental to the best interests of the community at large. The noble Lord argued that the poor man, being engaged in work for six days, could not afford sufficient time for instruction. What, then, was the natural inference? Why, that the seventh day should be devoted to instruction, and what better places could they resort to for instruction than those where they were taught the best things for their eternal interest? Spite of all the secular knowledge they might obtain at your British Museums and National Galleries, much better would it be for them to go to church or to chapel, where they would learn how to obtain everlasting salvation. The noble Lord's notions of teaching were akin to that of the Athenians and Corinthians, who excelled in all the polite arts of life, but whose proficiency in those intellectual acquirements did not tend to the advancement of their morals and religious feeling. This was a most important question, and he hoped the hon. Mover of the Motion would have the courage to bring it to the test of a division.

MR. GOULBURN said, it was his fortune to be connected with one of the institutions referred to in this Motion, and perhaps, therefore, he might be permitted to offer a few observations, not only with regard to this institution, but also upon the general question. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Pellatt) proposed, as an Amendment to the original Motion, that the British Museum should be opened every day in the week except Sunday; but that at all events it should be opened on Saturday and Monday evenings. Now, as a trustee of that institution, he could honestly say that it had been the desire of that body that the Museum should be opened on the day most convenient to the working classes, and upon examination of those most competent to give an opinion, it was determined that Monday was the day which, generally speaking, the working classes devoted to such purposes as visiting these institutions. The hon. Member for Southwark could hardly be aware, judging from his Amendment, that the British Museum was opened to the general public on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays; Tuesdays and Thursdays were appropriated to artists, and if Saturdays were not allotted to the working classes it was because one day in the week was required for the purpose of cleansing the building. If, however, such an arrangement could be made, as to give Saturday evenings to the working classes, he was sure the trustees would reconsider the question of opening; and although he could not promise what the result would be, he would yet undertake that the matter should be duly considered. But hon. Members would form a very erroneous opinion if they thought this Motion was confined simply to opening the British Museum on Sundays; it involved, upon the showing of those who advocated the Motion, the great principle of allowing public amusements to be part of the business of the Lord's day; and if hon. Gentlemen advocated the Motion so far as the metropolis was concerned, how could they refuse a similar concession to Leicester, Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, where the places of public resort might not be of the same intellectual and moral character as the British Museum? Dr. Gray, of the Museum, had well remarked, if they allowed people to inspect inanimate representations of wild animals on Sundays, how could they refuse them the right of witnessing, on the same day, the living forms as they were carried about in caravans to different places? He looked, therefore, upon this measure as the first step towards the authorised desecration of the Sabbath. He had been surprised to hear the noble Lord opposite declare his intention to vote for a resolution which called on the House to express an opinion at variance with the existing law. The law required the Sabbath to be observed, and that no works should be done on that day but those of necessity, piety, or charity. The resolution was in direct collision with the law, and before they adopted it, they were bound to fix the limits to which public amusements should be allowed to run on Sundays. It was a mistake to argue this question upon the ground that it was better to allow people to visit the British Museum than to frequent public-houses, because the due observance or the desecration of the Sabbath was not to be determined by any comparison of that nature. The question at issue was simply this—would the opening of the British Museum in the manner proposed by the Resolution be conformable or not to the will of Him who framed the Sabbath? It was a violation of the divine law, and in the violation of the divine law there could be no degree. All experience proved that the breach of one divine law was only the forerunner of more aggravated guilt. If they disregarded the little sin, they would soon come to commit the greater sin. Could it be believed that by the mere insertion of the words, that these places of amusement should be opened after the hours of divine service, they would promote the attendance of the people at their respective places of worship? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Biggs) who seconded the Motion appeared to be of opinion that the British Museum was intended for the benefit of those who resided in its immediate neighbourhood. Such was not, however, the case; indeed, the greater number of those who visited that institution were in the habit of coming from Whitechapel, Kensington, and the more distant quarters of the metropolis; and if, as the Motion proposed, the Museum were to be open after the hours of divine service, the consequence would be that attendance at church would to a great extent be precluded in the case of those visitors from the more remote quarters of London. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had stated that Sunday was the only day upon which the poorer classes could enjoy the privilege of visiting the Museum; and supposing that to be the case, it would follow, if it were thrown open on the Sabbath, that parties would be formed by the inhabitants of the more distant portions of the metropolis to visit it, and that those persons, instead of attending at the churches of their respective districts, would pass the greater portion of the Sunday either in travelling to and from their homes, or in those places of refreshment contiguous to the Museum. In the evening, then, they would return tired and weary, and he was afraid but little improved in a moral or intellectual, and still less, in all probability, in a religious point of view. But passing from that topic he would ask the House what right they had, by passing a Resolution which was in opposition to the existing law, to enjoin the necessity of the attendance of a certain number of individuals at such institutions as the British Museum upon a Sunday? Let them suppose that some of the parties refused to obey, what then would be the consequence? Why, the House must, under those circumstances, either enforce the orders or remove from their situations the individuals who declined to obey it. It could hardly be supposed that the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Lord Chancellor, who were trustees of the Museum, would aid the House in enforcing an order which was contrary to law; and if the latter alternative were urged, and the person refusing to obey the order should be dismissed, the result would be that he would be regarded as a martyr, and a feeling of opposition to the Legislature would be excited throughout the country generally, which would tend to bring upon it the contempt of the public at large. These being his sentiments upon the subject, he should vote against the Resolution.

MR. W. J. FOX said, that after the admirable speech of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, he would not have intruded upon the attention of the House at that late hour, but that he considered some remarks had been made in the course of the debate which ought not to go forth to the world unanswered. The supporters of this Motion had been represented as being animated by a sordid desire to extend the hours of labour and grind down the operative classes; but surely when the hon. Seconder of the Motion had been distinguished for his liberal treatment of those in his employment, and when other advocates of the Resolution had only the other night recorded their votes in favour of the protection of the working classes from excessive labour to a degree which the majority of the House thought too far for legislative enactment to go, accusations of this kind were the last that should be preferred against them. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last told them of the generous intentions of the trustees of the British Museum for the accommodation of the working classes; but the proposer of the Amendment argued upon an assumption which was both a fallacy and a mockery—namely, that Saturday and Monday would be convenient days for this portion of the people to visit that institution. Why, this Motion was only brought forward after repeated attempts had been unsuccessfully made to have the Museum opened in the evening, that those whose occupations prevented them from frequenting it in the daytime might enjoy that privilege during their only hour of leisure. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (the Marquess of Blandford) rested his argument on the experience already acquired of the working of the Beer Bill, but if he had examined the returns from the Duchy of Lancaster he would have found that, although the amount of Sunday drunkenness might, perhaps, have diminished there under the operation of that measure, yet that the aggregate amount of drunkenness spread over the whole week had rather increased. Moreover, that Bill checked the disposition of the people to make Sunday excursions, because it told them that if they went into the country on that day they could not obtain the refreshments they required; but surely if they were to be precluded from enjoying the grand and lovely scenes of nature, they ought not to be denied the other alternative of access to those marvels of antiquity and of art which they could find at home. It was greatly to be regretted that the debate had taken so much of a theological turn—a thing totally unnecessary and very undesirable, because the first four or five speeches that had been made had developed as many different theories relative to the due observance of the Lord's day. An assembly like that, embodying so great a diversity of religious doctrine and opinion, was not a fit body to argue a question on peculiarly theological grounds. The Motion did not necessarily involve such a discussion—indeed, it was only introduced to assert the assumed right of one man to impose his own theology upon another. The real question was chiefly one of property. The British Museum and the National Gallery were national institutions, and enriched by liberal donations of the public money—they were the people's collections and the people's treasures of art, and yet they locked their doors against their rightful owners and contributors on the Sunday. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goulburn) said that the people of Manchester and Liverpool could not be prevented from going to see collections of living animals if this Motion were adopted for London; but did he forget that a man might now see as many living specimens of wild beasts of different countries as he pleased in that metropolis on a Sunday, if he were only rich enough to pay twenty guineas as an entrance fee and a five guinea annual subscription. It was contended that there was no gradation in the desecration of the Sabbath; but what must be said of this general practice, which was now tolerated and patronised by the aristocracy? It had been continually assumed in the discussion of this question that there was some divine law enjoining the strict observance of the Sabbath, which was contended for. That, however, was a matter of opinion. Sabbatarianism, in the modern sense of the word, never had been a doctrine of the universal Christian Church. It was never a doctrine of the early Christians, of the Roman Catholic Church, or of the first Protestants. Luther exhorted—nay, even commanded his followers, if any one attempted to impose such a law on them, to walk, to ride, to dance, and to hunt, and to do anything on the Sabbath. Calvin, Cranmer, and most of the celebrated teachers of the early Protestant Church, condemned the doctrine. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn had spoken of the natural tendency of the objects which it was now sought to admit the working classes to visit on the Sabbath, to elevate the religious feelings and associations of the people; and that it was so evident from the fact that all religious bodies to the extent of their ability had availed themselves of associations similar to those produced by the great works of art and the curiosities of nature to awaken and keep alive religious feelings in the minds of their congregations. What Church was there which had not availed itself, so far as it could, of the splendours of sublime architecture, and the power of statuary, painting, or music? He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had spoken last, that it would be well if some law could be passed to define what could and what could not be done on a Sunday. At present, the strict observance of the Sabbath, as contended for by the extreme party, was notoriously set at nought in all classes of the community, and perhaps most of all by the rich. They were asked what would be the outcry through the country, if a porter of the British Museum suffered martyrdom for refusing to do his work on the Sunday. But it was forgotten that, even at the present time, if such dismissal could be called martyrdom, the porter of a gentleman's house might suffer martyrdom for not working on a Sunday. A rich man, by his Sunday wants, set at least ten persons to work, and the British Museum could be opened without imposing labour on any greater number, and that not for the enjoyment and accommodation of one man, but for the recreation and instruction of thousands. It certainly was discreditable to see useful reforms of this nature opposed and defeated by prejudice, ignorance, and intolerance, acting under the disguise of religious feeling.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The House, I think, Sir, has pretty well made up its mind how to vote upon these two Motions, but I wish shortly to state the grounds upon which I shall feel it necessary to vote against both. In the first place, this mode of putting questions before the House, of proposing Motions in the shape of abstract Resolutions (though certainly in this case there might have been a difficulty in placing the question directly before the House), is not one which it is desirable should be generally adopted. Without, however, entering into the theological discussion which has been raised to-night, we must all agree that the respectful observance of the Sabbath is a principle which it is highly desirable and necessary to encourage. We must all admit, too, that in proportion as that observance prevails, we may expect to see the people of a country moral and well educated, and in proportion, on the contrary, as it is treated with disrespect, we may expect to see the conduct of the people such as we should not desire it to be. My opinion is that Sunday ought to be a day of rest, of devotion, and of cheerful and innocent recreation. To enforce that strict observance of Sunday for which some persons contend is obviously impossible. That no work should be done on Sunday would stop the whole movement of social existence; but it is impossible for any law to define—and I think it would be inexpedient for Parliament to attempt to pass such a law—the precise degree to which that principle may properly be carried. That must be left to the conscience of each individual. Each man must be left to determine, according to his own position and circumstances, to what degree he can combine the ordinary and necessary occupations of life with what he considers the proper observance of Sunday. But when a matter is brought before Parliament in regard to which the religious feelings of a great portion of the community are deeply affected, it is highly inexpedient that Parliament should by any vote set itself in opposition to that which is the religious feeling of the people. I think Parliament would be doing an injudicious act if, by any vote of its own, or or by any Resolution, it should lead the country to think that it is less mindful of those religious principles which ought to govern the conduct of all men than the great mass of the community themselves are. For these reasons, thinking that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Leicester would do violence to the feelings of a large portion of the community—feelings which we are bound to respect, and which it is highly desirable studiously to encourage—I shall give my opposition to the original Motion. To the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark I shall object, not, of course, on the same grounds as to the original Motion, but for the technical reasons urged by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goulburn), that the opening of the Museum and the National Gallery on the Saturday as well as on the Monday would allow of no opportunity for keeping those buildings clean and in proper order.

MR. BARROW said, he must beg to express the satisfaction with which he had heard the statement of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, that steps should be taken, if possible, to open the British Museum to the working classes on Saturdays.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, he had brought forward the Motion believing it would be practically useful, but he had no wish to press it, finding the great majority of the House to be of a different opinion. He still believed that his views were in accordance with those of a large portion of the public, and if it were the wish of the House he was quite willing to go to a division. If his Motion were rejected at the present moment, he was sure it would ultimately be carried.

Question put:—

The House divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 235: Majority 187.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, that he would withdraw his Amendment in full confidence in the pledge which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge with respect to opening the British Museum on Saturday afternoon.

MR. GOULBURN said, he had not given any pledge. He had only promised that the subject should be carefully considered.

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, proposed, and, by leave, withdrawn.

PAYMENT OF WAGES—HOSIERY MANUFACTURE.

MR. PACKE said, he would now beg to move, that the Select Committee of last Session on Payment of Wages be re-appointed to inquire as far as regards the Hosiery Manufacture.

MR. CRAUFURD said, this Motion was an attempt to evade a former Resolution of the House, and he should therefore oppose it.

SIR HENRY HALFORD said, he was at a loss to know on what reasonable ground the appointment of this Committee could be opposed. All that was asked was that the subject should be inquired into, and he thought that demand ought to be granted.

MR. WILKINSON said, he objected to the appointment of the Committee altogether.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not think that any further inquiry into this subject was necessary; but, since the House had referred it and the truck system to a Committee, and as that Committee, at the end of last Session, had recommended that they should be reappointed, he did not think it desirable to oppose the Motion.

MR. C. FORSTER said, he believed that questions of this nature could be better discussed in the House than before a Select Committee. Still, under the peculiar circumstances of the present case, he should support the Motion.

THE PATRIOTIC FUND—THE CANADIAN INDIANS.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE said, he wished to put a question to the noble Earl the President of the Council, of which he had given him a very short notice. It was simply to ask whether Her Majesty's Ministers had received any communication from the Governor General of Canada relative to the contribution of certain tribes of native Indians in Canada towards the Patriotic Fund? Although great evils attended the war, thus much good was obtained, that it had created a generous sympathy among all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in the most remote parts of Her Majesty's widely-extended dominions; and of that no evidence could be greater than the fund to which he alluded—a fund which, under the heavy pressure of the public burdens, had yet risen to upwards of a million of money. The largeness of the sum proved how universal was the sympathy; but it was to the small fractions of it they must look for the intensity of that feeling. He would mention a case in our own country. In the London Reformatory for Adult Criminals the poor inmates wished to contribute something towards the fund. Having no money, they abstained totally from food for twenty-four hours, on a day when meat was allowed, and applied the proceeds to the purpose. It was in a kindred spirit that these poor Red Indians, from their wig-wams in the Far West, had contributed the enormous sum, to them, of 100*l.* He understood the meeting at which the contribution was made took place on the 4th of the month. He also understood that notice of it had been sent to the Governor General; and, as it was probable some intimation would reach the Home Secretary, he had ventured to put the question to his noble Friend. It was not a matter of much importance, or requiring the particular notice of their Lordships; but he was sure he needed no excuse for mentioning an admirable trait in the character of their fellow-subjects inhabiting the prairies of a distant continent.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had not been able to obtain any sufficient information as to the facts mentioned by his noble Friend, but he would certainly endeavour to ascertain the circumstances which were so highly creditable to the inhabitants of the Far West.

THE LAW OF PARTNERSHIP—TEXTILE FABRICS—MANUFACTURE OF PAPER.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that as he perceived there was other business before the House to-morrow, he would now put the question of which he had given notice to the President of the Board of Trade with regard to the intentions of the Government as to introducing any measure this Session for the amendment of the Law of Partnership, especially as to the question of limited liability. He wished to call the attention of their Lordships to the reason for which he put the question. He did not propose to enter into a discussion of the question on its merits, of the existing law of partnership, or of limited liability, or whether or not there could be any advantages to be derived from an alteration of the law; but his attention had been called to the subject by a particular case. Their Lordships were aware that at this time—especially if hostilities continued—that there was a prospect of a great deficiency of the arrivals of hemp and flax, and independently of the war there was now, and was likely to be, a deficiency of materials for the manufacture of paper. That was a growing evil, and the complaints appeared to be every day increasing. That being so, two propositions had been brought forward, by which it was proposed to meet these deficiencies. There was a Bill now before the other House of Parliament for incorporating a company for the manufacture of paper from flax straw, of which he (the Earl of Derby) knew nothing more than what he had seen in the public papers. But the undertaking to which he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) was of a different nature, and more extensive in its proposed operations. It was a proposal not only for the manufacture of paper, but of textile fabrics, employing as a substitute for hemp the fibres of various plants indigenous to the West Indies. It had been undertaken by a Mr. Sharpe, a brother of the well-known steam machine maker at Manchester, who had entered into arrangements for the making of paper and textile fabrics of various kinds from the fibres of plants found in the West Indies, such as the plantain, the aloe, and others, which grow in vast abundance, and which were utterly valueless at the present moment. He had now before him samples of the fibres and some small specimens of the textile fabrics, and the paper manufactured from them, which he should be very happy to show their Lordships. [The noble Earl here handed some specimens across the table to the Marquess of Lansdowne, which were afterwards examined with interest by other Peers. They consisted of the following articles: A specimen of the fibre of the plantain (Musa Paradisiaca), and a specimen of a textile fabric, of silky appearance, manufactured from the fibre; a specimen of the fibre of the Hibiscus Esculentus (Okhro); a specimen from the seed pod of the Cryptostegia Grandiflora, suitable for indiarubber with. The body of the plant yields gum caoutchouc, and the bark of the branches a fine fibre. Also, two specimens of paper made from the plantain fibre; one specimen rough and unbleached, to show the great strength and tenacity of the fibre, and another specimen of very good quality, bleached and carried through all the operations for the best paper.] There were in the hands of the noble Marquess two descriptions of paper, one unbleached and the other a finer sort, which was as good as any which could be made from any other material; and he was told that paper could be supplied, made from this material, much cheaper than paper of a corresponding quality made from rags. An immense abundance of this material could be produced, which was a very material element in the question. He wished only to mention that on one estate in Demerara no less than 160,000 plantain trees were cut down every year, the trees going to waste, as they were cut down only for the purpose of getting at the fruit, and this wasted material contained 250 tons of fibre, capable of being manufactured into paper such as the noble Marquess had in his hand. All those products of the West Indies were capable of being converted either into textile fabrics, or rope of more or less tenacity, or paper. For this manufacture a patent had been already taken out in this country, and applications had been made to the Legislatures of Jamaica and British Guiana on the subject, and had been received in so friendly a spirit in the two colonies that the invention had been the subject of particular notice in the speeches of the Governors in opening the Legislatures; and Committees of both Houses in the two colonies having been appointed to examine into the matter and reported, enactments were passed facilitating the export of the material; and, moreover, the fees and costs of introducing the Bills had been ordered to be paid at the public expense. That being so, if you could promote a manufacture which would demand from the West Indies material to an inexhaustible amount, to meet the demand for the manufacture of textile fabrics, and paper superior to that produced from rags, and if those articles could be produced in colonies which were in a condition of distress, and thus be the means of raising an entirely new species of industry in those colonies, he thought it was a question of no ordinary importance, and demanded the attention of the Government at home in the same way that it demanded that of the Government of those colonies themselves. That was the particular case which had brought the consideration of this question of the law of partnership before him. It appeared that the gentlemen who had taken up this invention having laid out a sum of money, and purchased estates in the West Indies for growing the raw material, had applied to the Queen in Council, in July last, for a charter; and, having been referred to the Board of Trade, was directed to take certain steps to bring their petition before the Board of Trade. They did so in August last; but it was not until October that they were informed by Mr. Cardwell that the Government had determined not to grant any charter for any undertaking, as in the present Session an alteration would be made in the law affecting partnership. A great deal, no doubt, might be said in condemnation of the indiscriminate adoption of the principle of limited liability, and he (the Earl of Derby) would not say whether that was right or wrong; but he was sure that a great deal might be said against the principle of the law of England as it at present existed in reference to limited liability in every case, and much more might be said against the power possessed by the Government to decide in what cases exceptions should be made to the law of limited liability. In cases of the kind he had mentioned, and there might be many others, it was impossible to carry out enterprises to the extent to which they might be carried by private capital only, if every one engaged in them was liable to the full amount of his property, whatever it might be. Whether the law of limited liability was right or not, the state of things was much worse when, the existing law having been condemned, and a new one was about to be introduced, the power of deciding what cases should be exceptional was refused to be exercised, and the existing law rigidly carried out. The President of the Board of Trade said that principle had been adopted by the Board for a year and a half. He (the Earl of Derby) thought the noble Lord was mistaken, and that some charter had been granted in that time; but if for a year and a half the department of the Board of Trade had not exercised its power of deviation from the law, this was a very important reason for urging the immediate consideration of the present state of the law. Under these circumstances he thought that, as the application for a charter had been refused in October, he was not unreasonable if, in March, he put a question to the President of the Board of Trade and inquired whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure for the Amendment of the Law of Partnership, more especially as to the Question of Limited Liability; and if so, at what time?

LORD STANLEY or ALDERLEY said, he did not, for a moment, call in question the propriety of the inquiry of the noble Earl, and he had to state, in reply, that a Bill on the subject of the law of partnership was in preparation, which he thought would remove many of the difficulties incident to the existing law. The Bill would be brought in as soon as possible; but as to the period of the Session at which it would be introduced, he had to say that it would not be brought in before Easter, but very shortly afterwards. With regard to the particular case which had called the attention of the noble Earl to the state of the law, he wished to say a few words, in order to show that the Board of Trade was not culpable in this instance. The custom with regard to the application for charters for the colonies was to send them to the Colonial Office, where, if it was stated that there was no objection to them, they were granted at once; otherwise they were sent out and submitted to the Legislature of the colonies concerned, to decide whether they were expedient or not; and if they reported that they were expedient, the charters were then granted. With regard to this case that course was not taken, as the charter asked for large powers to take land in any colony. If it had been confined to any given colonies, such as Jamaica and Demerara, the charter would have been transmitted to the Legislatures there; and if they had been as favourable to it as had been stated by the noble Earl, it would have been granted.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that as regarded the particular case he had mentioned, the answer of the noble Lord was satisfactory. But he could not say that the answer with regard to the general question was equally satisfactory, for if the question of the law of partnership had been under consideration for a year and a half, and a charter asked for in October last was refused by the Board of Trade, and yet that a measure was not to be brought on before Easter, it was not satisfactory, because it was probable that such a Bill would not, in that case, be passed this Session.

LORD REDESDALE said, the subject had been brought under his notice, as he had examined a private Bill relating to it; and he wished to point out that the object of these parties was to have large establishments all over England and buy up all the patents they could obtain. It was obvious that if they accomplished their object of obtaining an exclusive use of all the patents every grower of flax or other fibre must be in their power, and therefore he hoped that, whatever alteration might be made in the law of limited liability, no alteration would be made in the patent law, which prohibited the assignment of a patent to more than a certain number of individuals.

"Her Majesty thinks it right to acquaint the House of Lords, that She has concluded, in concert with His Majesty The Emperor of the French, a Military Convention with His Majesty The King of Sardinia, whereby His Majesty The King of Sardinia engaged to furnish and keep up for the Requirements of the present War a Body of Fifteen thousand Men, organised as is therein stipulated; and with a View to facilitate the Execution of the said Military Convention, Her Majesty has, by a supplementary Convention, concluded with His Majesty The King of Sardinia, undertaken to recommend to Her Parliament to enable Her to advance, by way of Loan to His Majesty The King of Sardinia, the Sum of One Million Pounds Sterling, of which Sum Five hundred thousand Pounds Sterling shall be paid by Her Majesty as soon as possible after the Assent of Her Parliament shall have been given thereto, and the remaining Five hundred thousand Pounds at the Expiration of Six Months after Payment of the first Sum :

"Her Majesty has further engaged to recommend to Her Parliament, to enable Her, if the War should not have been brought to a close at the Expiration of Twelve Months after Payment of the first Instalment of the above-mentioned Loan, to advance to His Majesty The King of Sardinia in the same Proportions a like Sum of One Million of Pounds Sterling :

"The Government of His Majesty The King of Sardinia undertakes to pay Interest on such Loan or Loans at the Rate of Four per Cent per Annum, of which One per Cent per Annum shall be for a sinking Fund; the said Interest to be calculated and payable in the Manner in the said Convention stipulated :

"Her Majesty had directed a Copy of these Conventions to be laid before the House of Lords; and She relies on the Zeal and public Spirit of the House of Lords to concur in enabling Her to make good the Engagements which She has contracted with Her Ally :

Ordered—That the said Message be taken into Consideration on Monday next.

THE MILITIA.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for War whether he had received any opinion from the law officers of the Crown with respect to a point which had been discussed in the House the other night—namely, whether militiamen enlisted under the Act of 1852 were legally bound to serve under the Act of 1854, under which the militia was to be embodied for five years, although they had not been re-enlisted under the latter Bill?

LORD PANMURE: In reply to the question of the noble Earl, I beg to state that since the discussion took place in this House with reference to the militia, I have learned by experience how dangerous it is to discuss in this House matters affecting the rights of soldiers, which may be the means of exciting in their minds an unwarranted impression with respect to the rights which they can fairly claim. Now, that has been the case in the present instance, and very great inconvenience has thus arisen; inasmuch as, immediately after the debate in this House was made public, the soldiers in several militia regiments—whether acting on their own views of the matter, or whether on the suggestions of others, I cannot say—but the soldiers of several militia regiments absolutely declined, on being called out, to serve any further, and, in fact, laid down their arms; and many of them refused to be obedient to discipline any longer. I must, however, do those men the justice to add, that immediately on remonstrances being addressed to them by their commanding officers, and the impropriety of the course they had taken being pointed out to them, they resumed their duties, and agreed to wait for further instructions from the Government. I never had any doubt myself that, as the law stands, no militiaman who was enrolled under the Act of 1852 had any claim whatever to be exempted from the embodied service required by the Act of 1854; and I have been assured by the highest legal authority which it was in my power to consult, that every militiaman now serving under the Act of 1854, whether enrolled in 1852 or in 1853, or subsequently to the passing of the Act of 1854, is legally compellable by law to serve in the embodied militia. That is, distinctly and unequivocally, the effect of the law as it now stands. But there is another point which was mooted the other night for our consideration. It was stated that when the Act of 1854 was passed by Parliament, a pledge was given and an understanding come to that the men who had been enrolled in 1852 were to have the option of being attested or not for service under that Act. Now, if any such engagement was entered into, I am one of those who think that, whether it was right or wrong, prudent or imprudent, that should it have been contracted on the part of the Government with the soldier, it ought to be religiously observed. It is my duty, therefore, when the men of the militia obey their commanding officers, and submit to the law as it stands, to ascertain how far that engagement has been made, and to keep it on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he entirely agreed with the noble Lord in the abstract principle that it was inconvenient to have discussions in that House affecting the discipline of our soldiers. But he could not regret that this subject had been brought under their notice last year and upon a recent occasion; because the first object of every one must be to see that justice should be done to the soldiers of this country, and that any point upon which doubts existed should be clearly ascertained. It now appeared, from the opinion given by the law advisers of the Crown, that the men enrolled in 1852 and 1853 were legally bound to serve in the embodied militia. Those men must, therefore, clearly understand what their duty was, and would, he believed, faithfully discharge it; and he was on that account heartily glad that the discussion of this question had been raised.

LORD PANMURE said, he ought to state that he had ordered a circular to be addressed to the colonels of militia regiments and the lords lieutenant of counties, requesting them to make known to the men of those regiments the facts of the case as he had just explained them.

EARL GREY agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) that great advantages had followed from the public discussion of this question, for nothing was more calculated to injure the militia and the army than the impression that justice and good faith had not been observed towards them. In this case there was no doubt as to what good faith and justice required. The militiamen in question had been enrolled under particular Acts of Parliament, and they had a right to think that their obligation to serve was strictly limited by those Acts; yet, without their consent, another Act of Parliament had been passed, altering the terms of their agreement. He took objection at the time to the obvious injustice of the proceeding; and he was distinctly told in answer that any injustice would be remedied, because no man who had been enrolled under the former law would be required to incur more onerous obligations than he had formerly taken upon himself. He thought there had been great negligence on the part of the Government of that day in not doing what the noble Lord had now done; for they ought to have issued a circular to lords lieutenant and colonels of militia regiments, informing them that the men could not be called upon to serve without their consent beyond what they had agreed to. What had occurred would, he hoped, be a caution to their Lordships, and to the other House of Parliament, never to consent to an Act of Parliament under which injustice might be done to the troops, from any assurance on the part of the Government that that power should not be abused, and to take care that in cases like the present a clause should be put in to prevent the Act from being retrospective. This was the moral to be drawn from the former discussion, and not that it had been inconvenient to the public service.

LORD BROUGHAM was rejoiced that this matter had been set right, and had only one word to add to the proposition of the noble Earl (Earl Grey). He wished to make it more general, and to say that, not only should no act of Parliament be passed on the understanding that some other Act should be afterwards passed, in which the military were concerned, but that this should be the general rule in legislative proceedings.

LORD BATEMAN said, before this matter was closed, he wished to put a question to the Secretary for War. He wished to know if by chance any man in a regiment resisted being re-attested, he was liable to be retained in the service.

LORD PANMURE said, that if the regiment was embodied by the law as it stood, every man was compelled to serve.

EARL GREY said, if he understood the noble Lord (Lord Panmure) he had given an engagement that the men enlisted before 1854 might be relieved from a greater service than that for which they had voluntarily enlisted.

LORD PANMURE: I said that all engagements made with the militiamen enlisted in 1852 would be religiously kept.

EARL GREY was sorry he had misunderstood his noble Friend. His belief was that no man under the Act of 1852 could be required to serve more than fifty-six days in the year, except in case of invasion, and the colonels had got many of them to volunteer on the faith of that pledge. He stated when the Act of 1854 was brought in that it was unjust to alter the terms of the engagements of those men who had voluntarily enlisted; but he was assured that the power would not be used, and he withdrew his opposition to the Bill. He now regretted that he had not pressed the insertion of a clause providing that no man enlisted under the Act of 1852 should be called on to perform any other service than that which they had then voluntarily undertaken. He begged now to ask his noble Friend whether or not he had made it known that any man who had been enrolled under the first Act, if unwilling to renew his engagement of service, should have his discharge or leave of absence, so that no greater amount of service should be extorted from him than such as he had voluntarily engaged to perform.

LORD PANMURE said, that he had stated that he would adopt whatever means seemed to him right to keep faith with the militiamen, but he did not say whether it should be by leave of absence or discharge. He had said distinctly that he would keep faith with the men, and that he would not require from them more service than they had engaged to perform; but with reference to the exact means to be adopted, he must refrain from stating them. He pledged himself to keep faith with the men.

CRIMINAL LAW PROCEDURE—RESOLUTIONS.

LORD BROUGHAM: * My Lords, I rise according to my notice to bring before your Lordships the Criminal Procedure of this Country by the Law and Practice of England. The subject is of great extent, and of vast importance; and if it was of equal difficulty, unable to grapple with it, I should shrink from handling it; but unhappily the defects of the system are so obvious, lying so near the surface, and in their consequences so widely felt, that their description is easy, though I must confess that for some of them at least it may be hard to find a remedy free from all objection. Until, however, we have carefully examined the whole, it would be rash to pronounce that in any case, the evils complained of are remediless; and that the more grievous defects can be removed seems unquestionable. I proceed then, at once, to deal with the whole subject in the order described when I gave my notice a fortnight ago.

And first of all, and in the outset, I will say that I confine myself to procedure, leaving untouched the defects in the Criminal Law itself, and only asking you to consider the manner in which, as at present established, it is administered or carried into execution; although I must own that one's forbearance is taxed a little high in thus passing by defects so glaring, as every day's experience exemplifies; defects too, which trench so nearly upon procedure, that it is difficult to keep the discussion of them apart from my present subject. Thus to say nothing of such grave offences as formed the subject matter of my learned Friend Mr. Bowyer's Bill last Session, approved as regards its principle by the Lord Chief Justice—acts morally criminal, but only in law treated as civil injuries—what shall be said of those gross cases of fraud, and those scandalous instances of breach of trust so frequently brought before our courts, but only the courts of civil jurisdiction—such cases as we tried on appeal from Ireland in this House on a somewhat remarkable day, the morning after the Reform Bill was rejected, October 1831, when with Lord Plunket and Lord Radnor, I sat to hear the story of a fraud as gross as ever was perpetrated, by which a reverend gentleman was deprived of a large fortune, and the perpetrator of the crime removed its fruits beyond our jurisdiction, so that the injured party has never yet been able to recover the property adjudged to be his by our clear and unhesitating decision,—or such a case, if possible more flagrant, as I grieve to say, a not undistinguished member of our profession exhibited, when guardian of two orphans, he spent the whole of their patrimony in riotous living, and dying insolvent, left these two female wards upon the parish?—These are surely crimes of the blackest dye, and yet in law they are only regarded as constituting debts for which the party may sue if he can, but which the public has no right to complain of, or the magistrate to punish. Such cases approach the boundary which separates the Criminal Law from Criminal Procedure, and they affect our feelings of justice strongly; but I make an effort, and abstain from dealing with them, that I may bring my observations within narrower bounds; and I therefore come to the first stage of procedure—the ascertaining of the offence and the securing of the offender, in order to his trial; in a word the department of police—to which I begin with asking your Lordships' attention.

The first object that meets our eye in this survey is the court of the police, especially the metropolitan police magistrate, because the name seems to connect it with the subject. It is, however, a great misnomer. It has been remarked by one of the able and learned persons who preside at these courts, that this reminds us of Voltaire's remark on the name, Holy Roman Empire, which is neither holy, nor Roman, nor Empire. So these functionaries are not metropolitan, because they are expressly shut out from all jurisdiction in the City of London; they are not police, for they have nothing to do with police, except, indeed, to stand between the community and any policeman who may abuse their powers, as they protect against any other wrong-doers; and they are not magistrates, properly speaking, because that means an unpaid justice, and these gentlemen are all stipendiary. True, this is only a question of a name, but words oftentimes have the force of things, and I object to this false appellation given by common parlance, as I do to the equally false name of Small Debt Courts, given by the Statutes to our local judicatures. I object in both instances to a misnomer which tends to lower in public estimation a most important tribunal. It would be difficult to estimate too highly the value of these Criminal Courts. Beside many branches of jurisdiction, as in revenue cases, and some in civil matters, they have the power of summary conviction in a large class of cases connected with violence; but their principal function is that of preparatory inquiry, of examining the evidence to support charges brought before them; and this they do according to the strict rules of evidence, which the Coroner is not bound by, because he is to ascertain not only the corpus delicti, that the offence has been committed, but who is probably the offender; and hence I may observe in passing, two evils connected with this important officer's proceedings: first, that they are in public, as well as behind the backs of those suspected; and next, that there is no power of holding to bail when a warrant is executed. The police magistrate, on the other hand, does always, as the committing magistrate everywhere ought to do, guide himself by the rules of evidence, and also examines any witnesses whom the person charged may bring forward in his own behalf. In short, it is a much more satisfactory inquiry in all respects than that before a grand jury. Some defects there are. It appears to me that since the County Courts have been established, from all the civil jurisdiction, as in ejectments and other cases of small amount, the Police Courts should be relieved, by this jurisdiction being transferred, or rather confined, to the County Courts, for it is concurrent; but confined it cannot now be, in consequence of the greater expense of proceedings in those courts, arising almost entirely from the taxes still levied on them against all prin-eiple. This it is that drives much business of a civil description into the police courts. Another defect arises from the power to discharge upon the party's own recognisance, without bail being confined, when our Petty Offence Bill shall pass, to the small felonies within its provisions ; whereas it should be given generally, wherever the magistrate can take bail, and should be given to the Coroner in cases of manslaughter. There is no risk whatever attending the extension of this discretion. It would only be exercised in the instance of poor people unable to find bail ; and they are not at all prone to fly. The offence must be of a grave nature to make them choose perpetual exile rather than stand their trial ; exile, which among our northern neighbours, is a punishment of many offences on conviction ; sometimes banishment from the realm, but sometimes also from the burgh or county only. A poor man's whole scheme of life is deranged by it, and his means of livelihood destroyed, even if he has the power of transferring his family, and if the loss of his country cannot affect him. It accordingly appears that the instances are exceedingly rare of persons escaping to avoid trial. Professional friends, and others conversant with police proceedings, have assured me, that such a thing hardly ever happens, where the offence is not grave, but of such nature that the discretion would be used for which I contend, as avoiding the necessity of unnecessary imprisonment, with all its evils, both to the family of the party, to his own habits, and to his character, from the contamination of the gaol. One great benefit of these magistrates arises, not from their control over the police, but from their standing, as it were, between the lower orders and that force. Useful as is our metropolitan police, and meritorious as its members very generally are, there can be no doubt that occasions sometimes arise, when authority to be exercised with a somewhat large discretion, and exercised at all hours, and in all seasons, may be abused. But the speedy recourse which is required to the magistrate, and the expectation of his interference, tends greatly to prevent this abuse. That the number of stipendiary magistrates should be increased, seems to follow from all we are considering in their praise. Far be it from me to undervalue the services of the unpaid justices, especially in country districts and small towns. <sup>Do</sup>t surely there ought to be in all the larger towns a sufficient number of such magistrates as are found necessary in Middlesex and the adjacent districts, and for the very same reasons on which that necessity is founded, and is admitted.—There are at present not above seven or eight ; and in Middlesex twenty-three, holding eleven courts.

But the establishment of a regular police everywhere is now allowed by all to be of absolute necessity ; and I believe I only speak the sense of all your Lordships when I express my great regret that the Bill last year introduced by my noble Friend now at the head of the Government, and then Home Secretary, was not suffered to pass. As to some of its provisions doubts might reasonably be entertained ; but its principle has received the assent of all who have carefully considered the subject, and who are alive to the incalculable importance of having such a constabulary force for the county districts, and smaller towns as may suffice to keep the peace, to awe offenders, to prevent them from pursuing their evil courses, and to secure their being brought to justice. My noble Friend deserved the greatest praise for his exertions in preparing that measure, and he was only defeated by the clamours which the corporate bodies raised—clamours in which unincorporated towns joined, though they must have seen, as they were at the time plainly told and as I doubt not they have since experienced, that their bounds, unprotected by police, would assuredly become the refuge of malefactors from all parts where a police force existed. A regular force is absolutely necessary ; but it appears to me equally expedient that there should also be a reserve force, of persons who do not quit their occupations, but only receive a certain moderate pay as a retainer, obliging them to muster a few days yearly for inspection and training, and liable in all emergencies to be called out. I say nothing of the great service which the recruiting of the army may derive from this force bearing to the regular constabulary the same relation that the local militia does to the regular ; but its use in police service is incontestable. It would not only separate the disreputable classes from the bettermost folks, and thus restrain the former, but it would render riotous proceedings and other like outrages impossible, and would prevent such evils as we have lately seen to arise from the combinations called strikes, the source of such danger to the public peace; such loss to the manufacturing interest; above all, such cruel suffering to the labouring classes themselves; the dupes and tools of sordid agitators seeking their own power, and their own profit at the cost of the poor working men and their families. The illustrious man, whom we unhappily no longer have among us, was, I have reason to think, both from what passed in private and from some observations made in this House, much in favour of some such arrangement. My noble friends opposite, before they quitted office in 1852, had, I believe, nearly matured a plan of a kindred sort, for a reserve naval force. It has been strongly recommended by my Friend Mr. F. Hill, whose long services as prison inspector, have brought him much in communication with the police authorities in different parts, both of Scotland and England. In his admirable work on Crimes, he dwells much upon the subject, and shows incontestably how useful such a force would prove both in peace and war.

I cannot quit the subject of police without observing how important it is that there should be a uniform system of rules and regulations for that force all over the country. This principle appears to have received Legislative sanction; for in 1851 an Act was passed having this object principally in view, the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, which empowers the Secretary of State to make rules generally applicable for the payment of police expenses, compensations and rewards on detecting offences. It takes the power of making regulations from the Sessions, manifestly in order to secure the uniformity of the rules. It is a pity that beside empowering, the Act did not require the making of such rules by the Secretary of State; for though four years have elapsed, nothing has been done. I trust no further delay will occur, and I also venture to express a hope that another and similar provision of the same statute will be executed by the Quarter Sessions, the payment of the clerks of the peace by salary and not by fees. This power has in only one or two instances been exercised, and yet its existence is of absolute necessity. The taking of fees is attended with great irregularity and proportionate abuse. The difference in various counties is hardly to be believed. Thus taking the sum of the different fees to the clerk on commitment, fine, acquittal; we have for Durham, 3*l.*, Dorset, 4*l.* 10*s.*, Essex, 2*l.* 4*s.*; Havering atte Bower (a manor well known for its very peculiar customs, one of which is the right claimed by the Lord to appoint Justices) no less than 6*l.* 13*s.*; in the same manor the clerk has 3*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* for an acquittal, while in Derbyshire only 1*l.* is paid—a difference of between three and fourfold. Such a fee, indeed, ought not to exist at all anywhere or to any amount. [Lord LYNDHURST: Clearly not!] But I am now only speaking of the great diversity in different counties of the fee for the same matter. It is certain that in some places the amount of fees received is 1,500*l.* a year; in some more, even above 2,000*l.*; but it is undeniable that in all cases the payment should be by salary, as the Act plainly intended it should, though the local authorities have thought fit to decide otherwise. Another power given them has been equally disregarded though coupled with a very plain indication of the Legislature's intention, I mean that of choosing for the exercise of their criminal jurisdiction the county court judge as the chairman of Sessions. In Ireland, the assistant barrister is universally so chosen by the magistrates; in England, there have been only one or two instances of it. I am quite sure that, in some cases, as I lately stated in this place, there cannot be more competent chairmen than the Sessions enjoy, such as my late Friend Lord Wharncliffe, in the West Riding, and my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington), in Worcestershire. But, though it would be invidious to notice counties that do not possess the same great advantage, I believe it is the very general opinion both of the bar and of the community, that it would be highly beneficial to the administration of criminal justice, if the suggestion were oftener attended to which the county courts Acts have given; both the Bills that did not pass and the one that did, making the Judge qualified as a justice by virtue of his office. No one probably would wish to interfere with the choice of the Sessions, or to transfer their jurisdiction to another tribunal. But surely the justices ought to consider it as a relief if they can so easily obtain the aid of a learned and experienced person, one bred as a lawyer, and practised also in the performance of judicial duties. The prevention of mistakes would be one result of their taking the course in question; but it would be another advantage that the disputes of the bench with the bar would be wholly avoided, and the profession satisfied in all counties, as they have been in those of York and Worcester.

But I pass on to the other parts of this extensive subject after the commencement of procedure, with which I have hitherto been dealing. The offence having been traced, the offender or supposed offender tracked, and his person secured, proceedings must be taken for bringing him to trial. And here, if indeed we have not already in regard to the proceedings before commitment—at least, here we at once experience one of the greatest, if not the greatest defect of our system, the want of power in the executive government to provide for the execution of the law by putting the criminal procedure in motion. I believe, with the exception of America, if our kinsmen have carried over with them this fault in the English law, but certainly in no other country, is the criminal procedure left to shift for itself, its execution being everybody's business in theory, and so nobody's in fact. Rather than argue upon the evils that must inevitably ensue from the want of a public prosecutor, I will give some instances, and these by no means of rare occurrence, though those which I shall specify are more than ordinarily startling; I will give two of the guilty escaping; as many of the innocent being harassed in consequence, and altogether in consequence, of this defect. In the first class, let me mention that a wealthy tradesman at Plymouth, under the pressure of a temporary difficulty, forged a Bill for a large sum, expecting as such culprits generally do, that before it became due, he should be able to retire it; he was disappointed, and arrested. Some one was bound over to prosecute, that is, to give evidence; a true Bill was found, indeed there was not the shadow of a doubt in the case; and the trial came on; but no witness appeared. A poor man in these circumstances would have been certainly convicted, and as the law then stood, hanged. The rich man paid the 200*l.* on the recognisance, kept the witness out of the way, and was acquitted for want of a prosecutor. Again, a baronet in one of the midland counties, worthy baronet I cannot term him, fired a loaded musket at a rev. clergyman with whom he had some quarrel arising from bad neighbourhood. The intercession of friends, or the kindness nature withheld him from appealing to the wrong-doer, who had committed a capital felony, escaped or by some other error, the "rougham

crime was laid as a misdemeanor, and he was not even imprisoned a day. He was safe until he should make another murderous assault. But now see how also the innocent are harassed with imprisonment and prosecution. To say nothing of the case, lately stated to your Lordships, of the poor woman confined in Northampton gaol for some months upon a charge of manslaughter found to be utterly groundless as soon as the bill was preferred, the same learned Judge (Mr. Baron Alderson) not long ago presided at the Central Criminal Court, when the grand jury brought in a Bill for forgery of a will, a bill preferred by a disappointed legatee against the executor. There was an end of the case the instant the Judge saw the will, which the grand jury had never even desired to see when they put the party on his trial. But I recollect being counsel, one of the last times I ever attended the criminal court, for a gentleman of great property, and high respectability, a man of 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.* a-year, who stood in the dock, and was arraigned for wilful murder, because the grand jury sagaciously deemed him criminally accountable for the neglect of one of his bailiffs, who had thrown a rope across a road that was under repair, and forgot to put a lantern upon it, so that unfortunately a woman coming from market was thrown from her cart and broke her neck. The instant that Mr. Baron Wood heard the case opened he directed an acquittal of course, and desired the officer of the court to summon the grand jury into his presence. They were discharged; and his Lordship said, "I am extremely sorry for it; this is a most shameful case." The jury were not even rebuked; but, had they been so, the censure would have fallen exceedingly light, because no one could possibly tell which of them had agreed in finding the bill. Here, however, was this respectable man, who had held up an arraigned hand in the dock with felons, and who went down to the grave with the stigma, which any spiteful neighbour, or adversary at an election, or in the heat of religious controversy, (for he was a Roman Catholic) could fling in his teeth that he had once stood his trial for murder. I will venture most confidently to affirm, that even in the most bitter state of parties, even in the most violent times of faction, no public prosecutor would have dared to put Mr. Blundell upon his trial for the carelessness of his servant. I am old enough, unhappily, to recollect, the violence of party at its height, the violence of principles exasperated by alarm, the proverbially fatal combination of anger and fear. I remember the sedition trials of 1793 in Scotland, at Edinburgh and Dundee, the treason trials of 1794 at the Old Bailey; but I will most confidently assert that neither the Lord Advocate in the one country, nor any known individual minister in the other would have, I will not say dared—but would ever have dreamt—of prosecuting the Lancashire Catholic. The grand jury may have felt the same anger and the same alarm, but they could safely give way to its impulse; their whole proceedings were shrouded in darkness; they were, to all intents and purposes, a concealed, an unknown, an absolutely irresponsible prosecutor. Had I argued by the hour to show the evils, the grievous mischiefs of our defective system, I could never have hoped to prove more effectually than the recital of these instances have enabled me to do, how little security that system affords on the one hand of the law being executed against the guilty, how little safeguard on the other against its being grossly abused to the injury of the innocent. Such instances may be rare; but they should be impossible. Their bare possibility at once condemns the system.

In truth, this plan of leaving the execution of the laws to the party injured alone—for I object not to it, if combined with a responsible functionary—comes down to us from very ancient and very barbarous times. It grew out of the irrational laws and customs of the dark ages. It is the relic of days when the great body of the people were held in property as slaves by a few landowners; when one class of the community was privileged from capital punishment because capable of reading; when men were tried not by the evidence of witnesses, but by the belief of their adherents, ignorant of the whole matter, or by their own skill and courage in single combat; nay, when trial by jury had not yet superseded the ordeal of fire and water. In those dismal times, all crimes could be compounded by the payment of a sum of money, or a number of beasts while money was not yet known; every man's head being valued at a certain price—his Wergeld, as the Saxon called it, his Eric, as the Celt had it—from the sovereign down to the peasant. Nothing was deemed to deserve consideration but the estimated loss of the injured party or his family; and the public interest in the peace being preserved, and crimes prevented, never entered into any one's contemplation. Assuredly, if the practice loses itself in the mists of remote antiquity, it cannot be deemed to claim our respect from its honourable descent. But let us see how it works; how far prosecutions by a competent and a responsible officer are more likely to be carefully conducted, and to ensure conviction, than when left to any one that chooses to undertake them, and to the majority of the grand jury, unknown and irresponsible. In Scotland the Lord Advocate is at the head of the procedure for executing the criminal law; he has his deputies on the several circuits, and there is a local prosecutor, the Procurator Fiscal (deriving his name, I suppose, from advocatus fisci of the civil law) and acting in each county and each large town. Now look at the results of the two systems, as shown in the escape of the guilty, or at least in the comparative numbers of acquittals. I take the returns for the year 1853 as the last we have; but there is no material difference in the proportions of other years. The number of commitments for England and Wales was 27,057; of persons tried, 25,585, there having been 1,472 discharged. Of those tried, 4,793 were acquitted, including those against whom the grand jury threw out the bills; that is to say, the acquittals were between one-fifth or one-sixth of those tried. In Scotland, for the same year, the commitments were 3,756, the persons tried 3,139, the acquittals 279, or between one-eleventh and one-twelfth. Thus the acquittals are twice as numerous in England; clearly showing the difference between proceedings instituted and conducted by experienced, responsible, professional men, and those left to private individuals.

No one wishes, I believe, to see grand juries dispensed with, although in many cases they might safely be, were there in every case a public prosecutor. Of grand juries we have the praises of that extensive dealer in panegyric, Mr. Justice Blackstone, who extols the "excellent forecast of our ancestors," in providing this additional safeguard for the people against the oppression of the Crown; and certainly, as to prosecutions for political offences, there is the greatest reason to coincide with the opinion of the learned commentator. It must, however, be admitted, that even in the case of political offences, the prevalence of party feeling in troublous times is too likely to warp the grand jury, while the official prosecutor, though under the same influence, is also under the check of responsibility, to which the unknown majority of the grand jury is never subject. In the times of excitement and alarm to which I have already referred, I believe I may assert that a grand jury would have been quite as ready to find bills for sedition and treason as the Lord Advocate in Scotland to prosecute; and the Attorney General in England found no difficulty in having the bills found, which led to the famous acquittals at the Old Bailey. But the "excellent forecast" which Blackstone praises was somewhat deficient in discrimination when it left all offences whatever subject to the same most imperfect and unsatisfactory inquiry, and provided no means of securing either soundness of principle or uniformity of practice. Not only is the investigation wholly ex parte, and the tribunal entirely at the mercy of the person preferring the bill, producing whatever witnesses he pleases, and withholding what he desires to conceal, thus making the jury a mere tool in his hands—but the body is of a different construction in different places, local Acts of Parliament in some counties, as Yorkshire, requiring that only freeholders shall serve. The practice also varies. Of course we know not with any particularity what passes within the grand jury room; but from time to time, without any breach of the oath of secrecy, the fact pierces to the public that extreme latitude has been given to the stories of witnesses, and strange notions of evidence have prevailed. Thus it appeared before the learned Judge who heard one case at the Central Criminal Court, that no one had even thought of asking to see the instrument alleged to have been forged. In another case of a noble friend of ours put on his trial for a conspiracy in South America, no one thought of asking the prosecutor when he was examined, what had been his connection with the defendant, else it would have been found that he owed him from 3,000*l.* to 4,000*l.*, and had prosecuted him because he could not obtain a longer accommodation. Then it was only discovered in 1815, that in all Ireland, except one or two counties, the grand juries never in criminal cases thought of examining any witness at all. The civil business there, as we all know, is most closely attended to. The landowners flock to the assizes from all parts, when the presentments are to be made; and extreme care is taken in this financial operation. That the judicial functions are also well performed I cannot doubt; only they appear to have been guided by a most singular notion of the law; for it turned out that all the bills for all offences were found upon the mere reading of the depositions before the committing magistrate, and that no witness ever was called. When this came before my lamented friends—Sir S. Romilly and Mr. Horner—names never to be pronounced by any without profound respect, nor by me without the deepest sorrow for their loss—they saw the necessity of providing a remedy; the rather that this most erroneous practice had become inveterate, and almost all the Judges in Ireland persisted in giving it their sanction. Mr. Horner brought in a Bill the year after, which, with the support of Mr. Peel, was passed, although care was taken to make it enactive and not declaratory, which it manifestly ought to have been, as there was no possible doubt upon the law; but a very misplaced delicacy was shown about declaring that the Judges had for so many years been knowingly allowing an utterly illegal course of proceeding. The result of this malpractice was too apparent. Sir S. Romilly stated—and as no man was ever more scrupulously careful in his assertions, so we may most safely rely upon the statement—that in Ireland the proportion of acquittals to trials was not as in Scotland, one to twelve, or even as in England, one to six, but no less than fifteen to sixteen, there being in that year 192 acquittals in 205 persons tried, and these were all trials for one offence, murder. This is indeed an extreme case of diversity in the proceedings; but there are very considerable differences in other parts of the kingdom. I have stated the average of acquittals in England to be between one-fifth and one-sixth, but the proportion varies in a remarkable manner in different counties. In Somersetshire it is one-third; in Hants and Bucks between one-third and one-fourth; in Sussex one-fifth; in Wilts between one-sixth and one-seventh. Thus whether from the practice of grand juries, or from the manner of conducting prosecutions, the acquittals are more than twice as numerous in some counties than in others.

I have dwelt, my Lords, on the defects of the grand jury, the great want of regular practice, the entire want of responsibility, the necessary uncertainty in which the community must always be left as to the persons by whom the verdict is given. But one fault can never be laid to the charge of this institution; all that passes, how irregular soever, how hardly bearing upon persons touching whom the witnesses have deposed, all is confined to the secret place of inquiry, and unless the witnesses choose to tell what passed nothing can reach the public ear. This is a redeeming virtue which affords some compensation for the evils that must ever attend a secret inquisition. If indeed the grand jury were to receive whatever depositions any persons chose to make before it; if it were to welcome all manner of vituperation against not only the party accused but every one else towards whom a prejudice was entertained, or a spiteful feeling was cherished; if parties absent could be assailed behind their backs, and those who were no parties at all to the proceeding were denounced under colour of charging those who were; and if all that passed were minutely chronicled and fully published to the world—then we might truly affirm that the inquisitorial office was scandalously perverted and abused; that the tribunal so performing its functions had become not merely useless, but pernicious, and far from claiming, as it now does, our respect, might look to be speedily abated as a monstrous and an intolerable nuisance.

The course of the proceedings now brings us to consider the trial of the party, whose seizure and the subsequent preparatory steps we have been following. Here, I grieve to say, we are met with the greatest of all the existing defects, though happily the one most easily removed—I mean the length of time which elapses between the arrest and trial, not uniformly, but unequally in different parts of the country, according to no fixed rule; hardly anywhere apportioned according to any intelligible principle. If a person is charged with an offence that can only be tried at the assizes, he must linger in gaol for above four months in summer, but seven or eight months in winter, unless he happens to be tried in Yorkshire or Lancashire, and then there is generally, not always, the benefit of a winter assize. A poor woman was last July committed to Northampton gaol on a charge of manslaughter, which was found wholly frivolous, so that if a bill was found, which I doubt, she was, as a matter of course, immediately acquitted. But she had lingered in prison upwards of seven months. A poor child of twelve years old was exposed for three months to the contamination of the gaol in the same part of the country, on a charge, a most absurd charge, of manslaughter by the finding of a coroner's jury, he having no power of letting her go on her own recognizance, or indeed of taking bail. As soon as the case was stated, there was an end of it, for the child was accused of starving her mother to death, as an accomplice of her father charged with that offence. Had there been a public prosecutor it is almost certain that neither of these cases could have occurred. Had there been proper frequency of trial, it is quite certain that the cruel infliction upon the unhappy parties, because of their inability to find bail, never by any possibility could have befallen them. Such things, as I said of Mr. Blundell's case, may be of rare occurrence; but it is a disgrace to our institutions that there should be even the possibility of their ever happening.

See, again, how capriciously arrangements are made for securing this grand object, supplying this want of the very first necessity, the speedy trial of prisoners, the prevention of their undergoing, not only the miseries of delay, the sufferings of detention, but the contamination of the gaol. I have already noted that the season of the year makes the difference between a confinement of three or four months, and one of seven or eight. But place operates as powerfully as time to create diversity. In London and Middlesex there are twelve assizes and sixteen sessions; there is now a criminal court once a fortnight. By a late arrangement, which does great credit to the Surrey magistrates, the same may be said of that county. Therefore, on both sides of the river, there is the same frequency of criminal courts; but not below London Bridge—for in Kent there are only the sixteen courts, the central assizes, and the quarter sessions—and even these sixteen only as far down as Greenwich, to which the ambit of the central court extends; the rest of Kent have only six, the two assizes and four sessions. If it be said that the circumstances of the metropolitan counties occasion this superiority over the rest of England, I make answer, first, that this will not account for a large portion of the metropolis itself being excluded from its benefits; and next, that it will in no way serve to justify the withholding of a similar benefit from such towns as Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Sheffield. Is it not quite self-evident that we must, without further delay, remove this anomaly from our system, and take care that the very highest duties of the Government towards the people should be discharged by providing a sufficient number of criminal courts in every part of the kingdom? There must be four circuits instead of two, and the general sessions must be held eight times a year. But even this will not suffice; and as it is most just to avoid increasing more than is absolutely necessary the duties of the unpaid magistracy, I can see no other resource than the County Court Judges, who ought to be invested with criminal jurisdiction, and increased in number. By arrangement of the circuits and assizes, and of those other local judicatures, there cannot be any difficulty in providing everywhere a criminal court once a fortnight. The necessary increase in the number of the fifteen Judges will be much less than might at first sight appear; because the circuits should be differently arranged, as has frequently been proposed. The Norfolk lasts only one half the time that the Northern takes; and it seems very possible by combining it with the other short circuit, the Midland, to relieve two of the judges. If the junction of the Midland would too far increase the Norfolk, a portion of it, say Warwickshire, might be joined to the Oxford. I should think that two additional Judges, and ten added to the County Court Judges, would be sufficient. But of two things I am quite certain—that the Bar can easily supply the number of able and experienced men required; and that the expense which the addition would occasion is a thing not even to be named; a thing which we should be ashamed even to have mentioned for the purpose of repudiating, and with indignation, the consideration of such a topic upon such a momentous question as the speedy trial of persons accused, the removal of the greatest disgrace of our judicial system.

The grievance of imprisonment before trial is such as can hardly be exaggerated by any remarks. The facts, of constant and of universal occurrence, bring it home to our apprehension, let me add, to our feelings, more strikingly than any reasoning. I have given a few instances of long detention where the parties were altogether guiltless. But cases are before our eyes at every assizes and every sessions beyond the bounds of the metropolitan counties, of some weeks' confinement, where the unhappy prisoners were acquitted, and of the same period added to their sentence when convicted, and if taken into the account so as to mitigate the punishment, yet so much suffering thrown away as regards the only object of penal infliction, the example to the public; for only the amount of the sentence is perceived. But it is to the innocent that this calamity becomes the most cruel. See how numerous a body these form—nearly five thousand acquitted in 1853, all of whom had undergone, one with another, five or six weeks' imprisonment, and some of them much more than the utmost term of the sentence which would have been passed on them had they been convicted. I say nothing of the injury sustained by their families during this period of their separation and confinement.

I have more than once opposed in this House, as well as in the Commons, the addition to the number of the Judges in the Supreme Courts; always agreeing with Lord Denman upon the danger of pursuing such a course without absolute necessity. But I take the true principle to be this. Beware of rashly giving more Judges to do the work in arrear; because, as he said, this holds out a temptation carelessly or lazily to perform the judicial duties, in the expectation that more help will be provided. But when new work is cut out for them, the reason of the apprehension entirely fails; and there not only may safely be made an addition to the judicial force, but there must be such an increase if you would have the increased duties performed. The degree in which some of our courts are now, compared with others, so much left without sufficient employment, is certainly first to be considered; and if the proper remedy for this evil be applied, the equal distribution of business, as has been with perfect success tried in Ireland, there will arise from thence an increased facility of holding four assizes in the year without more than the very moderate increase of numbers which I have named.

The procedure has now reached its last stage. The trial is finished, and the convicts are delivered over to the gaol no longer for detention only, but for punishment. I hold it to be quite clear, first, that the same prison rules should be universally followed, being prescribed by the executive Government, and only modified under the local authorities according to particular local circumstances. Secondly, that the system should be framed on principles of strict economy, due care being taken of the prisoner's health, and that no practice should on any account be permitted which shall give a preference to those whose term of confinement is the longest. Thirdly, that the treatment should be, as far as possible, calculated to prevent a repetition of the offence at the expiration of the sentence—and this great object may best be attained by making it reformatory. On the second of these principles, I have to observe three things: that the dietary of the Scotch prisoners having been carefully examined and compared by eminent medical authorities, has been found to the full as well calculated to sustain the health of the prisoner, as the more costly dietary of the English gaols. Next, that the clothes cost more in the aggregate, because the untried prisoners in Scotland prefer saving the wear and tear of their own clothes, and using the prison dress, which the English do not. Lastly, that the rule has almost everywhere been most unwisely laid down of giving a better diet to those sentenced to a longer term—one of the grossest absurdities which can well be conceived, because it gives culprits a direct interest in committing a greater crime, and because the reason alleged for the different treatment is utterly untenable, inasmuch as the better diet takes place at the beginning of the confinement, when we cannot surely suppose the system to foresee how long it is to last. Upon the third head I have to remark how salutary, both as reformatory and as economical, it is that habits of industry should be encouraged in all prisoners, both untried and convicted; and this can only be done by allowing them a proportion of their earnings, and by making their diet to depend in some degree upon their conduct. An unfortunate provision has found its way into the Prison Act of 1839, which has, whether rightly or not, been construed into a prohibition to allow the prisoners any share of their earnings (2 & 3 Vic., c. 56, s. 8). Nothing can be more pernicious than such a regulation, and it ought, without delay, to be repealed. The language of all who are practically acquainted with the subject is strongly condemnatory of it. I need only mention that truly enlightened and benevolent individual, whom to name is to praise, a man worthy of all acceptation, Mr. Clay, the chaplain of Preston Gaol. But the Chester governor bears his testimony also. "Few," he observes, "have returned to prison who had received their earnings during a first confinement." The deputy-governor of Lancaster Castle in like manner tells us that since the Act of 1839 there has been no zeal shown in labour; the convicts are deprived of all interest in their work, and only influenced by the fear of punishment. Mr. Hill, whose experience both in England and Scotland has been so extensive, has the strongest aversion to this ill-advised prohibition; and he instances the effects of promoting industrious habits not only in attaining the greater object of reformation, but even in the article of expense.

It is found that the cost of prisoners in Scotland amounts to 13*l.* a year, while it is in England no less than 21*l.* Now, from what I have already stated, a part of this difference is no doubt owing to the Scotch dietary being considerably lower than the English; yet, as the greater expense of prison clothing, owing to the untried wearing it in the one country and not in the other, must be deducted from the difference, we shall not find more than two or three pounds to be reckoned as the amount which cannot be saved, in equalising the expenses. Thus there is a saving of from 90,000*l.* to 100,000*l.* which could be made upon the 15,750 prisoners in England, if they laboured as they do in Scotland—contributing a portion of their earnings to defray the expenses of their maintenance, but receiving the rest as the wages of their industry. Although I reckon the mere saving of so much money by the prison industry of little importance compared with the inestimable benefit of its reformatory tendency, I yet must be permitted to hold up this fund as quite sufficient, nay, more than sufficient, to meet all the expenses that may be incurred by the grand improvement which is required so urgently in the administration of our criminal law, the additional judges, to give a certainty that the accused shall be speedily brought to trial, the guiltless liberated, and the pains of the law swiftly follow the detection of the offence.

The defects in our system, my Lords, which I have pointed out, and which are partly the abuses introduced in the course of time, but in great part also connected with abrogated laws and obsolete customs, and are in truth the relics of the most uncivilized ages, are deserving of your most serious attention, in order that you may remove them, and effect not merely a salutary, but a needful improvement in our criminal jurisprudence. Those who have best understood our legal polity, were most sensible of its faults; and some who far from being given to change, had experienced times of the wildest innovation, and dreaded all rash reforms, wisely counselled the timely and well-considered extirpation of abuses, as the best security against ill-considered and sweeping reformation. To this class belonged Lord Hale, one of the most illustrious magistrates who ever adorned the bench, but also one of the most wise and enlightened of the writers that have left their works for the instruction and the guidance of mankind. Having lived through the turbulent period of the Commonwealth, when it seemed as if the fact of any institution's existence sufficed for its condemnation, while he retained the aversion to needless change, and the apprehension of perilous experiments, which his experience of those troublous times imprinted on his memory, he also drew from that experience the lesson of wisdom, that nothing is so dangerous as the delay of needful improvement, nothing so apt to fling reform into the worst hands, the hands of ignorant or of desperate men. He has left us this invaluable legacy, the treasure which his judicial and his legislative life had enabled him to amass, his celebrated Treatise of the Amendment of the Law. To my noble and learned Friends I need not cite words which are familiar to them; though indeed in our capacity of lawgivers we cannot too often or too seriously ponder upon them.

"If something considerable (says Lord Hale) for the reformation of what is amiss in the law be not done by knowing and judicious persons, too much may some time or other be done by some either out of envy at the profession, or mistaken apprehensions, or popular humours.—The amendment of things amiss timely by men that understand their business may prevent very much evil; and when the business is begun by such hands it may be too late to allay it. It will have this plausible pretence, that the judges and lawyers will do nothing to the law, and therefore it shall be done by other hands. Such a humour would be more easily prevented by a wise and seasonable undertaking in this kind.

I think it may fairly be asserted that I have shown your lordships no little amount of "things amiss" in the most important of all parts of our judicial system, the administration of the criminal law; and that there are far too real and too grave subjects of complaint, not among such as appeal to the "popular humour," or are moved by "envy at the profession," but in the opinion of knowing and judicious persons, and which call on "judges and lawyers" to prevent the application of the remedy from falling into evil hands, by wisely and seasonably undertaking it themselves. The existence and the heavy pressure of the mischief, I take to be altogether beyond dispute. One need not be a lawyer to perceive it; and the people as well as the judges feel its pressure.

If in this age of enterprise some traveller should fare forth in quest of information rather than adventures, should traverse the sea, penetrate into unexplored continents, and, discovering new regions and strange races, should return to make us partakers of the gratification his curiosity had received; were he to tell of a people not barbarous but highly refined, and living under a system of well-elaborated criminal law, yet wholly without the means of effectually executing it—having no regular plan for tracing offences, or tracking offenders, no security for their ever being brought to justice—leaving the law sometimes to execute itself, or at haphazard placing its enforcement in the hands of those most likely to abuse the office, or peradventure, not to perform it at all—that crime was so capriciously dealt with, that some acts of the greatest atrocity were not deemed fit objects of any punishment, while others of a light and trivial kind were severely visited—that the love of liberty being a distinguishing characteristic of this singular people, and a horror of the bare possibility of suffering by the innocent, reconciling all to the constant escape of the guilty, there was yet exhibited at all times and in every place the spectacle of loss of liberty before guilt was proved—that imprisonment for months was inflicted upon the guiltless—that the sufferings of the accused depended not upon the nature of the charge against them, but upon the part of the country in which they happened to live, or indeed to be arrested—and that the whole arrangements for detention and for trial were local and capricious, both as regarded the treatment of the offender and the description of persons who should accuse and of those who should judge—that in all the most important particulars everything was left to mere blind hazard and ever-varying caprice. Surely, surely, this tale would at once be rejected with incredulous scorn, and the traveller ranked with Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, as recounting things not only untrue, but impossible, because no such nation as he had described could exist. Yet he had only given an account, and not an exaggerated account, of this country at this time. But this country cannot submit to continue in this state for any longer time. It is now just a quarter of a century since I related in the other House of Parliament the voyage of the same traveller, and his narrative was not without a useful result; it was the foundation and the origin of local judicature. On the close of the relation I presented the County Courts Bill, which, after some unfortunate delays, became the law of the land, and gave to England the inestimable benefits of cheap and speedy justice, but in civil suits alone. Let me indulge the hope that this new journey of the same traveller may be attended with the yet more valuable result of local criminal judicature, the effectual execution of the criminal law, and the rescue of the community on the one hand from the escape of the guilty, and on the other from the suffering of the innocent.

My Lords, I grieve that I have found it necessary to bring this great subject forward in the absence of the Chief Justice; but I found upon inquiry that my noble and learned Friend cannot leave his circuit before the recess, and I considered it my duty to run no unnecessary risk of being prevented from laying the whole case before Parliament. I cannot tell how soon I may be summoned from hence. Indeed, almost everything that one now does in this kind is of a testamentary nature. Alas, I said so, when a few months ago I communicated some of the statements I have now made to my loved and revered friend the late Chief Justice of England in the last letter I wrote to him. Unhappily, it has been my fate to survive him; but for how long is most uncertain; and I have deemed it an imperative duty to bequeath these proposals, with the reasons which support them, to my brethren and my country, while I yet can perform that duty, and before I shall have sunk into feeble, and unreasoning, and narrative age.

I move you to adopt these Resolutions, which embody my statement, my proposal, and my argument.

Moved, to resolve—

1. "That it is the Duty of the Government to provide effectually for the Execution of the Criminal Law, by the Discovery, the Seizing, and the Prosecution of Offenders;

2. "That the local Police Establishments ought to be under the direct Superintendence and Control of the Government, [*as far as possible in concert with the local Authorities]; and that the same Rules should, as nearly as local Circumstances will permit, be everywhere applied:

3. "That the Appointment of a regular Constabulary Force should be obligatory upon the local Authorities:

4. "That in addition to such regular Force a reserve Force ought to be maintained of Persons with moderate Pay, to be called out for a short Time yearly in order to be inspected and trained, and to be bound to serve when required by the Magistrate:

5. "That a sufficient number of Stipendiary Magistrates should be appointed in the other Towns of considerable Size, with the Powers and Duties of those appointed for London and Middlesex, so far as these Powers and Duties relate to the Examination and Commitment of Persons charged with Offences, and to the Criminal Jurisdiction vested in them:

6. "That the Prosecution of Offenders should be intrusted to an Officer appointed by the Government, with such Number of subordinate Officers as may be required for conducting Prosecutions in the Counties and larger Towns; but that until such a Measure can be adopted, it is expedient to appoint Barristers who shall advise upon and conduct the Prosecutions in the Central Criminal Court and the Courts of Quarter Session of Middlesex and Surrey:

7. "That the public Prosecutor should in all the graver Cases, as the Pleas of the Crown and Forgery, proceed by Bill before the Grand Jury; but in other Cases should, at his Discretion, be allowed to proceed upon Commitment by a Stipendiary Magistrate, without any Bill found:

8. "That Assizes should be holden Four Times a Year in each County, and Quarter Sessions so frequently and at such Times relatively to the Assizes as that a Court of Criminal Jurisdiction shall sit once a Fortnight in each County:

9. "That to equalise the Business, Counties may be divided and Parts of different Counties united for the Purposes of Trial, and that Persons may be tried at the Option of the Public Prosecutor either in the District where the Offence is alleged to have been committed or in an adjoining District:

10. "That the same Criminal Jurisdiction should be given to Judges of the County Courts as is at present possessed by the Quarter Sessions of the Peace, that this Jurisdiction should extend over the District subject to their Civil Jurisdiction, and that the Justices of every County may be relieved from the obligation to hold Sessions oftener than Four Times a Year, whenever it shall appear that beside those Four Sessions and the Assizes there is sufficient Number of County Court Criminal Sittings to give Two Criminal Courts monthly in the District:

11. "That a reasonable Sum for Trouble and Expenses should be allowed to all Persons summoned to attend as Petty Jurors on any Criminal Trial:

12. "That the Costs of every Person tried and acquitted, or discharged for want of Prosecution, should be paid out of the County Rates on Certificate of the Court before whom he was tried or brought for Trial or of the Magistrate by whom he was discharged; [*and that the committing

Magistrate should have power to certify what Witnesses at the public expense may be brought to the place of trial on the Prisoner's behalf:]

13. "That in all Prisons Arrangements should, as far as possible, be made not only for separating the untried from the convicted, but for separating different Prisoners of both Classes:

14. "That Imprisonment should, as far as possible, be accompanied with the Means of giving Work to those who are willing to work, and whether untried or sentenced to Imprisonment without hard Labour; that all the Earnings of the untried should belong to them, and to the Convicts a Portion upon their Discharge:

15. "That a Discretion should be vested in the Governors, Chaplains, and other Superintendents of Gaols, of improving the Diet of Convicts according to their Demeanour and Industry:

16. "That, subject to the Control of the Superintendents, with the Advice and Consent of the Chaplain, Prisoners may be employed as Assistant Teachers in the Prison:

[* 17. "That the Dietary of Prisons ought never to allow more to Convicts in proportion to the Term of their Imprisonment; and that in respect of Diet regard should be had, as far as possible, to the Industry and other Demeanour of the Convicts under their Sentences:]

[* 18. "That Justices of the Peace, in all Cases in which they now have Power to take Bail, and Coroners in Cases of Manslaughter, should have the Power of allowing any Person accused to go at large upon entering into his own Recognisance to appear and take his Trial; and that in Cases of Manslaughter Coroners should also have the Power to liberate upon Bail."]

[* Additions made on the 26th and 30th of March.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said he could not, even in a very slight degree, follow his noble and learned Friend through the important subjects to which he had so lucidly and ably called attention; and if he did not attempt to do so he trusted that his apology would be that the only notice which his noble and learned Friend had given was his intention to call the attention of the House to the subject of criminal procedure. Of course, on a subject so vast, and involving such important considerations, it was impossible he could be prepared to follow the able, lucid, and long—but not too long—statement of his noble and learned Friend. He (the Lord Chancellor) could only say that with the great bulk of those observations he most entirely and most heartily agreed. As to what was the fittest and most practicable remedy opinions might differ, and it would not become him to offer off-hand any confident opinion. With regard to some of the observations, he must express his entire concurrence. In the first place, the organisation of the police throughout the country, that one policeman should have jurisdiction on one side of a hedge and another on another was a perfect anomaly and almost seemed to be contrived to secure impunity to criminals. Government had turned their attention to the subject, and last year the noble Lord now at the head of Her Majesty's Government had brought in a bill for the purpose. Whatever the defects of that Bill, he (the Lord Chancellor) must express his regret that the measure had not passed into law. He also trusted that some measure without the defects of the bill of last session might be eventually adopted with regard to criminal prosecutors. He agreed in the abstract that the existence of such functionaries would be attended with great benefits; but when his noble and learned Friend spoke of a single public prosecutor he (the Lord Chancellor) could hardly think that 500 would be sufficient to discharge the duties of such officers; because, to make the system efficient, one or more would at least be required in all the large towns and more important districts. He believed, however, that in addition to such functionaries the wants of the country would require the power of proceeding as was now done. It might be the relic of a barbarous age, but he could never believe that it would be consistent with the feelings of the country that on great questions it should be left to any Officer of the Crown to say whether any offender should be prosecuted or not. In the case of murder, for instance, the institution of the coroner, which was a popular institution, was the means by which the public always felt that they had the power of bringing a delinquent to justice even if the magistrates did not choose to do so. He must, therefore, guard himself from assenting to the suggestion that the institution of public prosecutors would be a safeguard against many of the evils which his noble and learned Friend had so ably exposed. To take his noble and learned Friend's illustration. The case of a man committed for forgery, against whom a true bill was found; but when the case came on for trial a witness was not forthcoming, and the culprit escaped, he did not see how a public prosecutor could remedy that, or that there was any remedy except by keeping the witnesses in close confinement until they were wanted. He believed that his noble and learned Friend would agree that this remedy would be worse than the disease; but otherwise any criminal who could prevail upon a witness to absent himself would escape the public prosecutor just as easily as he did at present. With regard to the increase of the number of the assizes and sessions, he was much inclined to agree with his noble and learned Friend and to think that, to some extent, an increase might be not only desirable but practicable. Here again, however, it must be borne in mind that the question was but a balance of the inconveniences, and that as long as they had trial by jury they would always find it extremely difficult in small countries to secure juries oftener than at present—[Lord BROUHAM: What if jurymen were paid?] There were once paid juries in the Exchequer Court, but they were most unpopular, and the measure which abolished them gave great satisfaction. He entirely agreed that great grievances arose from delay; but unless they had a Court constantly sitting in every town all over the country, to dispose of the cases as they arose, there must always be delay. It was a case of the balance of how much; but he was prepared to say that Government ought to take into consideration, and would no doubt take into consideration, the question whether it would not be possible to have the advantage of additional assizes and sessions. He trusted that it would not be supposed that he was answering or commenting upon the observations of his noble and learned Friend, for he felt that he could only discharge the last most imperfectly. He could only express his general concurrence in the observations of his noble and learned Friend, and in the truth of his proposition that something ought to be done in the matter.

Further Debate upon the said Motion was put off, sine die.

MILITIA SERVICE—QUESTION.

COLONEL CLIFFORD said, the House was no doubt aware that by the Bill which was passed, during the Government of Lord Derby, to embody the militia, the then existing provisions on that subject remained unaltered; the militia were to be embodied only in case of invasion, or imminent danger thereof. On the breaking out of the war, it was thought expedient to obtain the services of the militia; and a Bill was passed on the 12th of May last Session, and since the passing of that Bill a great part, indeed the great majority of the militia regiments had been embodied. In the course of last week some observations were made in another place which had cast some doubt on the legality of that proceeding. Now, it was highly important that that question should immediately be set at rest, as the minds of the militiamen had been very much excited about it, and an impression prevailed amongst them that they had not been fairly dealt with in reference to this matter. He wished, therefore, to put this question to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department—whether, in his opinion, the Act of the 12th May, 1854, had not deprived any militiaman, whether enrolled before or since, of any right to claim his discharge, by reason of the embodiment of the militia without the existing danger of invasion?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, in reply to the question of the hon. and gallant Member, I beg to state that by the Act of last Session, 17 Vict. c. 13, after reciting that by the former Militia Acts the militia could only be embodied in cases of actual or apprehended invasion, or rebellion, or insurrection, it was enacted that whenever a state of war exists between Her Majesty and any foreign power, it should be lawful to call out and embody the militia. A doubt has recently been suggested, though I do not know upon what grounds, whether the provisions of the Act of last Session apply to militiamen enrolled before the passing of that Act. Upon that point the Secretary for War has taken the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and Her Majesty's Government are advised that the Act of last Session, authorising the embodiment of the militia in times of war, applies as well to militiamen enrolled before, as to those enrolled after, the passing of the Act.

CHINESE COASTING TRADE—QUESTION.

MR. GREGSON said, he begged to inquire of the noble Viscount the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the notification from the Board of Trade of the 12th instant, published in the London Gazette of the 13th, on the subject of the coasting trade in China, whether the coasting trade in China by British ships is thereby extended beyond the five ports named in the Treaty of 1842; if so, whether British ships might proceed at once under the local authority from Amoy, without waiting for the sanction of the Imperial Government at Pekin; and, whether goods sent coastwise in British ships would be admitted at the same duty as goods imported in Chinese vessels?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the information which the Government had received on the subject was vague and imperfect. It appeared that the local government at Amoy had granted certain privileges to British vessels engaged in the coasting trade; but Her Majesty's Government did not know whether the privilege extended beyond the five ports, or was confined to them. It did not appear to be granted by Imperial authority, but simply by the local authority of Amoy. The Government had received no information as to whether goods conveyed by British shipping would be liable to a higher rate of duty than goods carried in Chinese ships.

TOOLS FOR THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA —QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance whether any trenching tools of a superior description to those originally sent out have been forwarded to the army of the Crimea, or whether the Board of Ordnance is still prepared to maintain that the tools originally sent out were of the best description that could be obtained in this country?

MR. MONSELL said, that in order to give a satisfactory answer to that question he must first call attention to the fact that a large proportion of the tools supplied to regiments were supplied, in the main, by the colonels of the regiments, not by the Board of Ordnance. A certain portion of the regular troops were supplied by the Board of Ordnance, and the whole of the engineering troops were supplied by them. In May last, circumstances arose which gave occasion to the statement which he (Mr. Monsell) made at that time. A complaint was made by a board of officers of the Guards, who were then stationed at Seutari, of the quality of the tools. At that time the patterns of the tools in the Tower and at Woolwich were inspected, in his presence, by Sir John Burgoyne and several persons who were presumed capable of forming a sound opinion on the subject, and they declared them to be excellent. He found that the tools had been supplied almost altogether from the stores at Woolwich, and that, so far from their being of an old or obsolete pattern, they were obtained, part of them in the year 1845, but mainly in subsequent years; and that the patterns, according to which they were procured, were those which had been arranged by the board of officers which sat at the Tower in 1827, to revise the engineers' tools. On the 2nd of last August he received a letter from Sir John Burgoyne, stating that he found, in a letter from Varna, that there were no complaints of the Ordnance tools, but that, on the contrary, they were considered to be very good; but he stated that the tools supplied to the pioneers of some of the regiments, which were not supplied by the Ordnance, were very bad, and had caused a great outcry. He (Mr. Monsell) never heard any more about it until certain statements recently appeared in the newspapers, on the authority of Captain Shakspear, and of a gallant General, and he found, then, that there had been three or four reports sent from Varna and Sebastopol, complaining of the tools. He immediately sent for one of the largest railway contractors in England, who kindly placed at his disposal a most intelligent man, his foreman, to whom he (Mr. Monsell) submitted the patterns of tools taken from the store at Woolwich, and requested him to examine the quality and character of them. That gentleman had made some very valuable suggestions as to the improvement of their pattern; but he said the quality of the tools was excellent. On the other hand, he (Mr. Monsell) should be dealing unfairly with the House if he did not mention that, only one hour before, Major Lovell, of the Royal Engineers, who had been in the trenches before Sebastopol, and had returned home from ill-health, informed him that the tools he had seen used by the sappers before Sebastopol were extremely bad; that he had not only witnessed how they broke in the men's hands—which might have occurred from the men not understanding how to use them properly—but that he had actually broken up some of those tools, and had found that in one pickaxe there was hardly any steel, and that it was extremely bad. He (Mr. Monsell) immediately requested Major Lovell to proceed to Woolwich and to collect some of the tools, to test them, and to report upon them, whether he considered them to be of that same bad quality, or whether he considered them good. When Major Lovell should have made his report the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie) might renew his question; but at present, with such conflicting statements, although he (Mr. Monsell) could not doubt there were a great many bad tools among them, he had not yet been able to ascertain who was in fault for their badness.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that while the camp was at Chobham, he believed a Commission was appointed to sit upon the quality of the tools; and the question which he wished now to put was, whether such a Commission did sit, and whether they did not decide against the tools, and whether the tools on which they so decided had been sent to the Crimea?

MR. MONSELL said, in answer to the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he never heard of the Commission; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman would be so good as to renew his question on Monday, he would, in the mean time, inform himself upon the subject.

CROWN CLAIMS—DUCHY OF CORNWALL —QUESTION.

MR. BELL said, he had to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General whether any and what progress had been made towards a settlement of the rival claims of the Duchy of Cornwall and the Woods and Forests to minerals below high-water mark; also, if any arrangement has been proposed by which leases or licences can be granted pending the settlement of these claims to parties desirous of working mines in the disputed localities, or what prevents such an arrangement being entered into?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that some progress was making towards the settlement of the question. It had been proposed by the law officers of the Crown that a Bill should be brought into Parliament to make an arrangement for granting leases while this dispute was pending. That proposition was, however, at the suggestion of the officers of the Duchy, postponed, in the hope that the negotiations which had been commenced would dispense with the necessity of it.

TREATY WITH SARDINIA—QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, he begged leave to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government intend, previous to bringing before Parliament the Supplemental Treaty, by which Her Majesty engages to lend 2,000,000*l.* to Sardinia, to lay before the House papers showing the condition of the finances of that country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no doubt of the competency of Sardinia to make the arrangement which she has entered into for paying the interest of the amount so to be advanced; and I have no particular information to lay before the House touching the condition or finances of that country, which are matters of general notoriety, and of which the hon. and learned Gentleman may readily obtain information.

MILITIA BOUNTY—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STUART had to ask the Secretary for War, whether the remainder of the 6*l.* bounty promised to all militia recruits (on their enrolment) will be paid to those men who have lately been discharged, as married men with large families.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL replied, that the bounty of 6*l.* given to militiamen was given in consideration of a service of five years, and was paid in instalments, spread over five years; of course, when they were discharged before that time, they would not receive any balance or bounty which might otherwise accrue from the time of their discharge.

QUEEN'S MESSAGE—CONVENTION WITH SARDINIA.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON acquainted the House, That he had a Message from HER MAJESTY to this House signed by Her Majesty: And he presented the same to the House, and it was read by Mr. SPEAKER (all the Members of the House being uncovered), and is as followeth:—

“ VICTORIA R.

“ HER MAJESTY thinks it right to acquaint the House of Commons that She has concluded, in concert with His Majesty the Emperor of the French, a Military Convention with His Majesty the King of Sardinia, whereby His Majesty the King of Sardinia engages to furnish and keep up, for the requirements of the present War, a body of Fifteen Thousand Men, organized as is therein stipulated; and, with a view to facilitate the execution of the said Military Convention, Her Majesty has, by a Supplementary Convention concluded with His Majesty the King of Sardinia, undertaken to recommend to Her Parliament to enable Her to advance, by way of loan, to His Majesty the King of Sardinia, the sum of One Million Pounds sterling, of which sum, Five Hundred Thousand Pounds sterling shall be paid by Her Majesty as soon as possible after the assent of Her Parliament shall have been given thereto, and the remaining Five Hundred Thousand Pounds at the expiration of Six Months after payment of the first sum.

"HER MAJESTY has further engaged to recommend to Her Parliament, to enable Her, if the War should not have been brought to a close at the expiration of Twelve Months after payment of the first instalment of the above-mentioned Loan, to advance to His Majesty the King of Sardinia, in the same proportions, a like sum of One Million of Pounds sterling.

"The Government of His Majesty the King of Sardinia undertakes to pay interest on such Loan or Loans, at the rate of Four per cent per annum, of which one per cent per annum shall be for a Sinking Fund, the said interest to be calculated and payable in the manner in the said Convention stipulated.

"HER MAJESTY has directed a Copy of these Conventions to be laid before the House of Commons, and She relies on the zeal and public spirit of the House of Commons to concur in enabling Her to make good the engagements which She has contracted with Her Ally."

Ordered—That Her Majesty's said most gracious Message be taken into consideration upon Monday next.

GENERAL FAST DAY—THE SERMON.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he rose to make a proposition, which he was sure would be assented to by all who had enjoyed the advantage of hearing on Wednesday that most eloquent and sensible discourse which was preached before the House of Commons at St. Margaret's, Westminster, by the Rev. Henry Melvill. That sermon must have so impressed itself on the minds of those who heard it as to make any further record of it unnecessary than that which remained in their memory; but considering the admirable nature of the topics selected, and the excellent manner in which they were handled by the rev. preacher, the House would think it desirable that not merely should their thanks be given to him, but that it should be printed for the benefit of those who had not the advantage (which most of them had enjoyed who were now present) of hearing the sermon. He therefore moved that the thanks of the House be offered to the rev. gentleman, and that he be requested to print the sermon.

MR. DISRAELI said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the noble Viscount, and at the same time to express the thanks of Gentlemen who sat on his side of the House, and who were present on the occasion to which the noble Lord had adverted—to the rev. gentleman for the animated and impressive discourse which he had delivered before the House on Wednesday, on a most important occasion, in their parish church.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente—

"That the Thanks of this House be given to the Reverend Henry Melvill, Bachelor in Divinity, Principal of the East India College, Haileybury, Lecturer of Saint Margaret's Lothbury, Chaplain of the Tower, for the Sermon by him preached upon Wednesday last before this House, at Saint Margaret's, Westminster, and that he be desired to print the same."

And that Viscount PALMERSTON and Sir GEORGE GREY do acquaint him therewith.

SPECIAL COMMISSIONER OF INCOME TAX—QUESTION.

On the Motion that the House at its rising adjourn to Monday next,

MR. MACARTNEY said, he begged to ask whether it was true that a gentleman, Mr. A'Court, had been appointed Special Income Tax Commissioner for Ireland? There were on the Irish redundant list three gentlemen under forty-eight years of age, who were fully qualified to fill the situation vacant by the removal of Mr. O'Flaherty, and who were receiving, one, Mr. Norman Savage, 400*l.* a year; another, Mr. Hutchins, 585*l.* a year; and a third, Mr. Mulvany, 400*l.* a year. He thought that when such vacancies were to be filled up that gentlemen fully competent, and who were experienced as public servants, would be preferred to those who were inexperienced and who were not before in the public service.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the number of Commissioners had been reduced, and there having been a vacancy, this gentleman seemed to him a very proper person to be appointed.

MR. FRENCH said, he must complain of the system of placing Englishmen in every office of importance in Ireland. He had looked over some of the appointments, and he found that the Lord Lieutenant was an Englishman, the Chief Secretary for Ireland was an Englishman, the Under Secretary, Colonel Larcom, was an Englishman, the Commander of the Forces in Ireland was an Englishman, the Archbishop of Dublin was an Englishman, the Inspector General was a Scotchman, the Second Inspector was an Englishman, the Chief Commissioner of Poor Laws was an Englishman, and the Second Commissioner of Poor Law was an Englishman ; the Architect, the Paymaster of Civil Services, and the Keeper of the Records were Englishmen, and one of the Commissioners of Incumbered Estates was an Englishman. He found, too, that to the office of gaoler to a debtors' prison, lately vacant, the brother-in-law of an English minister was appointed. There were two vacancies for Inspectors of Prisons, and he found that a friend of the Lord Lieutenant had been sent over to fill one of them. It was true that the Attorney and Solicitor Generals for Ireland were Irishmen, but that was because there were no Englishmen at the Irish bar. He did not think the way in which Englishmen administered the relief to Ireland at the time of the famine, and the affairs in the Crimea lately, proved that they were superior to Irishmen as administrators.

MR. WILSON said, that the hon. Gentleman mistook in supposing that the Special Commissionership which had been just filled up was an Irish one. It had nothing to do with Ireland. When the income tax was extended to Ireland, there were two Special Commissioners appointed, but after a year it was found that they were not required, and one was appointed to an office in England, and the other's office was abolished. Sometime ago, a Commissionership of Inland Revenue became vacant, the salary of which was 1,200*l.* a year, and that was not filled up. But it was found necessary, in consequence of the extension of the income tax to all incomes above 100*l.*, to appoint a fourth Commissioner, and hence the appointment in question ; but the duties were discharged in this country, and had nothing whatever to do with Ireland.

BURIAL GROUNDS—QUESTION.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he considered the question as to the burial of the dead of so important a nature, that he thought it right to take this opportunity to ask the Government how they intended to deal with the 60,000 deaths that annually occurred in London. There were but eight cemeteries in the neighbourhood of London, which could not take more than 20,000 annually. There had been 500 burial grounds closed in the country and 150 within the bills of mortality. He considered that the Dissenters were unjustly dealt with, with regard to consecrated ground. In one case that had come under his knowledge a charge was made of 5*l.* for interment in consecrated ground; out of which 2*l.* was paid to the clergyman ; and the same charge was made to the Dissenters, though they had not the services of the clergyman. He thought that the burial boards were sowing the seeds of dissension. In France and Germany there was no distinction whatever in the national cemeteries. Not so in England, for the law said expressly that a Dissenter should not be buried in consecrated ground, and therefore they were excommunicated in Protestant England. Ireland had an Act of Parliament, passed in the reign of George III., by which the cemeteries were common to all. If the rector refused to bury, he must state his grounds of refusal to the bishop and the Lord Lieutenant. Practically there was no exclusion whatever. Dissenters had no objection to consecrated ground ; they thought that consecration did neither good nor evil, but they thought it right that they should have the liberty of burying their friends in consecrated ground, though they did happen to be Dissenters. In many parts of the country great inconvenience had been caused by the closing of burial grounds, and in some cases the bodies had to be conveyed many miles. Then there was another question—the question of compensation to the owners of burial grounds. There was a person named Jones, whose father left him a freehold (New Bunhill Fields) which was used as a burial ground, and brought him in 500*l.* a year ; and now, the ground being closed, he was in a state of penury. There was another case at Manchester. Dr. Burton erected a church at considerable expense, and he had a burial ground which brought him in from 400*l.* to 500*l.* a year in fees. All at once it was closed, because it was within the limits of the borough of Manchester. But was that a reason for robbing a man of his rights ? In such cases he considered that there ought to be compensation. With regard to consecration, he thought it ought to be taken altogether out of the hands of the bishops.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he did not rise to answer the speech of the hon. Member, but merely to answer one part of it which resembled a question—namely, as to where the dead of large towns were to be buried ? His answer was that no burial grounds had been shut up in the metropolis or any other large towns, unless on its being shown that it was dangerous to health. In the greater number of parishes new burial-grounds had (to their honour) been provided, while others chose to make arrangements with the cemetery companies, as at Woking Common and other places. He had no reason to suppose that either in London or in the country any difficulty would be found in procuring sufficient space for burials, if only the different parishes did their duty.

MR. FITZROY said, he had had some experience in the working of the new Act, and he was in possession of some facts that would have controverted the statements of his hon. Friend; but as his hon. Friend had taken the House by surprise in bringing the subject forward to-night, he was not at that moment prepared with the documents. He was prepared yesterday, if the hon. Member could have persuaded the House to make a House to hear him. Of course it was impossible to carry these matters accurately in one's head, but he would state some facts from memory. Now with regard to the provision for the interment of the dead. In the first place, cemeteries had been provided by the City, for the whole of the parishes in the city of London, comprising a population of 120,000. The large parishes of St. Marylebone, St. Pancras, St. George's (Hanover-square), Lambeth, St. Margaret's, and St. Anne's, which contained an aggregate population amounting to 550,000 persons, had also provided new cemeteries. In the country the measure had also been very extensively accepted, and though he could not then repeat the list which he had prepared for use on the former evening, he might say that there were no fewer than from seventy to eighty places which had already obtained ground for cemeteries under the Act. With respect to the Act passed last year, to enable town councils to take measures on the subject, he could only say that the provisions of the Act had been very generally entertained. From the towns of New Windsor, Salisbury, Chichester, and several other towns, applications had been received for the purposes of proceeding under the provisions of the Act. He was surprised to hear from the hon. Member that the parochial system introduced by the Act inflicted any injury or hardship upon the dissenting body. The provision for the ground was made out of the poor rate, and consequently, Dissenters and Churchmen contributed in equal proportions. The question of compensation was a difficult but not a new one; it had been fully discussed in the year 1852, upon the motion of his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of the Board of Works, who proposed to provide compensation out of the Consolidated Fund. So averse was the House, however, to the scheme, that the right hon. Gentleman was not able to find so much as a teller for his motion. Besides, was it fair to compensate persons for having so long kept up a dangerous nuisance? Nothing could be more unwise than to unsettle people's minds by inducing them to believe that fresh legislation was intended: and as no complaints had been made by parties who had carried the Act into execution, he hoped that no further steps would be taken on the subject.

MR. HADFIELD said, he by no means thought that the subject was closed, and he considered that the House ought to be much obliged to his hon. Friend (Mr. Pel-latt) for having taken so much trouble to bring the subject before them. His hon. Friend had in effect been counted out twice upon this motion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought the question referred to by the hon. Member was an important one, and deserving the attention of the House.

MR. MALINS said, he had had many applications made to him by clergymen who had accepted benefices within the metropolis on the understanding that they were to receive certain emoluments for the support of their families, and whose income had been seriously diminished by the operation of the Act in question. For instance, one reverend gentleman had been appointed to a living of 700*l.* a year; and had insured his life and made provision for his family on the supposition that that income would be secured to him. The effect of the Act, however, had been to cut down his stipend to 300*l.* a year, and he was thus reduced almost to a state of penury. The clergy were anxious to know whether it was intended to make them any compensation; and certainly it seemed right that, as the measure was passed for the public benefit, the public should bear the loss.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that by the first Bill it was proposed to make provision for giving compensation; but the proposition was not agreed to by the House, and the other Bill was brought in without any provision for compensation at all. It might be hard upon some persons, but he thought it was the duty of the parishes, if of anybody, to compensate the clergy for the loss of income they had sustained.

The motion for the adjournment of the House at its rising to Monday was then agreed to.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND).

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the Education of the People of Scotland, he would beg to remark in the first place that the Bill was the same in substance as the measure he had had the honour of bringing before the House last year. He did not mean to say that some qualifications had not been introduced in the present Bill, but he should deceive the House if he did not state that the measure was substantially the same as the former one. He did not think, however, it was necessary for him to make any apology for again laying on the table of the House a Bill that had been last year rejected. No doubt that rejection was a matter of considerable disappointment, both to himself and all the lovers of education in Scotland; but the disappointment was qualified by the consideration that, at all events, it had not arisen from any fault or indisposition on the part of the Scotch Members. The proposition for its rejection of the Bill was carried by the votes of English Members, and mainly by the votes of hon. Gentlemen opposite; for the Scotch Members divided in the proportion of thirty-six to fourteen in favour of the Bill. It was made to a great extent a party question, and the ground on which the rejection took place was this, and this alone—that, in proposing a measure for the education of the people of Scotland, they did not continue the exclusive superintendence of the Established Church in Scotland, and the exclusive privilege of members of that denomination to teach in the schools. He now brought forward the measure with the expectation, which was not unreasonable, that on this occasion he might perhaps be more successful. Since the commencement of the Session a Bill for the education of the people of England and Wales had been introduced by a right hon. Baronet on the other side (Sir J. Pakington), for which he was entitled to receive the thanks and gratitude of every philanthropic man in the country, and the right hon. Baronet had made it impossible for any man to stand up and maintain that the education of the people was a thing dangerous to the institutions of the country, and that they could not educate the people safely, except through the intervention of an Established Church. He had read with the greatest admiration and respect the statement of the right hon. Baronet, and he rejoiced to find in it the same earnest conviction which he (the Lord Advocate) felt of the absolute necessity there was for Parliament to address itself to this great work. Last year he had endeavoured to bring the House to the same mind, and he had sought to persuade it that this was no question for sectarian controversy. The right hon. Baronet had taken the same course, and he had powerfully shown the dangers which lay at the very base of society, and which, if left unchecked, might peril its very safety. For

Suppositos cineri doloso."*

They must go down to the very root of the mischief, where the evil commenced, was nurtured, and gathered strength. No mere improvement of existing machinery would suffice. In the Bill which he now sought to bring in, he proposed to do what formed no part of the Bill of the right hon. Baronet. They had lately had a discussion upon the scale on which the ordinance survey of Scotland should be published, and he now proposed that there should be an educational survey. He proposed that inspectors should be appointed, who should survey the whole of Scotland as regarded its educational condition; and that they should report to the House within a limited time upon the whole statistics of the education of the country. The surveyors would be directed to state how many schools were in existence, how many schools were wanting; where they were wanting—what families sent their children to school and what families did not, so that they should have on the table a statement which would enable them, without the slightest difficulty, to put their fingers on the districts where the greatest darkness and ignorance prevailed, and to apply a remedy at once. If that were done at once, and kept up from year to year, would they not make a very great stride in advance? They would thus be able to show the country and Europe to what an extent they were fulfilling the duty incumbent upon them of educating the people, and bringing up the rising generation in the way they ought to be reared. The next provision of the Bill related to the details of the educational system proposed by him to be established. It was necessary for hon. Members to bear

In mind that there was a considerable difference between the positions of England and Scotland with regard to education. In England there was no educational system that was compulsory at all; in Scotland they had ever since the Reformation a system of education which was compulsory. The first question they had to deal with was this—would hon. Gentlemen opposite this year, as they did last year, refuse to allow this measure to pass even a second reading, unless on the condition that the superintendence of the Established Church should continue and remain over the parochial schools in Scotland? According to the system proposed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington), it was not necessary to have the schools under the superintendence of the Established Church. The right hon. Baronet proposed that the school was to be in connection with the denomination that formed the majority in the district; but if that plan were adopted in Scotland, what did they think would be the result. In sixteen counties in Scotland the plan proposed by the right hon. Baronet would place the whole education of those counties in the hands of the Free Church alone, and there were only two counties in which the Established Church was in an absolute majority. In Scotland nine-tenths, or, at all events, seven-eighths of the population were agreed in creed, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, as he had proposed such a scheme for England, it was possible to maintain that with seven-eighths of the people of Scotland agreed in creed, they could put the control of the national schools in the hands of a body that formed so small a proportion of the population? As Scotland was agreed upon this matter, and had voted in the proportion of three to one upon it, and as every borough Member in Scotland had supported it, he asked the House now, in common consistency, if they did not think it desirable in England to give a preponderance to a majority, not to saddle the people of Scotland with the preponderance of a minority. It was altogether absurd to go on arguing this question year after year, while the people were starving for lack of education; and he proposed, therefore, to settle it by doing away with the superintendence of the Established Church, and by giving no sectarian advantage to any class. He conceived, however, that it would be found that the heritors would have a very considerable voice in the matter. Then he came to the question of religious education, and he need scarcely say that he had never been an advocate for secular education, and the last thing he should wish to propose would be the exclusion of religion from their schools. He knew the people of Scotland to be a religious people, and that the thing they had most deeply at heart was the religious education of their children. He fully agreed in the opinion that secular education was a false theory, and was one that could not be applied to Scotland, though, at the same time, he must say that he should rather have secular education than none at all. But it was needless to talk of that, because Scotland would not have secular education; it would only have education with religious instruction at the same time. He proposed to state in the preamble the attachment of the people of Scotland to the use of the Holy Scriptures in the schools, and then to have a provision that certain hours should be set apart for religious instruction in the schools, and that no one should be bound to attend at those hours against his will. He considered that the clause which was known as the denominational clause, which gave power to the Privy Council to contribute towards the maintenance of schools, was very much misunderstood, but he proposed to introduce a provision, that after a particular day the grants from the Privy Council should be altogether discontinued with regard to schools belonging to the classes that ought to join generally in education. As the Roman Catholic schools and the Episcopalian schools formed but a small proportion, he proposed to leave those schools in their present position. By the Bill the salaries of the existing schools would be raised, and the masters would be much raised in position. There would be a power given to the heritors to throw the school upon the assessment if they chose; and until they did so the management would remain in their hands—in other words, in the hands of the ministers and the heritors, but not in those of the presbytery. All experience had shown that the presbyteries, meeting as they did only once a month, did not form an efficient machinery for the management of schools. He would be guilty of an injustice if he did not say that the schools of the Established Church were in a state of great efficiency. The competition which had occurred during the last fifteen years had created a great deal of energy in that quarter, but that did not convince him that a body of clergy that could only visit the schools at intervals was an efficient body for the superintendence of schools of this description. Then, what were they to do with the towns? It was proposed not to leave it at the option of towns to have schools or not as they thought proper, but to make it compulsory upon them to have schools where schools were required. And in regard to country districts where parochial schools were inefficient, it was proposed to make an assessment for the purpose of supplying such schools. In the public schools the Government and the assessment would each contribute half. In the others, the heritors would pay 3*l.*, and the Government 66*l.* It appeared that another Bill had been introduced by an hon. Member, but how would that Bill work? It would certainly extend greatly the parochial schools, but would leave the denominational schools just as they were. It would continue an erroneous denominational system, whereby persons professing substantially the same opinion, brought up their children with the belief that those who went to school at one side of the street differed entirely from those who went to school at the other side of it. He wanted to put that down. He wanted to put down sectarianism. Men agreeing substantially in the same doctrines had by unfortunate events been separated, and it was desirable that the next generation should be taught to abate the animosities that prevailed. It was by no means essential, he thought, to keep up these tests in the towns, and as long as they required to have tests which would prevent any persons but members of the Established Church from being masters in the schools, it was utterly vain to pass a measure. They might, perhaps, set an example, showing that, notwithstanding religious differences might arise, still a system of education might be established which should restore Scotland to her good name, and perhaps be an advantage to the sister kingdom.

VISCOUNT DUNCAN seconded the Motion.

MR. STIRLING said, he should, in the first instance, wish to comment upon the concluding observations of his right hon. and learned Friend. The right hon. and learned Lord said that in dealing with this question he had not been influenced by any peculiar leaning towards the Church to which he belonged. Now, he (Mr. Stirling) desired to enter upon the new struggle which he saw impending in reference to education in Scotland by frankly acknowledging that the conduct of the right hon. and learned Lord had fully borne out his professions. He knew the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had been accused of leaning too much towards the Church to which he belonged, but he must say he did not think that was the case. He believed his right hon. and learned Friend, who belonged to the Free Church, desired to legislate for Presbyterian Scotland generally; and that the subject had been treated by him fairly and equitably. His right hon. and learned Friend had alluded to the large number of Scotch Members who last Session supported the Government Bill, and to the small number of Scotch Members who would support the Bill which he (Mr. Stirling) had introduced. He could not deny that such was the case; but he might, perhaps, be permitted to give a short explanation to them how that circumstance arose. He was sorry to say that it was the habit of a large majority of the Members for Scotland to sit on the other (the Ministerial) side of the House. Nobody regretted that more than he did, and he deplored that natural bent which induced Scotch Members to do so. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not mention the fact that there were some Scotch Members who abstained from giving a party vote. Besides this, there was another reason. The House could not be too soon informed of the fact that in Scotland there was a parochial system, which he, for one, would always defend, and that parochial system did not extend to the towns. It was very natural, therefore, that those hon. Gentlemen who represented Scotch burghs should be anxious to give their support to any system of education which would supply the want which they alleged existed. All the Scotch burgh Members voted therefore for the Lord Advocate's Bill, and also the Liberal portion of the Scotch county Members. He, and those who took the same view as he did, were consequently obliged last year to appeal to their English friends, in order to get rid of a Bill which they conscientiously believed would be injurious to Scotland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman next alluded to the Bill of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), who had introduced an educational measure for England. He (Mr. Stirling) concurred with the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate in admiring the speech of the right hon. Baronet, but he must be pardoned for entirely dissenting from the inference which his right hon. and learned Friend drew from that speech. The right hon. and learned Lord had asked them how they, approving of the views put forward by the right hon. Gentleman, and of the principle of the measure which he had propounded, now opposed a Bill which went to deal in a similar manner with Scotland. Now, his reply to that taunt was to be found in the difference existing between the educational position of Scotland and the educational position of England; but still more in the different ground taken up by the Church in Scotland and the Church in England. As a member of the Church of England, it might, perhaps, be admitted that he spoke with no undue bias against her; but he would yet assert that the position in which the Church of England stood as regarded the question of education was greatly inferior to that enjoyed by the Church of Scotland. As a state institution he did not believe that the Church of England possessed any educational establishment or apparatus whatever. There was no parochial educational system; but in Scotland the Church, from the very beginning of her history, took a lively interest in the education of the people. Indeed, long before the Church of Scotland was settled, it began to inquire into the education of the people, and did all that in it lay to promote that education. For more than two centuries and a half had the Church of Scotland struggled in the cause of education, and she no more considered a parish furnished or complete without a school, than without a church. Therefore, he repeated, when the two Churches presented in their history so marked a contrast, it might be reasonably inferred that that which was fit and proper for one country was not fit and proper for the other. Upon this ground the Church of Scotland deserved much more consideration at the hands of the House of Commons than the Church of England. Those parochial schools had been under the authority of the Church since their establishment, and the right hon. and learned Lord omitted to state, though he did not attempt to controvert the fact, that those schools were in a most flourishing condition. His right hon. and learned Friend had attributed the excellent state of the parochial schools to the competition which had arisen during the last fifteen years, and five minutes after the right hon. and learned Lord said the object of the Bill was to put down that very competition. The right hon. and learned Lord said we do not want to go on disputing on doctrines, but we want something to do the work of education well. But he (Mr. Stirling) must reply that Scotland had that already which did the work admirably. Make that better, if possible, but do not rashly meddle with it in the manner proposed by this Bill. With respect to what his right hon. and learned Friend had said about sectarian differences, everybody who knew anything about the parochial schools in Scotland knew they were not sectarian. The children of all sects, Roman Catholics and others, went to those schools, and no instance had been brought under the notice of that House of any hardship or injustice arising under the parochial system. But, said the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, the measure which he (Mr. Stirling) proposed might improve education in the country, but it would not affect education in the towns. Well, but the answer to that was, that the measure did not propose to deal with the towns, and it would be quite as reasonable to find fault with this measure because it would not improve the state of the army before Sebastopol. He did not attempt to grapple with the question of education in the towns, because he considered that, under existing circumstances, the subject could only adequately be handled by the Government, and it would therefore be presumptuous on his part to attempt it. He would now say no more on his own Bill than this, that its object was to amend those defects in the existing parochial system which, in the last debate on Scotch education, had been so unanimously admitted and deplored, and to avoid all disputed points. His measure had, upon the whole, received that amount of approval which had induced him to hope for its ultimate success. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) said, why not give up sectarian differences, and let them meet on some common ground. He quite approved of that sentiment. There was a common ground, and that was, the education of the Scotch towns. They, on that side of the House, would be happy to go hand in hand with his right hon. and learned Friend in any scheme which he might propose for the better education of the towns. He would like to mention the negotiations which took place between Scotch Members and the Government last year. What was the first thing done by the Scotch Members who sat on that side of the House, and who were opposed to the Government Bill? They held a meeting, and after much anxious deliberation, they waited on the noble Lord then at the head of the Government (the Earl of Aberdeen), and also on the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, now our Envoy at Vienna, and both noble Lords were assured by those Scotch Members that the Government would have their support if they confined the measure to the towns, and they declared that they did not expect the supervision exercised by clergymen over the parochial schools to be extended to the new schools to be erected in the towns. Such had been the language held on both these occasions. As regarded the towns, although there might be a want of education to a considerable extent, he believed that want was grossly exaggerated. Nor did he believe that, in most cases, this arose from the want of schools so much as from the indisposition of parents to avail themselves of them. In Edinburgh there was Heriot's Hospital—a great educational establishment, with a vast revenue, that was every year increasing, and which was under the wise superintendence of the town council of Edinburgh. Those revenues were devoted to educational purposes, without any reference to sect. Now, that was an advantage which, he believed, was possessed by very few of the towns of England. In Glasgow, too, there were abundance of schools, and eminent clergymen of that city declared the great difficulty in the way of education there was, not the want of schools so much as the inability to procure the attendance of the children. Dundee was in the same position. Was there not, he asked—must there not be something to be got at which could not be reached by an Act of Parliament? There had been very great exaggerations in the statements made on this subject. He did not say there did not exist a great necessity for something to be done, but that that something was something other than the measure now proposed. He would, in concluding these remarks, venture to appeal to his right hon. and learned Friend to meet them on more common ground, which he seemed so much to desire. He entreated him to be guided by the opinion expressed by a noble Lord in another place last year—a veteran in the cause of education, and who was its advocate before his right

hon. and learned Friend had yet penetrated the mysteries of the alphabet. Lord Brougham last year said, that the question of Scotch education naturally divided itself into two heads—town and country—and that it ought to be treated in two Bills, and not in one. Let the Government meet them on the point on which there was general agreement—let them deal with the question where there would be no chance of defeat; but if they declined so fair an offer, let them not throw on the Scotch Members, who were willing, up to a certain point, to give the Government their conscientious support, the blame of failure, or of creating those dissensions with which the discussion of this question had been embittered. The Scotch Members who agreed with him had advanced two-thirds of the way to meet the proposal of the Government, whilst the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had not advanced one inch. The liberality of the right hon. and learned Lord reminded him of the Welsh jurymen, who having alone stood out against the verdict which the remainder were willing to pronounce, declared he had never been in all his life shut up with eleven more obstinate men. If his right hon. and learned Friend persevered in his measure, in its present shape, he (Mr. Stirling) trusted that the verdict of the House might be given, this year as it was last, against him.

MR. BAXTER said, as the most recently elected Scotch Member, he must beg to claim the indulgence usually extended by the House to new Members. He would shortly state the reason why he troubled the House on the present occasion, which was, that he had always taken a very deep interest in the question now under consideration. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate needed not to make any apology for calling attention to this subject, for if there was one question more than another—apart from the war—in which the people of Scotland took an interest, which almost engrossed their attention, it was this most important one of education for the people. They looked upon it as of the greatest and most vital importance. He believed that throughout Scotland there was an universal wish to have it settled, and he should be greatly disappointed if the proposal which had just been submitted for their consideration would not be hailed with the greatest satisfaction there—a proposal which, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon.

Gentleman who had just sat down, he (Mr. Baxter) would characterise as being framed in an enlightened and liberal spirit, and, he would add also, drawn up by no unskilful hand. He did not wish to say a single word disparaging to the present parochial schools, which did so much to promote the greatness and the glory of his native land. But the House must remember that, since those parochial schools were established, the circumstances of Scotland had undergone a mighty change. The majority, the decided majority, of the people of that country no longer attended the Established Church, and it could not, therefore, be reasonably expected that they would give their sympathy and support to such a measure as that introduced by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling), which was a mere extension and perpetuation of the existing system. That hon. Gentleman had stated that those schools were not of a sectarian character. It was certainly true that the teaching might not be sectarian; but as those schools were under the surveillance of the presbytery, was it not reasonable to expect they would be looked upon as sectarian in a country where the odium theologicum prevailed to such an extent as in Scotland? The points of difference between the principal religious denominations in Scotland were comparatively of slight importance; but there was a strong conviction in his mind that if they were to devise a more popular plan they must get rid of sectarian tests and exclusive control. He was not a member of the Free Church, but as a Dissenter he strongly deprecated the course taken by hon. Gentlemen of the same polemics as himself, who united with gentlemen opposite holding opinions diametrically opposed to their own, and, by their opposition to the former Bill of the Government, disappointed the strongest hopes of those who understood the feelings and the wants of Scotland. He earnestly and firmly hoped that hon. Gentlemen opposite would receive this measure in the same liberal and candid spirit which gentlemen sitting at his side of the House had received the proposition of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), and that they would allow this just and necessary measure to pass into law.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE said, that as a Scotch Member, he could not help expressing his feelings of gratification at being associated in the representation of Scotland with a gentleman who had evinced so much capacity for usefully attending to the business of their country as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. However, he was compelled to differ from the views of the hon. Member with regard to the merits of the measure now for the second time introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate. He could not but deeply regret that the right hon. and learned Lord had re-introduced the very same Bill as that which had last year given rise to so much difference of opinion, thereby creating an antagonism where no antagonism need exist. With respect to its effect upon the towns, hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House did not pretend to offer any opinion adverse to the proposition of the Government. But they maintained that in Scotland they were possessed of a parochial system established for nearly 200 years, which had worked most beneficial effects for the country; and he would therefore say, before you risk the destruction of that system, give them one which would prove a better. Let them introduce their new system in the towns, and if it proved a more efficient means of extending the blessings of education, then by all means let them adopt it for the whole of Scotland. He entirely repudiated the notion that their opposition of last year was grounded upon party or factious considerations. That opposition proceeded upon the principle that the measure of the Government went to separate religious from secular education. His right hon. and learned Friend had admitted that the present schools were justly undeserving of the opprobrious epithet of sectarian schools; on the contrary, they were open to the whole country, and the children of all denominations willingly attended and received instruction at those schools, and he had never heard of a complaint emanating from a single parent. If they thought it their duty as statesmen to maintain an Established Church as an institution of the country, upon what principle could they deal so heavy a blow against the Church of Scotland as to remove from under its control the schools which formed so essential an element of that institution? With regard to the statistical map to which his right hon. and learned Friend had referred, he gave that proposal his most cordial approval, while he believed that the counties with which he was connected would not come out of the suggested inquiry with discredit. It had been reported that in the three northern counties of Scotland the blessings of education had been extended to more than one-sixth of the population; and it had been proved in the same Report that the number of scholars attending them had gone on rapidly increasing, while the improvement in the system of education was still more remarkable. It had been alleged that the salaries of the schoolmasters were inadequate. Now that remark could scarcely have been applied to the northern counties. He could take upon himself to state that in the counties of Aberdeen, Banff, and Moray the salaries of some schoolmasters ranged to 100*l.* a year, while others reached 120*l.* At the same time, he was by no means disposed to maintain that these salaries might not be reasonably augmented. Unless a measure could be introduced that would give greater satisfaction than the present, do not attempt to deprive the people of Scotland of that admirable system of education which had conferred such great and unquestionable advantages upon the people of Scotland.

LORD ELCHO said, he had not anticipated that the introduction of this Bill by his right hon. and learned Friend would have led to any discussion. He did not rise for the purpose of prolonging the debate by entering at all into the merits of the Bill or of the question of education in general, but, as his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. C. Bruce) had expressed regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have brought in a Bill similar to that which was introduced last year, he (Lord Elcho), as the representative of a Scotch county which was supposed to feel an interest in the question, felt called upon to express the satisfaction he felt that the Lord Advocate had brought in a Bill which, though it might differ in detail from that introduced last year, was in principle the same. He apprehended that the principle of the Bill was this—that it endeavoured to establish, as far as possible, in Scotland a system of universal education. In saying this he did not wish to be misunderstood. He was not at all prepared to deny the great benefits which Scotland had derived from the established schools of that country. His hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) told them that the difference between the Established Church in England and Scotland was this—that, whereas in Scotland there had been a system of schools under the establishment, in England there had been none.

He was not prepared to deny that the Presbyterian body, established upon the ruins of the Roman Catholic Church in that country, had founded schools, but, unfortunately, owing to the odium theologicum which had been alluded to by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) who had spoken with so much ability, Scotland became split up into sects and fragments of sects, and that which was at the time of the establishment of these schools the Church of the whole Presbyterian people of Scotland could not at present, he was afraid, claim the support of more than one-third of the people of Scotland, and the consequence was that the keenest sectarian feeling existed. He felt himself called upon to support the Bill of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate in preference to that of the hon. Member for Perthshire, because the latter would in his opinion have a tendency to perpetuate sectarian differences, which it was most desirable to set at rest. The present measure would establish united education on the ancient Presbyterian basis of the parish schools. It was incorrect to say that the Bill of last year obtained the support only of the representatives of the large towns of Scotland. The fact was, that two-thirds of the Scottish Members voted for the measure proposed by the Lord Advocate, and one-third only for that of his hon. Friend opposite, and that amongst the county Members the latter had but a majority of one in its favour. So that but for the absence of the late lamented Member for Forfarshire (Colonel Maule), who was detained by his duties in a distant region, the number of county Members on both sides would have been equal. Last year, the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was unfortunately defeated, owing to a large number of English Members having come down to vote rather than to hear any discussion upon it. He trusted, however, that upon this occasion hon. Gentlemen opposite would follow the liberal example which had been set them by hon. Gentlemen upon that side of the House in regard to the Bill recently laid upon the table by his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington), and that they would not come down to the House prepared to vote upon the measure until they had heard all the arguments which could be brought to bear upon the subject. Last year almost two-thirds of the Scotch Members voted in favour of the Bill of the Lord Advocate, and that proved that the people of Scotland, unless representative government was a farce, were in favour of the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. When the question came to be discussed and a division taken upon it, he hoped the English Members would bear this fact in mind, and endeavour to pay some respect to the wishes and feelings of the people of Scotland. He wished to guard himself against the supposition that he was in any way hostile to the Established Church in Scotland, but he believed that, by supporting the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (the Lord Advocate), he would be promoting the welfare of the country at large.

Mr. JOHN M'GREGOR said, he had no hesitation in saying he believed that the great majority of the people of Scotland deplored the loss of the Bill of last Session. He had great confidence in that love of justice which characterised Englishmen, and he was confident that, if they would only attend to the arguments that would be used in reference to the present measure, they would vote in favour of it. The existing system of parochial education was utterly inadequate to the wants of the people of Scotland, and he hoped that the English Members would not again be found to vote against an improved measure of education.

VISCOUNT DUNCAN said, he laboured under the disadvantage of not having been a Member of the House when the measure of last year was discussed. If he had been he certainly would have given his cordial support to it. He stood there now in the position of a Member of the Government connected with Scotland, and he knew that every word he said would have its weight with the people of Scotland. He had heard nothing during the discussion to show that an educational measure was not wanted for Scotland; on the contrary, everything combined to point out that such a measure was absolutely required and would confer the most material benefits. He found, according to a carefully-prepared Report of the statistics of crime in Scotland, that in the year 1854, of the prisoners committed there were 9,259 who could not write their names, and 4,474 who could not read. When the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) drew a contrast between the Established Church in Scotland and the Established Church in England, he seemed to forget that the Established Church in England was the Church of the majority, whereas the Established Church in Scotland was not the Church of the majority.

As a member of the Episcopal Church, and strongly attached to his religion, he was always willing to give credit to others for that sincerity of belief which he claimed for himself. The Church of Scotland now no longer represented the feelings of the people, as it did when those parochial schools were established. The measure under consideration proposed a comprehensive and truly national system of education which extended its advantages to the rural districts. The Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Perthshire did not extend to the large towns, because the hon. Gentleman was fully aware of the difficulty of doing so, and he shrank from it. The hon. Member knew that if he extended the operation of his measure to large towns he would have been shipwrecked upon the subject of the test. If they were to have any system of education it ought to be uniform. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate being anxious, as far as possible, to meet the objections of hon. Members opposite, had endeavoured to alter and amend some of the details of the Bill of last Session, in order to conciliate support. It was impossible that the right hon. and learned Gentleman could desert the principles upon which the Bill was founded, because he knew that they were popular in Scotland. The hon. Member for Perthshire had asked the reason why so many Scotch Members eternally sat upon the ministerial side of the House. He (Lord Duncan) would tell him the reason. They sat there because they represented the opinions of the people of Scotland, which were in opposition to those entertained by the hon. Member opposite. He must confess that he admired the principles which animated the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) and the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), when they so ably addressed the House the other night on the subject of English education. They very properly urged the importance of extending the blessings of education amongst all classes in the country, and argued that in proportion as they were advanced, in the same proportion would crime be diminished. Scotland had taken the lead upon this subject of education, and her example was followed by many other countries—Germany and France had imitated them; and the great continent of America had not only imitated them, but had outstripped them in their course. For about 150 years Parliament had almost slumbered upon the subject. It gave him great satisfaction to add his humble voice in support of the Bill, and he congratulated his right hon. and learned Friend upon the success of his efforts upon the subject.

Mr. F. SCOTT said, he objected to the measure, because it was one which proposed to establish a system of education in Scotland the very opposite to that which had prevailed up to the present time—namely, a system without any guarantee for religious instruction. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, in his eloquent speech, seemed to convey a belief that the party with whom he (Mr. Scott) had the honour of acting were adverse to the wider extension of education, but this imputation he utterly repudiated. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded to the measure of the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) as one that was not calculated to do service in the cause of education; and, like a skilful debater, attempted to show that those on the opposite side of the House were the assailants, and that he was the defendant. But the very opposite was the fact; for the right hon. and learned Gentleman was the assailant in endeavouring to upset that good system of education which at present existed in Scotland, instead of trying to perpetuate and improve it. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate said he deprecated all things partaking of a sectarian spirit, and asked them to take common ground. But why did he not take common ground? Those Members on the opposite side of the House were willing to go into a common field with him. Having disclaimed opposition in an apparent spirit of fairness, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was, however, indisposed to go one inch towards meeting them upon common ground, when they were willing to go hand in hand with him. Why, he asked, needlessly abolish the guarantee for the orthodoxy of religious opinions? When the noble Lord (Viscount Duncan) speaks of the amount of crime which existed, they granted it; but he would ask the noble Lord whether he really meant to say that it was in the agricultural districts that the crime was so excessive? He would venture to say that the noble Lord would not assert anything of the kind. What the noble Lord meant, no doubt, to say was, that in those parts where the Bill did not apply there was a large amount of ignorance and crime; and into those parts they were all willing to enter, with the view of doing all that was possible towards the diminution of such crime. They were willing to carry on a system of education at their own expense; but the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was desirous, by his measure, of casting a considerable expense upon the Consolidated Fund. Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman go to that fund, in order to relieve the heritors of the burden which they were at all times willing to take upon their own shoulders? The heritors were willing to support the parochial schools, a system that would be adverse to none, and beneficial to all. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman was willing to do away with that animosity which they all regretted, why did he not come forward and propose some test as a guarantee of the religious doctrines and opinions of the schoolmasters, which would be acceptable to all? Instead of doing so, the right hon. and learned Gentleman accused those who opposed him of being actuated with a feeling in favour of the domination of the Established Church in Scotland, and, with singular inconsistency, said that there was no diversity of creed amongst the great mass of the people of Scotland. If, then, 95 per cent of the people entertained the same belief, and were attached to their religious opinions, in the name of all that was sacred why did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman require from the instructors those guarantees that they entertained the same pure belief as that which had been entertained by their forefathers? There was no nation in the world that had borne so high a character for religious feelings and moral conduct, in the different services of the country, as Scotland had done. Let them take for example the gardeners throughout England, who were raised from the labouring classes. Why, he asked, was it that the gardeners were chiefly selected from Scotland? Simply because they were blessed with a better education. That fact alone was sufficient to show that in the rural districts of Scotland there was an efficient system of education. If the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate were really anxious that the Presbyterians in Scotland should be well instructed in religious doctrine, let him not propose that religious instruction should be optional, and that no guarantee for the Christian creed should be required in the instructors of youth. He regretted that the measure contained nothing relating to reformatory schools and he consequently feared that it would not be acceptable in its present shape to the people of Scotland. He hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would so modify his measure as to make it acceptable to both sides of the House.

MR. COWAN said, that there existed in Edinburgh schools which had been established by funds taken some ten or twelve years ago from Heriot's and other hospitals, in which a most excellent education was given, which he was most anxious to see extended through the length and breadth of Scotland. There no test was required, and the schoolmaster was selected not only for the information he possessed, but for his capacity to impart it. He heard with great pleasure that it was intended to raise the salary of the teachers, because it was, in his opinion, a disgrace to a nation that its instructors should receive barely the remuneration which its common labourers received. Even the rooms of their dwelling-houses had been restricted to two, whilst the maximum salary of the shoolmaster was fixed at 34*l.* His right hon. and learned Friend's Bill proposed to replace this state of things by a thoroughly equipped and efficient system holding out premiums to individuals to devote themselves to the acquisition of knowledge, and the best methods of communicating it. It was deplorable to see different sects contending for the education of the young in a sectarian spirit. He trusted the Bill would be received with the favour which its great importance in regard to the most vital interests of the country demanded. His right hon. and learned Friend had stated that he was a member of the Free Church, and so was he (Mr. Cowan), and having heard it stated that this Bill was brought in to advocate the educational system of the Free Church, he would state that he firmly believed that in a pecuniary point of view it would have the contrary effect. The Free Church had done a vast deal for education, having built 500 or 600 schools, but if this Bill became law a vast number of those school-houses would become of no use, for they had in many cases been built from the opposition of proprietors in remote districts, and would not be available under the new system. He believed on the whole that the Bill would promote greatly the national good, and he begged to express his most cordial thanks to the right hon. and learned Member for what he had done.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he cordially congratulated his right hon. and learned

Mr. F. Scott

Friend, the Lord Advocate, on having had the courage to grapple with this important and difficult subject, and he entertained a confident hope that the Bill now brought forward by the right hon. and learned Lord would meet with a more favourable reception than the measure he had introduced on the same subject last year. There was a clause in the Bill of last year which provided for the arbitrary dismissal of schoolmasters by the Education Board, and as that provision was considered very objectionable he hoped it had been modified in the present measure. There was no doubt the system of education which had hitherto existed in Scotland could not be extended, and it was therefore desirable to establish a plan upon a new basis, instead of endeavouring to force upon the people a system to which they entertained the strongest objection.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the clause to which the hon. Gentleman had referred had been considerably modified.

MR. WALPOLE said, he did not rise for the purpose of saying anything against the introduction of the Bill, but merely to suggest whether, with the view of avoiding those hostile collisions, especially with regard to religious questions, which had been referred to by Scotch Members, it would not be worth while to draw a distinction that had been recommended by a noble Lord in "another place," who was perfectly well acquainted with the state of Scotland, and was one of the greatest advocates of popular education in either House of Parliament—a distinction between the education required for the more rural parts of Scotland, and the education required for the large towns of that country. Had such a distinction been drawn, instead of meeting with any opposition on the part of his (Mr. Walpole's) Scotch friends, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have received their cordial support. But if by bringing in this Bill they introduced the discussion of those very religious differences which they desired to see abolished, surely the blame must rest rather with those who caused the discussion upon such religious differences than with hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House, who were as anxious as hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial benches to reconcile those differences as far as they possibly could, and still carry into effect the general object of extending education wherever education was required. He entirely agreed with the observation of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan), that the salaries to Scotch schoolmasters were miserable pittances; and the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) provided for the increase of those salaries, to from 50*l.* to 60*l.*, with the concurrence of those heritors of Scotland who were to be charged with that increase, in all cases where the stipend was less than 35*l.* The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had described the principle of the Bill now proposed as establishing a united system of education and doing away with sectarianism. But he (Mr. Walpole) understood that united education went on at this moment in the parochial schools, and he was utterly at a loss to know why it should not continue to go on when they had improved it. Looking, therefore, at the points of difference between the two sides of the House, he thought they might almost all of them be got over by making a distinction between the education to be provided in the rural districts, and that to be provided in the populous towns. Considering that the existing system had prevailed in Scotland for nearly two centuries—that that system had sent into the world many of the best educated men, and men who had risen to the highest station in consequence of that education, and that that education was probably better than any system that had hitherto been established elsewhere—considering these things, was it wise—he asked, to offend a large portion of the people of Scotland upon one point respecting which they were not agreed, and would it not be more advantageous to say,—“Instead of superseding, we will extend the system, where it is deficient we will supply the deficiency, but we will not outrage the feelings of a large portion of the inhabitants of Scotland. We still think there ought to be a religious test applied, that their parochial schools ought to be preserved, and that the control of the presbytery ought to be still maintained in those schools?” Before concluding, he could not help making one or two other remarks with regard to what the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had urged for the foundation of this Bill—namely, the introduction of another Education Bill by his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington), which was to apply to England. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate thought that the principle of that Bill would entirely justify him in pressing upon the House the measure he proposed that evening. But the distinction between the two was plain and obvious. For whilst in Scotland they had this system of education, which had prevailed for so long a period as he had named—a system which had succeeded admirably throughout that country, and which only required extension and improvement—in England they had no such system at all. There, then, was ground for drawing a plain and broad distinction between the measures which should be introduced for the two countries. Further, the discussions which were likely to take place both upon the measure of his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington) and that of the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) would naturally lead to a full consideration of all the principles which ought hereafter to be adopted upon the great question of education. One point upon which there would be a very general, if not unanimous concurrence in that House was, the wish to diffuse education to the fullest possible extent for the benefit of the people, alike of England and Scotland. But there were other points than that to be considered with reference to those Bills. The question which might be asked, whether these measures would not lead to greater evils than those they were designed to remedy; whether they would not increase the evils of our church-rate system by imposing a rate for educational purposes; and whether, if collision now took place in consequence of the levy of compulsory rates for the repairs of the church, they would not have to resort to the only other alternative before them, that of adopting a purely secular system of education. These matters must be discussed before they could say that the principle of his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington's) Bill, or of that of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), might be taken as a settled point upon which they could build a system of education for the people of Scotland, and he thought that the arguments of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would hardly justify him in using the principle supposed to be contained in those Bills as applicable to the Bill now introduced for Scotland, particularly when the differences between the two countries were so great as they were known to be.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I must congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and the House, on the tone and temper which has pervaded the discussion that has ensued upon the Motion he has made. I think there appears to be a unanimous agreement upon some particular points of this question, and I trust, when the Bill is laid upon the table, and its details are brought under examination, that there may be a nearer approximation of opinion on this subject than, on the first statement of the objects of the measure, the House might have been disposed to anticipate. Indeed, on some general principles there already seems to be a ready acquiescence. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last has very candidly admitted—what I am sure he would be the last person to deny—the great importance of extending to the whole of Scotland an effective system of education. Scotland has long taken the lead in this movement. She stood pre-eminent ages ago for her excellent general system of national education, adapted as it was to the circumstances in which it originated. Those circumstances have, however, changed—events have occurred which were not anticipated by the founders of the system, and which have so completely altered the condition of things, that what at the outset admirably met the requirements of the nation was now by common consent admitted to be very inadequate to the present exigency. All parties concurred in thinking that some modification, some improvement must be made. The hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling), who has introduced the rival Bill, proceeded on that assumption. When we are told what is the niggardly and scanty salary given to those men to whom you intrust the education of the people, when we hear that schoolmasters—men possessed of certain intellectual attainments, natural capacity, and acquired knowledge—are receiving such paltry pittances as those now given to them, and of which, when last year the matter was brought officially before me, I felt quite ashamed of taking cognisance, it is perfectly clear that an addition ought to be made to their present remuneration. In looking at the present state of Scotland, we cannot help observing the manner in which the people are split up into different religious sects. I respect highly that deep sense of religious obligation which has led to this severance of the religious community; but it is surely very desirable that those differences which divide the people into so many sects should not be studiously inculcated into the minds of children in public schools—that they should not be brought up in religious antagonism to each other. If in after life they should be led by individual conviction, or by deference to the opinions of their parents, to adopt the principles now instilled into them, let them by all means take their places among the different religious denominations of their country; but, at all events, their convictions should result from reflection, thought, and persuasion, and should not be prejudices implanted in their minds at a period of youth when they are incapable of comprehending the grounds of conflicting theological opinions. Well, then, I do say it is important to abolish the sectarian character of the existing schools. These, then, are the points in which my right hon. and learned Friend's plan has the superiority over that proposed on the other side of the House. It is very easy to say that you may extend the present system, and thereby meet the wants of the great towns; but if anybody looks at the manner in which these Scotch schools are distributed, he will see that, in consequence of the religious distinctions among the people, schools are not wanted in some parts of the country, and that, on the other hand, where they are really needed, none exist. My right hon. and learned Friend's plan further proposes to lay the foundation for a better distribution of the schools. It not only seeks to improve the character and constitution of the schools, but to efface those religious divisions which the existing system is calculated to perpetuate, while it will also supply the country more equally and in better proportion with the means of instruction than is the case at present. Therefore, from what has passed to-night, whatever differences may still exist as to the details of my right hon. Friend's measure, I hope that when the second reading is proposed the House will approach the discussion in the same tone and temper which has marked the proceedings on this stage; that both Englishmen and Scotchmen will feel that this is really a subject of great national importance; that we shall lay aside any prejudices that may not be founded upon essential differences and distinctions; and that this House will give to the Bill of my right hon. and learned Friend the best possible consideration, and be disposed to reconcile it, if possible, with their opinions, to support it, and to pass it into law.

MR. ELLIOT said, it had been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) that the Bill of the Lord Advocate should apply to towns and to thickly populated parts of the country only; but while the religious sects extended all over Scotland, in the highlands the Free Church was predominant. In the whole of the south of Scotland the Free Church and the Dissenters were in a majority over the Established Church, and if they admitted the principle that in the towns the system of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate could be properly applied, the same reasons would lead to the application of it in the country. The parishes were in precisely the same situation as the towns, for there were parochial schools, to which only one-third of the people would go. [Mr. WALPOLE dissented.] His right hon. Friend opposite shook his head, and seemed to say that anybody might go there; but then they would not go there; the members of the Free Church would not, as a general rule, send their children to the parochial schools, and there was scarcely a parochial school which had not got a Free Church school close by it.

Mr. JOHNSTONE said, he understood the present Bill was substantially the same as that which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had brought in last year. If so, there were two omissions from that Bill to which he desired the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attention. In the first place, whilst it made efficient provision for the education of boys, it seemed to leave out of account altogether the girls, for whose education, however, it was surely important that some special provision should be made; and in the next place, it made no provision for the education of the masters. Now, there could be no doubt that a normal school for the education and training of masters was a most essential thing; and he trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman would take into consideration this as well as the other point to which he had directed his attention.

Mr. DUNLOP said, he hoped that the Bill would be treated with the consideration befitting its importance, and that a more convenient time would be fixed for its discussion than had been the case with regard to the Bill of last year.

Mr. A. KINNAIRD said, he was cordially in favour of the Bill, but would suggest that Members opposite might give up the point respecting the power of the presbytery in the management of the schools, and unite with him (Mr. Kinnaird) and his Friends in getting some security for religious teaching in the schools. The Bill might then, he thought, pass harmoniously through the House.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he thought that there could be little difficulty in framing a general measure of education for a country in which 95 per cent of the whole population were of one religion. He trusted, however, that the right hon. and learned Lord would so shape his Bill as to secure the support of the remainder—the Roman Catholics, who in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Banffshire, Aberdeenshire, and part of Morayshire, formed a numerous and important minority. The right hon. and learned Lord lost his Bill last year by nine votes, and it would be his own fault if he lost it this year, for he had only, in framing its provisions, to have regard for the 5 per cent, as well as the 95 per cent of the population of Scotland, and the measure would be perfectly safe.

MR. ALEXANDER HASTIE said, besides the Established Church and Free Church there was another important body in Scotland, called the United Presbyterians. They were generally disposed to support the Bill of the right hon. and learned Lord last year, but there were one or two points on which they felt some objection. One was, the constitution of the Educational Board, which they considered to be too largely nominated by the Government, and he trusted the same error would not be imported into the present Bill. He was glad to learn that the denominational plan, which was likewise very much objected to by many religious persons, was not to be introduced into the Bill now proposed. He believed that the Bill would be received with favour by a large body in Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, he thanked the House for their candid and temperate reception of his measure, and he was certain that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to adapt it, so as to obtain the support of the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken, so far as he consistently could. When the Bill was printed it would be seen in what way he proposed to deal with the difficulties which had been suggested, and he should be glad to receive any suggestions or communications on the matter. With regard to normal schools, his notion of the perfection of an educational measure was that it should include some provision for them; but upon consideration of the whole subject, the Government had thought it better to start this educational system by itself, and afterwards to engrave upon it a provision for normal schools. He was sorry the right hon. Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) did not yet see his way to supporting the Bill. With regard to a suggestion made by that right hon. Gentleman, if he (the Lord Advocate) could have seen that there was less difficulty in the proposing a separate measure for the towns than one for the whole country, he might have taken that course.

INTRAMURAL BURIALS (IRELAND).

Order for Third Reading read.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to call attention to some points of the Bill. The Lord Lieutenant had power to prohibit burials in all towns in Ireland, but the Bill gave no power to provide new burial-grounds. Great injustice might, therefore, be committed, as it might be difficult in such case to provide proper places, unless powers were given to boards of guardians or town councils.

MR. HORSMAN said, the suggestion was a very proper one. In the English Act there was a provision which it would certainly be desirable also to have in the Act relating to Ireland, giving powers, whenever one burial-ground was shut up, to open another, the rate payers themselves paying the expenses, and electing a representative board, with power to make all necessary arrangements. He would communicate with the authorities in Ireland, and if there was a feeling that the noble Lord's suggestion should be carried out, he should be glad to introduce a clause to that effect.

Bill read 3°; On the Question "That the Bill do pass."

MR. VANCE said, he wished to move a clause for the purpose of compensating clerks, sextons, and beadles, for the loss of fees and sums now received in respect of interments. He was afraid there would be some difficulty in giving the power of compensation to vestries in Ireland in these cases, as those bodies were for the most part Roman Catholics.

Viscount PALMERSTON said, the first Burial Bill that was passed by Parliament gave compensation to the clergymen, the sextons, and others who might be sufferers by the closing of burial-grounds, and that compensation was to be charged on the poor rates; but in subsequent Sessions Parliament altered their views on the subject, and in the Bill which was brought in by the noble lord belonging to Lord Derby's Government all compensation was deliberately, and upon due consideration, omitted. The hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that in England any compensation was given to clerks, and sextons, and others, who might lose fees in consequence of shutting up of burial-grounds. It was plain, in point of principle, that you could not maintain that anybody had a vested interest in that which was a public nuisance. The only reason for which a burial-ground was shut up was, that it was a public nuisance; that it was so full of decayed organic matter as to become dangerous to the health of the neighbourhood. Well, in that case it ought to be shut up, and out of regard for the public health it must be shut up. Then there could be no reason whatever why persons who had incidentally obtained profits from the use of that ground should be compensated for the loss of profits which, by the excessive use of the ground, must necessarily cease. In most cases the parish would provide a new burial-ground, and the same fees would attach to the new one that had been obtained from the old one, and, therefore, in ordinary cases, those persons would be no losers at all; but even if they were, there was no reason why the public should be called on to make compensation, or to pay for the loss of emoluments which had sunk under the magnitude of the nuisance it was sought to remove.

MR. VANCE said, if there was any certainty that those persons would get employment under the new Act, he would withdraw his amendment.

Clause brought up, and read 1°.

Motion made, and Question, "That the clause be now read 2°," put, and negatived.

THE TRANSPORT SERVICE.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply,

MR. LINDSAY said he would take that opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the administrative system of the transport service. In doing so, he would studiously avoid all irrelevant matter, and all points with which he knew the House to be familiar. He would make no reference to what had passed before the Committee now sitting upstairs, and still less would he attempt to anticipate any decision at which that Committee was likely to arrive. He would deal with the subject impartially—would avoid all personalities, and endeavour to be just, nay, generous, so far as the circumstances of the case would permit. The subject was a most important one, as was proved by the fact that in the past year there had been no less than 8,663,000*l.* voted for the transport service, and when it was considered that a well-arranged transport service was essential to the good conduct of the war, the House would perhaps be inclined to favour him with its attention while he shortly adverted to the subject. Before going further, however, he felt it his duty to refer to some remarks made by a noble Earl in another place, who had used very strong language in reference to the transport service, and whose remarks were all the more forcible because he was considered a great authority upon maritime questions. That noble Earl was reported to have said—

"He would venture to assert that in the whole service of the Crown there had hardly ever been evinced a greater degree of profligate extravagance in the expenditure of money, carelessness and ignorance in the making of contracts, slovenliness in their employment of vessels, and confusion and mismanagement as to their departures from and arrivals in the ports of this country. In the region where they were employed their utility had been marred by the utter want of arrangement in everything that concerned the business of embarking, carrying, and landing cargoes, so familiar to all persons engaged in mercantile concerns in this country. When first the war broke out, and it was thought necessary to have a large quantity of shipping in readiness, ships came forward so quickly that the whole trade of the country seemed to be laid for the moment at the feet of the Crown." [See 3 Hansard, cxxxvi. p. 1963-4.]

In part of that statement he (Mr. Lindsay) agreed; but with reference to that part which stated vessels of every description were placed at the service of the Government, and in such great abundance, he thought the noble Earl had made a great mistake; for when the war commenced, and the Admiralty issued notices for tenders, very few offers, he believed, were received of suitable vessels. The noble Earl went on to state—

"Government made engagements with the owners of the transports on terms that astonished the merchants, and showed them to be utterly ignorant of the manner in which business of this kind ought to be conducted. The tonnage was bargained and paid for on the builders' measurement, though every one was aware that that was merely nominal."—[Ibid. 1904.]

By that statement the noble Earl gave the public to understand that the owners of ships tendered them on the smaller and the Admiralty paid them on the larger tonnage. That was not the case, for the Admiralty went about tendering in a clear and distinct form, requiring owners to tender on the gross tonnage of the ships; and they were correct in doing so, because there was then less chance of fraud than if the tenders had been made upon the smaller tonnage; and, as the price was proportionate, the country in no way suffered from the course the Admiralty took. He thought, also, the noble Earl had, without mentioning his name, done great injustice to Captain Milne, who had the charge of taking up the transports, and than whom a more able servant the Crown did not possess. The noble Earl said—

"He would suggest that the surest and most economical plan to follow in hiring steamships was to make a contract with the owner, including the price of coal, but taking the power of deducting say 50*s.* for every ton of coal supplied to him."—[Ibid. 1968.]

He was surprised to hear the noble Earl make such a proposition as that, and the effect of it had been that an erroneous impression had gone abroad that the Admiralty had paid a higher price than they ought, whereas the cheapest course had been adopted of getting vessels by advertising for tenders; they had been equally wise in agreeing to provide the coal, because the owners could not have provided it upon such advantageous terms as the Admiralty. The noble Earl had also made a remark with regard to the engaging the service of the screw steamer the Telegraph, and had made it appear that she was engaged expressly for the purpose of conveying roasted coffee for the use of the troops in the Crimea. His words were—

"The Government being anxious to remedy this crying evil as speedily as possible, hired a ship to proceed to the Crimea with roasted coffee. For this purpose the Telegraph was engaged, a screw steamer of 500 tons register and 900 tons builders' measurement, which had cost its owners 28,000*l.*, and the Government agreed to pay for its use 2,500*l.* a month, which would in ten months give the full value of the vessel. She was loaded with coffee, and about to start, when General Simpson, who was to have gone out in her, saw her and declared that he would not go in her. He did not—nor did the ship itself; for they loaded her so deeply with coffee that the water ran in through the water-closet tubes, and they were obliged to take her into dock."—[Ibid. 1909.]

gaged for an entirely different purpose. And though the price was high—so high that the Admiralty refused her more than once—still the owners would not make any abatement, as the French Government were quite prepared to take her at the price they required, or even on higher terms. She was, however, much wanted by the British Government, and was expressly engaged to run with despatches between the Crimea and Constantinople, or any other place in the Black Sea, and not to carry stores. The Commander in chief was very desirous to have a vessel for that purpose, and Captain Milne, in his anxiety to save money to the country, rather than she should go out empty, sent out the coffee in her. It was not, therefore, fair that, while that gallant and indefatigable officer was studying economy, he should be censured and charged with waste and mismanagement. He (Mr. Lindsay) could not lay the case fairly before the House unless he was just to all parties. Having said this much in justice to the Board of Admiralty, he feared he could say little more in favour of their conduct. In order to place before the House what might be done for these transports, it would be necessary to state the amount of the tonnage engaged. From the returns issued up to the 2nd of January, it appeared that steamers of the aggregate tonnage of 123,350 tons were then engaged, and taking for the subsequent addition the low estimate of 26,650 tons, there were probably now engaged something like 150,000 tons. The return of sailing vessels showed a tonnage of 91,140, to which they might probably add 8,860, thus making 100,000, or altogether, including both descriptions of ships, sailing vessels and steamers, 250,000 tons, which must be admitted to be an enormous transport fleet. He had shown that the steamers could not have been obtained at lower prices, but he would now show the House where there had been enormous waste. He would allow a steam vessel ten days loading, twenty days for her passage to the Crimea, ten days landing, and twenty days passage home in ballast, or sixty days in all. A steamer, therefore, ought to make six voyages per annum; and allowing two tons measurement for each infantry soldier, steamers having a tonnage in the aggregate of 150,000 tons ought to carry to the Crimea 75,000 soldiers each trip, or 450,000 in twelve months. In addition to these, there were 100,000 tons of sailing vessels, and allowing to them forty-five days for their passage out, forty-five for their passage home, ten days loading and ten days landing, they would make three voyages each in the year; and as they would carry 50,000 per voyage, they would take in the whole 150,000 infantry. Of cavalry there might be carried out by the steamers 15,000 each trip, or 90,000 every year; and by the sailing vessels there might be conveyed 10,000 per trip, and supposing them to make only two voyages in the year, 20,000 per annum. It would appear, therefore, that there were regular transports engaged which would carry out 550,000 infantry, or 110,000 cavalry per annum, with all their provisions accoutrements, and a large quantity of stores besides. Upon a former occasion an hon. and gallant Member had contradicted some statements which he had made with reference to the conveyance of Turkish troops. He had now some facts to submit to that hon. and gallant Gentleman. Allowing ten days for the embarkation of Turkish troops at Constantinople, five days for the passage up from thence, ten days for disembarking at the Crimea, and five days for the passage back, or in all thirty days, these vessels, if employed in that service, would be able to make twelve voyages per annum, so that they could carry with ease in the course of the year 1,992,000 Turkish infantry, or 300,000 Turkish cavalry. He made these statements to show how little, comparatively, had been done with the enormous amount of shipping at their disposal, and how badly that little had been done. He would now trace the progress of a ship, and for the purpose of illustration he would take the Golden Fleece, a steamer of 2,000 tons, which cost the country about 7,000*l.* a month; he thought that vessel would be a fair specimen of the rest. She left Leith Roads upon the 11th of March, 1854, with her Majesty's 4th regiment; in ten days she arrived at Malta, and disembarked them all well immediately after arrival. Shortly afterwards she embarked the 2nd battalion of the Rifle Brigade, about 200 Sappers and Miners, and twenty horses, also Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown and staff. On the 6th of April she arrived at Gallipoli, but did not land the troops for three days, no arrangements having been made for receiving them. She returned to Malta on the 12th of April, and,

after waiting about a week, left with the Grenadier Guards, a company of the Cold-streams, and twenty horses. She called at Gallipoli, and received orders to proceed to Scutari; but no arrangements were made for receiving them there, which caused considerable delay before they were disembarked. After remaining there some time she took Sir Richard England and staff to Gallipoli, and returned with Sir George Brown and the Rifle Brigade. She remained at anchor off Scutari or the Golden Horn until the army was ordered to Varna—a period of about six weeks, during which period a large steam fleet was lying perfectly idle. She then took the Rifle Brigade on board for the third time, and landed them at Varna, and in succession afterwards the Grenadier Guards and several regiments of the line. She landed the first British troops both at Gallipoli and Varna. About the end of June she received orders from Admiral Boxer to return to England, and took nothing home but a large quantity of empty provision casks, which the captain could not get removed from the ship, and which had been accumulating from the time when the ship commenced to issue Government stores. Notwithstanding repeated applications, he could get no authority to land or destroy them, though perfectly worthless, and taking up valuable space on board. He had many other instances of a similar nature which he might adduce, but really the history of one ship was the history of them all. Another ship actually arrived off the Alma the day after the battle, but, although the captain reported that he had a number of surgeons on board, their assistance was not availed of at a time when surgeons were so much wanted, until twenty-four hours after her arrival. It had been said in another place, that there had been no detention of these transports. He was surprised that such a statement should have been made. There were now two large vessels lying at Deptford—the Germany and the Hermes—which cost the country 12,000*l.* a month. The Admiralty chartered them a month before they arrived at Deptford, but he believed that they received no pay until they arrived and were ready to embark troops. The very day that they arrived at Deptford they were ready to receive troops. They had been lying there now three weeks, and supposing that they should remain there another week, there would be 12,000*l.* totally lost to the country. All that time they had been lying there for the ostensible purpose of fitting up berths for the soldiers, which might have been easily done in two days. It was in such matters as these that the public money had been wasted, and he had no hesitation in saying that out of the 8,000,000*l.* which had been voted for this service 2,000,000*l.* at least had been totally lost through unnecessary delays. It was, therefore, the duty of the House of Commons to endeavour to ascertain the cause of all this sacrifice of the public funds. He did not say that the fault rested with the Admiralty solely; he attributed it to the whole system, which struck him as being decidedly wrong, and as requiring a thorough revision and a thorough reform. The War Office, or the Ordnance, or the Commissariat sent word to the Admiralty that they wanted a certain amount of goods or a certain number of troops sent out. The Admiralty took up ships, but when these ships went down to Deptford they found that the troops or the Ordnance stores were not ready. What he should like to see was this—that when these different departments sent word to the Admiralty that they required vessels, they should state the exact time when the troops or stores would be ready, and be kept to the time given. There was another cause of great delay. Each of these different departments sent some one to stow their goods, and the most ludicrous instances occurred of wrangling between the various officers as to where their stores should be stowed. These departments ought to have nothing to do with stowage; they should send the stores alongside the ship, but not be allowed to go on board. The Admiralty or the Transport Board should be responsible for stowing and carrying the goods from England to their destination in the Crimea, and for their delivery to the proper parties. They would then have much less delay; they would not have such constant complaints of goods being damaged and stowed in improper places, and they would have some responsible party to whom to look. He was aware that the Admiralty were making great exertions—feeling, as they must, that there was something wrong—to remedy the evil; but he could not approve the course they had adopted. In his opinion the great cause of the evil had been the want of some responsible head, of some one to whom to appeal, of some one whom they could blame when things went wrong.

The Admiralty had appointed a Transport Board. Now, he had no faith whatever in boards. It was merely shifting responsibility from one shoulder to the other. It was only increasing the evils which all were now most anxious to avoid. What he would recommend would be, to have one person—the gentleman who filled the situation of Chairman of the Transport Board would be a very competent person—to direct, and make him, and him alone, responsible to the Minister of War. They would then know what they were about. Having said thus much with regard to the loading and sailing of these ships, he thought it might be interesting and possibly advantageous if he said a very few words as to the mode in which the Admiralty conducted their business with reference to accounts. On the 24th of October, 1854, an account was rendered for messing of officers and for a hawser supplied to the Government officers in the Mediterranean, all properly vouched. On the 4th of December another account for the same hawser, and also for messing other officers, was rendered, and after repeated applications a letter was received, dated the 9th of February, stating that, "on the 2nd instant the account was sent to the Accountant General's department for payment." The amount was called for on the 5th, 9th, and 12th of February, but had not then reached the Department. On the 17th and 27th of February, and on the 5th and 8th of March, it was again called for, when the persons applying were told it was detained at the storekeeper's department. On the 16th of March, upon again applying, they were referred to a deaf and dumb person, so that all communication had to be in writing. He did not complain of the Government employing a deaf and dumb person. He was sorry to say there were some high in office who had ears and would not hear, and eyes and would not see, who were just as bad as this unfortunate deaf and dumb man. But as this deaf and dumb person held a very responsible situation at the Admiralty for the passing of accounts, he so doubted the statement of a person thus afflicted being placed in that position that he asked for the original document of the deaf and dumb man's writing, and he now held it in his hand. In reply to the inquiry of the person calling for the account, the deaf and dumb man said—

"I have been sending the last three days to look for the claim and cannot find it. You ought not to have included the rope in the same claim; it obliged us to refer to the Storekeeper General, and the claim is most likely with him." "But"—wrote the party calling for the accounts—

"the rope was sent up about three months before, and it could not be paid. Can we have the messing by sending another account, minus the rope?"

The answer from the Admiralty deaf and dumb clerk was—

"The messing requires the vouchers, which are with the claim. The office is being cleared out and got in order, and I hope your claims will be found and got forward, but it is too great a waste of time specially to go looking for them."

Another claim for messing was forwarded on the 9th of January, 1855, accompanied by the certificates all properly signed and in order. After repeated applications, the person applying was informed, on the 6th of March, that the account was lost. It was again applied for on the 8th, when it was stated to have been forwarded to the War Office, and on the 16th of March the deaf and dumb clerk gave the following reply—

"We cannot pay for officers we know nothing of, so we sent the voucher to the War Office, and have not yet got their reply."

In the first instance, an account, after being rendered nearly five months, was stated to be either with the Storekeeper General, or else, if in the office, would possibly be found shortly, as the office was being cleared and put into order (they might presume not before it was needed), and the applicants were politely informed it would be too great a waste of time specially to look for particular accounts which had been carelessly mislaid. That was a state of things to which the country ought not, and would not, submit—a state of things which, he was sorry to say, had entailed on us a very great amount of disgrace with other nations. He would endeavour to illustrate the administrative system generally in the same plain way. Three or four years before he had the honour of a seat in that House his firm had a claim of 3*l. 5s. 6d.* against the Admiralty for some freightage on stores. The account was rendered in the usual form, but in about six weeks' time it was returned for amendment because the 3*l. 5s. 6d.* was not written in words. The account was amended and returned, and in about ten days one of his clerks came to him and said he should have to go to Deptford and Woolwich, and Somerset House and the War Office, and he did not know where besides, before it would be paid.

As he found it would take his clerk the greater part of each day for a week to collect the account, and that while he was so employed they might lose a great deal more by his absence—indeed, the £l. 5s. 6d. would scarcely cover his salary, the account was left uncalled for, and he supposed to this day it was unpaid. About four years ago he had another account—he did not remember in which particular department, but he thought it was in the Admiralty—for upwards of £2,000*l.* The account was rendered, and for six weeks it was not passed. The loss of interest on £2,000*l.* for six weeks was a consideration, so he determined one morning instead of coming in early to business, to wait for Government hours, and to get to the Admiralty by half-past ten o'clock. It was a fine summer morning, and after a good deal of jostling, for no one knew him—and if they had, perhaps they would not have cared—he got into a room in which were three desks, and at one of the desks was a gentleman, seemingly very much at his ease, for he sat on an easy chair, with his leg cocked over the arm of another easy chair, whistling to himself the tune of "Peter Dick," keeping time to it on the desk with a ruler. He walked up to the gentleman and said, "Can you tell me anything of this account?" His reply was, "No; I can't say. I don't know anything about it. It has not come to me yet." While speaking to him, in walked another gentleman, who should have been the occupier of one of the empty desks, with his hat cocked on one side and a gold-headed cane in his hand. He did not object to gentlemen cocking their hats on one side or carrying gold-headed canes, if they would attend to their business. Addressing the gentleman who was whistling "Peter Dick," the new arrival said, "I'm off by the eleven o'clock boat to Gravesend. I don't suppose I shall be back before four. You'll keep me all right." The gentleman who had come in then departed, and his whistling friend then said that, perhaps, the account was in his charge. Upon that he (Mr. Lindsay) replied, "I hope, then, when it reaches you, you will not be going down to Gravesend;" and to that observation, having received rather an impertinent answer, with which it was not necessary to trouble the House, he made no reply, and left the office; but as he did so, he could not help saying to himself, "I hope the time may come when

I shall be able to assist in rooting out these Peter Dicks, who waste so much treasure, and who have aided in bringing so much disgrace upon the country." But what was the original source whence these evils had arisen? It was the existing system of patronage which created these Peter Dicks, and there were too many of them, both high and low. The time, however, had arrived when such men must be rooted out. The country wanted, and it would insist upon having, competent men employed in their places. He, as a man of business, felt no hesitation in saying that there were at the present moment many men engaged in Government offices in the receipt of salaries varying from 80*l.* to 500*l.* a-year, who not only did no real service to the country, but to pay whom their respective salaries without allowing them to go near the offices to which they were attached, would, he firmly believed, cause a great saving of the public money. But there was, happily for the country, though unhappily for themselves, another class of persons in the public service, consisting of very able, industrious, and energetic men, who were paid salaries far too small considering the duties they performed. In his opinion it was too often forgotten by the Government that talent and industry were as marketable as any commodity, and that if they required those qualities they must pay for them; and one step in advance would be to sweep away at once and at all hazards these Peter Dicks, and add the salaries they had received to that of those industrious men. No doubt could exist in the mind of any one that the time had arrived when administrative reform had become absolutely necessary. What he meant by that expression was, that it was necessary the Government should be made to keep pace with the progress made by those they governed. It was necessary that the mode of conducting business in Government offices should be assimilated to that which existed, and which succeeded so well, in the great banking and mercantile establishments throughout the country. If the Government did not institute a thorough administrative reform, people out of doors would not rest satisfied, because they felt that the present system was rotten at the core, and that the inefficiency of the men who carried out that system was the means of squandering millions of the public money, and that much of that distress and misery which had befallen our noble army in the East had arisen from want of that reform which he now wished to urge upon the Government.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, before my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty addressed any observations to the House in reply to what has fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth, perhaps, as I have been referred to, I may be excused if I offer a few remarks to the House. I shall commence my observations by referring to one or two remarks made by my hon. Friend towards the close of his speech. My hon. Friend has stated that administrative reform is necessary, and in dealing with that observation I shall confine myself to the subject of the navy. I do not mean to say that administrative reforms in other departments might not be made, for I am disposed to think that they are necessary, and have been felt to be necessary, and that various Governments have endeavoured to apply remedies; but, not to enter into that subject, I think that, as regards the navy, I may say without vanity that the remarks of my hon. Friend would have been much more applicable twenty years ago than now. At that time I used my best endeavours, acting on the part of the Government of Lord Grey, and with his concurrence, to apply an efficient cure to what then appeared to me to be abuses in the administration of the naval department, and I think that the remedy then applied has served to maintain the efficiency of that department at the present day. My hon. Friend, in referring to our general system of administration, has said—and I hope he did not apply the observation to the naval departments—that it is rotten at the core. Well, Sir, that is a harsh expression. He has likewise dwelt particularly on the system of patronage as an indication of rottenness, and on that point I may say that it does so happen that the present accountant general of the navy, Mr. Bromley, one of the most able servants the country possesses, was only twenty years ago a humble clerk in a dockyard, with a salary under 200*l.* a year. I, at that time, observed the merits of that gentleman, and his character was also reported to me as being most exemplary, and before I left office in 1834, I had the pleasure of promoting him to a higher situation in the department than the one he then held, and by his talents and excellent conduct that gentleman has in the meantime risen from the humble position I have mentioned to be the accountant general to the navy, receiving pay and allowances amounting to 1,400*l.* a year; and he has attained that position wholly and solely by his own merit. That gentleman, I repeat, has risen to his present position, not by favour, but by merit exclusively, and I firmly believe that a more meritorious and able public servant than Mr. Bromley cannot be found. He is known to several Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I can appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) as to the manner in which he discharges not only the duties of his office, but in which he has contributed his assistance to the improved administration of several other branches of the Civil Service. My hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) has commented at some length upon the fact of there being a deaf and dumb clerk employed in the Admiralty. Well, Sir, the appointment of this gentleman was originally made from charitable considerations, and he has fully justified it by his services and attainments. His conduct was so meritorious, and his talents were of so high an order, that when, before I left the Admiralty on the formation of the Transport Board, I referred the question of appointment to those officers who were most capable of forming a correct judgment, that same deaf and dumb clerk was recommended to me as the most eligible person that could be employed, and he was accordingly promoted. The misfortune of being deaf and dumb is not in itself a disqualification, as the hon. Member appears to consider it; for one of the most distinguished civil servants, a son of Sir W. Napier, has the misfortune to labour under these natural defects, and is yet known to be most efficient and worthy of the highest praise. I am sure that my hon. Friend is the last person to speak with levity of so great a calamity, when, as in the present case, it is combined with talent.

MR. LINDSAY said, he had not intended to cast any reflection upon that gentleman's abilities. All he wished to do was, to explain the Government system of dealing with accounts.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Very well; but I think that the two cases I have mentioned, that of the accountant general and his deaf and dumb clerk, show that the patronage of the Admiralty has not gone by favour. Now, I come to the subject of accounts. My hon. Friend has stated that the system of accounts is a disgrace to this country, and to the advanced science of the age in which we live. Now, Sir, I will challenge a comparison between the naval accounts and those kept in any merchant's office—even in that of my hon. Friend, and I have no hesitation in saying that it will be found that they are posted up as closely, and are kept upon a better system, than any accounts kept by any banker or merchant in London. At the same time, the House will bear in mind the extent of the transactions, and the various items involved, and also the system of auditing used as a security for the public money; and I say that, notwithstanding these impediments, the navy accounts are posted up more closely than those of any banking or mercantile firm. Then, as to the accounts being a disgrace to the country, I can only say that the system was originally copied from the admirable system which existed in France; that, since it has been adopted in this country, the accounts have been examined by the French Government; and Sir John Briggs, to whom the merit of that introduction is due, has told me that he had the proud satisfaction of hearing them express the opinion that the system of accounts adopted in this country was as perfect, if not more so, than their own. Well, then, I ask the House, can that system be fairly spoken of as a disgrace to the country? I shall now, having dealt with that portion of the speech of my hon. Friend, apply myself to the other topics upon which he has touched. My hon. Friend has said, that the number of steamers employed was very great. I admit that, and I must say that he has been just as well as generous; for, although bringing charges himself, he has fully answered many which have proceeded from other quarters. My hon. Friend has said, and has truly said, that when the war broke out, and the urgency was extreme, the tenders were high; but he well knows that the price of a commodity is regulated by the supply. My hon. Friend has also complained that there was a want of a well-regulated system, and he has shown that, with the number of ships, steam vessels and sailing vessels, a greater number of voyages outwards and homewards might have been made, and an infinitely larger service might have been performed, than has been performed. But the House must remember what has been really done during the last twelve months. We have been conveying, a distance of 3,000 miles, from 58,000 to 60,000 troops of all arms, upwards of 6,000 horses, a large train of artillery, all the guns for large field and battering trains, all the forage and the rations necessary both for the fleet and the army. We have also been conveying more than 15,000 French troops from the south of France, with their horses. We have also conveyed from Varna to the Crimea 40,000 Turks and 6,000 horses, and we have undertaken the constant supply of what is necessary for that force by steamers from Constantinople to the Crimea. Last summer, also, we conveyed to the Baltic 15,000 men, making in all somewhere about 100,000 men conveyed, and somewhere about 8,000 or 9,000 horses, besides keeping up the supply of daily rations for somewhere near 100,000 men, conveyed a distance of 3,000 miles. The hon. Member asks, likewise, why we did not move the steamers backwards and forwards; but the necessity of the service renders it impossible. No doubt expenses are incurred and demurrage arises; but when was an army ever trusted upon a foreign shore without being furnished with the means of embarkation? When the Duke of Wellington with his brave army maintained that position of Torres Vedras which has covered his name with immortal glory to the latest time, he was never content without having always in the Tagus the whole amount of transport necessary for the re-embarkation of his army. So also in the China war and the Burmah war. If you invade a country and send your forces to a remote territory, ordinary prudence and caution will teach you the necessity of keeping the means at hand of re-embarking your troops. The naval commander in chief was pressed in the months of June, July, and August, to send back some of the steamers; but the British army was then in Bulgaria, and the resolution was taken to remove that army to the Crimea. So far from being sent back, the steamers were, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the admirals, detained, and they effected, with signal success, that great operation of removing the army from Bulgaria to Eupatoria without the loss of a man or a horse in that expedition. Then there was the advance of the army from Eupatoria to Balaklava, and the occupation of the Chersonesus in front of Sebastopol. Time was occupied in that movement, and it was not thought expedient while it was in progress, and while the issue was at all doubtful, to send the steamers back. The House will remember that the British army had only one port of communication with the sea. That was a very small port and harbour, and the ships were without the means of landing, or of placing in store, anything sent in the nature of supplies. There were no appliances in the way of cranes or wharfs, and this involved the necessity of keeping a large portion of the stores on board ship. Then, with the number of sick, were continually arising demands for removing them from the Crimea to Constantinople, and even more distant stations. Then other and serious demands were made upon the transport service. Our great allies, the French, having an abundance of troops, but not having such a command of steamers as we have, it fell upon us to furnish them with the means of transport, and nearly 20,000 men were sent from Marseilles on board British steamers to the Crimea. Much later, my noble Friend now at the head of the Government, in pursuance of a treaty with the Sardinian Government, has been obliged to furnish the means of transport for conveying 15,000 Genoese from Genoa or Spezzia to the Crimea. Then came the great operation of removing 40,000 Turks from Varna to Eupatoria, who were removed in a period so short, that nothing could exceed the admiration of Omer Pasha, except his gratitudo. Upon the whole, regarding the hon. Member as a severe judge, I cannot but hope and think that the House will come to a different conclusion relative to our naval operations. So far from thinking they have been badly performed the greatest credit is due to the British fleet, and particularly to Sir Edmund Lyons, for the manner in which they have executed the arduous and various duties confided to them. My hon. Friend has spoken of a detention of ten days in the river of two steamers, and he speaks of the internal fittings of these steamers as being easily performed; but we have found the fitting out of steamers to be no easy matter, and to occupy much time. My hon. Friend has truly spoken of Captain Milne as a meritorious officer. I do not think that the service that has been performed could have been accomplished without the energy and ability of that officer, to whom the country is greatly indebted. If it were possible for any one man to have continued to manage the transport service, Captain Milne would have done it; but, not thinking it possible for any one officer to manage so vast a service, I thought it prudent to recommend the appointment of a Transport Board. Upon principle I agree with my hon. Friend; I am not friendly to a division of responsibility in boards; but when the transport service involves contracts for 5,000,000*l.*, I think they will agree with me that in such large transactions there is safety in multiplying the checks upon contracts of so large an amount. It therefore appeared expedient and salutary to combine a naval and military officer and an officer of the merchant service in the Transport Board. This board will only exist during the war; the term of office is so limited; and with the end of the war will terminate the existence of the board. When the magnitude of the service has been considered, and all that has been done has been duly weighed, I think that the dissatisfaction stated by my hon. Friend will not be shared generally by the House or by the country.

MR. ALCOCK said, he rose, pursuant to notice, "to draw the attention of the House to the state of the war in the Black Sea." We were now pretty much where we were when the war broke out, and had made little or no progress—a state of things which he attributed, in a great degree, to the absence of that extraneous assistance which this country ought to have had, and might have had, if the proper steps had been taken with reference to the Caucasus. That independent country, which had the power and the disposition to assist us, which was as large as England and Wales, and four times the size of the Crimea, was held in check by a line of fortresses along the whole frontier between the Caucasus and Russia. Now, if we had but taken Anapa, and thus acquired the command of the Straits of Kertch, we should have gained an important military station, and the Circassians would have been prepared to show their sympathy for their co-religionists the Turks, and for their compatriots, the Tartars of the Crimea. Anapa gave to Russia the entire command of the Caucasus, and, once in our possession, we should have been assisted by the irregular horsemen of that country, inferior to none in the world, and much more than a match for the Cosacks. What an important advantage it would have been to the allied forces in the East to have been aided by 50,000 of these horsemen! To the parts of Russia south of the Caucasus there were only three modes of approach—one by the sea, at present totally cut off; another by a central pass in the Caucasus; and the third by the Caspian Sea. Now, with the communication by water in the hands of the allies, Schamyl could have had no difficulty in closing the mountain pass; and if once we had possession of Anapa, an important diversion might have been created in that quarter. Why this had not been done he could not conceive; and if Lord Aberdeen had been a Minister of Russia, and had accomplished as little in this way as he had done for England, he would have been in Siberia long ago. Then, again, the House was asked to grant a loan of 1,000,000*l.* for the co-operation of 15,000 Piedmontese, but for a fourth part of the sum we were about to give to Sardinia the allies might have had the assistance of 40,000 Persians. He must repeat that it was the duty of the Government to have attempted the capture of Anapa, and our not having the command of this position was one of the reasons why we had made so little progress in the war.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Lindsay) had referred to the general state of the departments connected with the civil service of the country. It was impossible for anybody who had watched the course of events recently not to have seen that, upon the one hand, immense exertions had been made by Government and by the country to carry on the war in which we were engaged; and that, upon the other hand, in spite of the exertions which had been made, there had existed, and there still existed, in the country a great and growing dissatisfaction at the failures which had taken place. These two facts, though seemingly irreconcileable, might be easily reconciled by the consideration of one simple point. There was an old saying, that "A dead fly made the ointment of the apothecary stink," and in the same manner small failures brought continually under the notice of the people threw discredit upon great transactions. He was confident that many of the failures which had taken place would have been passed over more easily, would have excited much less attention, and would have been excused as the natural incidents of so great and novel an undertaking, if it had not been that circumstances attending other adventures in which the Government had been engaged had given the people an unfavourable impression of the state of the public service generally. He was, therefore, most anxious to impress upon the Government the importance of losing no time, for their own sakes and for the credit of the country, in introducing such improvements into the civil service as would secure for it a better name than it had hitherto possessed. He was not one of those who were disposed to join in a general outcry against the civil service. That service possessed many merits and had connected with it men capable and willing to perform any amount of work that might be thrown upon them. He was conscious, however, that there were many defects in the organisation of the civil service, which rendered the talent and industry employed in it much less valuable than they ought to be. There was one point, however, to which he was particularly desirous of calling the attention of the Government, with a view to obtaining better economy and efficiency. By regulating the admissions into the service, the promotions made in it, and, what was still more important, the distribution of the work connected with it, a considerable sum of money might be saved, and far greater efficiency obtained. There were a large number of men receiving salaries varying from 80*l.* to 300*l.* a year, who, to use the language of the hon. Member for Tynemouth, were hardly worth their salt; while, upon the other hand, there were other men employed whose assistance was most valuable and who did an immense amount of work. What he principally complained of was, that the young men employed in the civil service were set to copying merely, for the first four or five years, and that when they were called upon to write a simple letter, they found themselves incompetent to do so. There was a great difference between serving and experience. There were many who had taken University honours, or received a very excellent education, who went into Government offices, but were kept so long at mere copying that the powers which they possessed upon entering were soon lost. He thought that there ought to be such an arrangement of the offices, that the young men on entering should be able by practice to keep up their knowledge, and he believed that the result of such a change as this would be to attract to the Government service men of a much superior order than could be expected, when the only prospect held out was a miserable salary, and work much beneath the education they had received.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he wished to make a few remarks on the subject of the transport service. He did not, however, wish to speak harshly of the errors of the past; he preferred looking forward to the prospect of our learning from those errors wisdom for the future. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) had mentioned a single instance in which he had advanced a man on the score of merit; but he (Captain Scobell) wished to see that ground of advancement universally adopted. During the last four years there had been at the Admiralty four First Lords, there had been several changes in the junior Lords, and there had been three or four Secretaries. How could a Board work well with such numerous and rapid changes? He confessed he felt surprised that the English transports in the Black Sea had not volunteered to carry out a greater number of French troops; and he believed that if those transports had been properly managed, they would have performed double the work they had done. The great source of the failures in the transport system was, that there had been no person to superintend the stowage of the different vessels. The consequence of that want of superintendence was, that no one knew where anything ought to be put, and of course no one could know where anything was to be had on the arrival of a ship at its destination. Most hon. Members would have heard the anecdote of the vessel loaded with boots being despatched from Balaklava to Constantinople for shoes—[Sir J. GRAHAM: That is altogether untrue.]—and in other instances, which were well authenticated, vessels had been sent for goods of which there was an abundance at the time at Balaklava. But the worst feature in the whole of the transport service was the miserable provision, or rather want of provision, for the conveyance of the sick and wounded. These poor men were huddled together in the vessels in a manner worse than cattle. With respect to the comparative advantages of employing a board or a single individual, he would observe, that although an individual could not himself do everything, there was no reason why he should not have the assistance of others, without the establishment of a board; and it appeared to him that greater efficiency would be secured by entrusting the supreme management to one person than by dividing it among several.

MR. CAYLEY said, the denial by the late First Lord of the Admiralty, of the anecdote to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last spoken had referred, ought to have been made five months ago, when all such statements were said to be untrue; but there was no mismanagement to which the country would not now give credit. The right hon. Gentleman admitted mismanagement generally, but he always defended particulars—apparently acting in every special case upon the maxim of the demagogue Wilkes, never to defend himself against a charge upon the hustings, but to deny it in toto. He certainly placed confidence in the dispassionate statement of the hon. Gentleman who had introduced the subject, notwithstanding the denial of everything by the right hon. Gentleman. Lord Derby's Government, which consisted of untried men, had been turned out to make room for the right hon. Gentleman, who was, par excellence, the great administrator of the country, and his friends, although they had no followers, solely on account of their supposed administrative abilities; and the public had now had an opportunity of judging of those abilities. He acknowledged the right hon. Gentleman's administrative power so far as method and order were concerned; but those were not the only qualities required for conducting a war successfully; and those very checks which the right hon. Gentleman so much admired had been the curse of all our operations. It was in consequence of them that our army had been starved to emaciation and death; and yet the right hon. Gentleman still defended them. A friend of his, who had gone out to the East from one of the public offices connected with the war, disbelieving before he went the statements made by The Times and the rest of the press with regard to the condition of the army, had written to say that he could not now but acknowledge the truth of most of those statements, while, at the same time, he added that the curse of the place was pen and ink. It was not very often that the House had practically the power of very minutely analysing the estimates, but when they saw so large a sum as was proposed asked for the transport service alone, it became the duty of the House to examine into the details. The amount of work done they could only judge from what they saw before them. When the

Navy Estimates were moved, the first estimate had not been passed up to ten o'clock at night, and as he understood from one of the Lords of the Admiralty there was no likelihood of the transport service coming on that night, he had from indisposition quitted the House. The transport grant was, however, agreed to, and this was his excuse for troubling the House on the present occasion. The whole tonnage connected with the transport service by the papers before them was as follows: 42,000 tons for the navy, 18,000 for the army, 19,000 for the ordnance, 7,000 for Malta, and 8,000 tons for the French—in all, about 94,000 tons, exclusive of 158,754 tons of coals. The charge for this was no less than 2,600,000*l.*, or 25*l.* per ton, and this year to be doubled, the ordinary charge just now for freightage to Australia, 17,000 miles instead of 3,000 miles, being only 4*s.* per ton. He did not pretend that this was an accurate estimate, but the only approximation that could be made from the figures before them. Now, who was responsible for all this? In his opinion it was the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) then First Lord of the Admiralty. He considered that one of the gravest charges brought against the conduct of the transport service was the mode in which the coaling of the vessels had been conducted. Look at the cases of the Emperor and the Arabia, as showing the great want of system that had prevailed at Constantinople in coaling the vessels, and the enormous expense that the country had in consequence been put to. In some cases the coaling of the vessels cost 10*l.* or 11*l.* per ton, although coals were only 4*l.* per ton at Constantinople. One would have imagined from the profuse expenditure of public money, from the number of ships employed and lying idle in port, that there would have been abundance of land transport in the hands of the commander of the forces, to import forage for horses, but this was one of the most terrible privations to which the army in the Crimea was exposed. The horses died for want of forage, which was lying in the ships in Balaklava harbour; and the soldiers wanted food, clothes, and ammunition, and could not get them for want of land transport, and the gross and scandalous mismanagement and confusion in Balaklava harbour. When the horses were ill there was no medicine to be found, though it was lying there or being bandied about from port to port, from the month of June. One would have thought there would have been economy in the use of the fodder when it was scarce; but instead of that, one-half of it was wasted from the want of nose-bags. Lord Lucan asked Lord Raglan's permission to send to Constantinople for provisions for men and horses, but all sorts of obstacles were thrown in the way, when all facilities should have been afforded. With regard to the want of horses and mules for land transport, the propriety of purchasing mules in Spain was suggested to the Government in March. This suggestion was not adopted until three months afterwards; the first batch of 300 mules was sent off in August, and the second batch was not sent till the middle of December, for want of sea transports; while a great number of ships, according to the evidence of the Earl of Cardigan, at that time remained unemployed at Balaklava. Then, again, the horses had been conveyed under an ill-digested system, and great numbers had died; whereas, under the Hull system of conveyance, it was well known that but few casualties happened, and that the horses were landed in good condition. There had also been a great want of horse medicine; large quantities were taken out and had arrived in June, but these were not discovered until January. What security had they, that the new transport board would prove more efficient than had the Board of Admiralty? Captain Drew had been mentioned as a practical man, connected with the board, but he believed he was between sixty and seventy years of age; and, indeed, it appeared to be one of the conditions of this war that it should be conducted by old men. He thought that, since the appointment of the new transport board, circumstances had occurred which were not very creditable to their arrangements, especially with regard to stowage of transports. In the case of the Telegraph it was clear that great negligence had existed, and he considered that experienced stevedores should be always present at Deptford and Portsmouth to superintend the stowage of transports. It was well known that the troops had not been properly supplied with ammunition. Even four or five days after fire was first opened upon Sebastopol the supply of ammunition fell short, and Captain Shakespeare stated that during the affair of the 25th of October, at Balaklava, he was for an hour without ammunition for his guns, and yet the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) defended the system of retaining the ammunition on board the ships in the harbour of Balaklava. A near and dear relative of his (Mr. Cayley's) had been a month before Sebastopol in October, he had fraternised with all classes of the armies, officers, soldiers, Jack Tars, Zouaves, and Turks, and from him he had received most lamentable accounts of the condition of the troops, showing that, even at the end of October, the soldiers were wasting away, that the officers were dispirited, and that there was a want of confidence in head-quarters. Those accounts were of so melancholy a nature, and appeared to him so important, that he hesitated as to whether he ought not to communicate them to the noble Member for the City of London (Lord J. Russell), who was then the leader of the Government in that House. He decided otherwise, however, and he offered the information to The Times newspaper, stating to the conductors of that journal, in general terms, the contents of the letters he had received. The Times newspaper had afforded such full information on the subject of the war that he felt it right to offer his information to that journal, if its conductors required additional evidence as to the state of the army. A great deal had been said about The Times newspaper; and, although the press generally had afforded very valuable information with respect to the conduct of the war, he would refer to The Times in particular. For a considerable period The Times had been held up to odium as misrepresenting the state of things in the Crimea; but he would like to know who now thought The Times had made such misrepresentations? Was there any one who did not now believe that the Commissioner of The Times, and the other newspaper Commissioners, had been the means, under Providence, of saving our army from actually perishing? He believed that, had it not been for the representations made by the press, the whole of our army must have perished, for they would not have received the succours which had been sent out from this country in consequence of those representations. The Times had not only been accused of misrepresentations, but it had been accused of making those misrepresentations from improper motives. He did not think he was committing any breach of confidence in stating that the answer he received to his offer to communicate to The Times the information contained in the letter of his correspondent was this—

"We don't require any additional evidence. We have the evidence of every person who writes from the Crimea, and of every person who arrives in this country from the Crimea. We have ample evidence of all which your letters appear to contain."

This, be it remembered, was at the end of November. But the editor of The Times went on to say—

"The task is so odious, of inculpating persons at head-quarters, although the evidence appears to us complete, and if the facts can be substantiated, it is at this juncture so doubtful whether, upon the whole, the public service would not rather be diserved than served by the exposure, that we refrain from availing ourselves of the communication."

This occurrence took place at least a month before The Times began what were called its attacks upon Lord Raglan. He thought it only just to make this statement with respect to The Times newspaper. The Times had never been civil to him. When he had brought forward questions in that House, The Times had generally given him "the cold shoulder," and had treated him rather cavalierly, but he had considered himself bound in justice to make this statement. He believed, from information he had been enabled to gather, that there had been a great waste of money in the transport service, and that, if practical men had been employed in its superintendence, at least one-third of the amount which had been expended might have been saved. He regretted on this occasion the absence of some hon. Gentlemen who usually assume to exercise a very vigilant supervision with respect to the public expenditure. He believed that if the expenditure of this country for the war was compared with that of our Allies, it would be found that our expenditure far exceeded, in proportion, that of the French Government. But why should it do so? Every material of war was as cheap here as there, many much cheaper. The people of this country did not grudge any expenditure which was necessary for carrying on the war, for they were desirous to prosecute it vigorously, and to bring it to a successful issue, but they wanted their money's worth for their money. For his own part, he did not think the people did get their money's worth, for the shortcomings and neglect of the late Government, at the commencement of the war, had led to attempts to atone for their procrastination by a profuse, he might almost say, a profligate expenditure subsequently. The cost of feeding our army was of course considerable—but it was stated that, on average, it had amounted to as much as 1*l.* per day; yet the firm of Baines and Co., of Liverpool, had offered to furnish the army with provisions by contract at the rate of 3*s.* 6*d.* per head. In this proposed contract it was offered to supply daily to each soldier a pound of bread, a pound of beef or pork, a pound of preserved potatoes, a pint of ale, and half a gill of spirits, and they calculated that to enable them to do this four steamers of 1,200 tons burden each, besides four more for conveying fresh meat from the shores of the Black Sea, would be amply sufficient. Surely, then, the necessity for that amazing amount of tonnage which the Government had engaged might be seriously doubted. It might have been perfectly competent for the Government to require from contractors a month's supplies for the army to be furnished in advance, and still private enterprise might have provided a cheaper and safer mode of feeding our troops and preserving them from starvation. Mr. Green, of Blackwall, stated that while the Resolute was in the Government service she was about three months in port, and two months at sea; and yet the House was told by the right hon. Member for Carlisle that there had been no waste of tonnage. In all the operations of the war nothing seemed to have been done in time. The Government ought to have known that rapidity of action so indispensable in war—which was an affair of a word and a blow—was utterly incompatible with that cumbrous system of checks of which the right hon. Gentleman was so enamoured. They seemed to have imagined that the mechanical law might be true in war, that what you gained in velocity you lost in power. If there had been any exception to the rule of “too late” in the policy of the Government, it was that they had made Lord Raglan a field marshal when they received the telegraphic news of the battle of Inkerman, without waiting for the details, when it turned out, after all, to be the soldiers' and not the general's battle; and they had also made Mr. Samuel Morton Peto a Baronet because he proposed to construct a railway from Balaklava to the camp, instead of waiting till he had first executed his task, and then conferring this honour upon him. Her Majesty's ships went out without any preparations having been made for the rapid embarkation of guns and of cavalry; and in that state of things Mr. Roberts, the commander of Her Majesty's Ship Cyclops, invented a most ingenious and simple plan of pontoons, which was greatly approved, but not adopted until at his own expense he had provided some; when they were adopted, and enabled that rapid embarkation to take place at Varna, which had been so much admired. In fact, no service of greater importance had been rendered by any individual during the war than that which was thus performed by Mr. Roberts, and it had been presumed that he would be promoted. Whether he had received his promotion or not he (Mr. Cayley) was not aware, but certainly a better officer than Mr. Roberts could not, he (Mr. Caley) understand, be found in Her Majesty's service. On the whole, then, the responsibility for the management of the transport service must be brought home to the Admiralty; and to the inefficiency of that service must be ascribed the most serious calamities which had befallen the army in the Crimea. It was not our business to criticise or condemn the conduct of either Captain Christie or Admiral Boxer, who were both servants of the Admiralty. It was their masters, the Board of Admiralty, that this House should visit with its severe reprobation. War was as distasteful and repugnant to him (Mr. Cayley) as it could be to the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), and yet, by some inscrutable design of Providence, it seemed to subserve in the political world ends analogous to those effected by storms in the natural world—by clearing the atmosphere from accumulating impurity. If war, then, must be waged, it ought, at all events, to be conducted with energy and vigour. For after all it was nothing—appeals to justice failing—but a struggle to know which was the strongest. It was a trial of strength; and it had better be tried out, than by any indecision in the matter, give rise to frequent repetitions of the same struggle. This, however, had not hitherto been the case; and it was to be hoped that the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), taking warning from the errors of those who had preceded him, would insist upon every department being carried on with efficiency. It would be some compensation for the calamities of the war if, out of the chaos resulting from of cial incompetency, from obsolete pedantries and drivelling formalism, there should arise a system of order, efficiency, and vigour—a system that would stand the test of practical experience, and prove something more than a solemn sham and a gigantic imposture.

MR. BENTINCK said, that when the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) stated that he had sanctioned the formation of a Transport Board, because the superintendence of the business of the transport service was too arduous a duty for one man to discharge, he had—unconsciously, no doubt—laid bare the real secret of the errors and inefficiency of that board. A division of labour involved a division of responsibility—the one could not be obtained without the other. So long as they continued this system of divided responsibility, so long would they have the duties of the service inefficiently performed. He was glad to have heard it stated in the course of the debate that administrative reforms were contemplated; he trusted that amongst those reforms they would have to reckon the discontinuance of that system which had existed in this country from time immemorial—namely, that of placing civilians at the head of the naval and military departments. They might rely on it, so long as that system was maintained, that the duties of neither the one nor the other would be efficiently conducted. He cared not how great might be the administrative ability of any individual, if he was not thoroughly conversant with all the details of the profession over which he was appointed to preside—whether it was from his habits, his education, or his pursuits—all his efforts on behalf of the service must prove abortive. The present system was to place men at the head of the army who were not capable of managing a corporal's guard, and at the head of the navy persons incapable of taking charge of a coaster. He could mention the following cases as illustrative of the position which he had assumed; and he would do so the more readily as he saw the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle in his place. It would be in the recollection of the House that upon a former occasion, when the right hon. Baronet the late First Lord of the Admiralty having replied to a question which had been put to him—and he (Mr. Bentinck) would direct particular attention to the fact, that the statement was volunteered, and showed that the right hon. Baronet considered the fact of importance—well, having so replied to the question put to him, the right hon. Baronet proceeded to say that he would take that opportunity of advertizing to certain rumours that were in circulation relative to the loss of the Prince transport, outside the harbour of Balaklava. The right hon. Baronet then referred to certain reports in the newspapers, to the effect that the Prince had been lost in consequence of her chain cables not having been properly clinched; whereupon he informed the House that the chain cables of the Prince had been properly clinched, and that the loss of that vessel could be attributed, therefore, to no such cause. Having taken a great deal of interest in the matter, he confessed at the time he was not a little surprised at such a statement coming from the right hon. Baronet; still he hesitated, not feeling himself fully informed, to take notice of it. However, only a very few days ago, he happened to obtain possession of a document which confirmed in the fullest manner the impression which he entertained at that time. It would appear that so far from the facts being as stated by the right hon. Baronet, he was himself completely misinformed upon the subject. He held in his hand a description, a sketch of the manner in which the chain cables of the Prince were clinched, which he would be most happy to place in the hands of the right hon. Baronet or any other Member, and it would convince them that the chain cables were clinched in so imperfect a manner as to account for the loss of the vessel. In corroboration of that fact it was stated that the Perseverance—a vessel which had been performing lately certain rather curious gyrations in Woolwich Dockyard—had her chain cables clinched in a similar manner to the Prince; but on the news of the disaster relative to that transport reaching this country, the attention of the authorities was directed to that fact, and the chain cables of the Perseverance were clinched in an efficient manner. Now, he need not remind the House that the right hon. Baronet had had the most ample means of obtaining information upon this subject; however, naturally taking the report drawn up for him as correct, he made no further inquiries. But if the right hon. Gentleman had been a professional man he would have asked one more question, and which would have relieved him from the necessity of making such a statement to the House of Commons—he would have said, “ Show me how these chain cables were clinched.”

Mr. Cayley

Now, that, perhaps, might be a trifling instance of the consequences of their system; still, trifling as it was, it showed that even if a man were as distinguished for his talents as the right hon. Baronet it was impossible for him to conduct the affairs of a service with which he could not, by any possibility, be conversant. As he had said, therefore, he hoped that when this millennium was come about, the first of these administrative reforms would be made in this direction. But he also understood the right hon. Baronet to have disengaged from some statements with respect to a cargo of boots and shoes that had been alluded to. Now, although he was unable to contradict the right hon. Baronet, he might mention another case of mismanagement, which did go to prove that such an occurrence was by no means impossible. The Kangaroo transport had started from Varna for Eupatoria with the rest of the fleet, a portion of the Coldstream Guards being on board. When the troops landed at Eupatoria the Kangaroo was ordered round to Balaklava with the knapsacks of the regiment. She proceeded to Balaklava, but from thence she was despatched upon some other duty, without the knapsacks having been landed, and she returned to Balaklava in about a month, the knapsacks still on board, but the whole or nearly the whole of them were broken open, and their contents removed or destroyed. Now, though the story of the boots and shoes might be denied, there could be no doubt whatever as to the accuracy of the statement he had just made.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, the hon. Gentleman had chosen a very unfortunate case in illustration of his argument against entrusting the administration of the army and navy to civilians, because it so happened that the right hon. Baronet who lately presided over the Admiralty, did make every inquiry into the point whether or not the cables of the unfortunate Prince were clinched. They were not clinched, but the former owners of the ship, and the men who lashed the cables round the masts, put in their affidavits to show that they were well lashed and properly secured. The right hon. Baronet, therefore, knew as much of the circumstances as the hon. Gentleman. Again, the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cayley) complained of the Admiralty, because Mr. Roberts, the late master of the Ocyclops, had not been promoted. He had the satisfaction of assuring the hon. Gentleman that that excellent officer had obtained—and entirely through the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham)—one of the best situations which could be held by a master in the navy.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, nothing was easier than to find fault with the heads of departments, but it was very difficult for the heads of departments to prevent mistakes on the part of their subordinates. What was wanted was a reorganisation of the departments in such a way as to put an end to the blunders which Ministers of State could not possibly prevent. Several irregularities in the mode of conducting business had taken place, and the manner in which the various supplies were put on board ship for the East never could be justified. Articles which ought to have been shipped in one vessel had been stowed in several. He was convinced that any contractor would have managed matters very differently, and would have taken care that necessary articles never should be missing. He did not blame the Minister at the head of any department for the mismanagement, but he maintained that there should be a different organisation of the departments. He thought the country would be grateful to the hon. Gentleman who had brought this matter forward; and he hoped they would all join in helping any Government—not the present one especially—that would exert themselves properly, and oppose those who would not endeavour to bring about an honourable peace.

MR. H. BROWN said, he had some experience in the transport service, and had not heard a single fact adduced, in the course of the present discussion, on which the House could arrive at a conclusion. The hon. Gentleman who had brought the measure forward had not pointed out a single remedy for the evil of which he complained. He believed the great fault of the system pursued by the Government was, that they paid for time, instead of for services performed. The French Government made the essence of the contract the service, and therefore the work was done well and quickly. He had now several vessels in the service of the French Government, and he could speak to the superiority of their system. The French Government gave a premium of 1*l.* a ton if the passage was made in a given time; and the result of this arrangement was, that the captain and all parties concerned were directly interested in the speedy accomplishment of the voyage. Look at the emigration service. There the Government adopted the service system, and not the time occupied, and the difference was shown by the fact that, while the cost of transporting emigrants 16,000 miles to Australia was only 10*l.* a head, exclusive of provisions, the cost of sending each soldier to the Crimea was 150*l.* In fact, the cost of transporting troops was five times that of transporting emigrants, while the accommodation was not as good by one-third. He knew the case of a vessel that lay in Dublin for thirty-five days to take in sixty men and thirty-two horses—the cost of the ship while lying at Dublin being at the rate of more than 22*l.* per man. Another vessel to which he would refer was chartered to sail from Liverpool for the Crimea. Great delay took place, but at length this vessel, which was of 841 tons, took twenty men and fifteen horses, at a cost of 125*l.* for each man, and 300*l.* for each horse. He could give hundreds of similar cases, of which we might well be ashamed. He was astonished to hear the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) say that the transports lying at Balaklava were there in case they should be wanted for the re-embarkation of the troops, for in the House of Lords some nights ago the War Minister stated the very opposite. Everything connected with the transport service had been conducted in the most shameful and disgraceful manner, and he did not think the hon. Gentleman who brought forward the question had at all overstated the case.

COLONEL KNOX said, he had not intended to address the House, but, after the "bumptious" speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty on a previous occasion, he could not help saying a few words, though he observed that the hon. Gentleman was not now present. The hon. Gentleman had challenged any one to deny that the Admiralty had not been the best managed of all the departments. Now, he believed that it was to the mismanagement of the transport service all the miseries of the campaign in the Crimea were owing. He wished to make a few observations as to the transport service, and more particularly with reference to one vessel which had been mentioned—the Kangaroo. As the discussion was on, he wished to put it to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, whether the officers were to be compensated for the loss of their effects. There was one officer in particular who lost to the value of 200*l.*, and was compelled to go to the same expense over again. He did not think it fair that those Gentlemen should be permitted to lose the value of those things, and that the culprits, whoever they might be, should go scot free. He was one of those who attributed the whole mischief and misery of that army to the transport service, and he charged the whole of the evil at the door of Admiral Boxer. Would it be believed that instead of removing that officer altogether, the Government merely changed him to another station, where he would have every opportunity of making things worse? The right hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham) could have easily learned that a number of transports were lying idle at the Bosphorus doing nothing. At a time when their services were so much required there were sixty at least lying idle there. When a man at the head of a department had acted so improperly, the Government, instead of removing him, placed him in a situation where he would be capable of doing more mischief.

SIR CHARLES WOOD : I am sorry, Sir, to say that the absence of my hon. friend the Secretary of the Admiralty is owing to the death of a near relative, and therefore I do think that before hon. Members indulge in such observations as we have just heard they should take a little trouble to ascertain whether there is any just ground for them. The hon. and gallant Member has made an unjust attack upon Admiral Boxer, for every report which the Government have received shows a considerable improvement in the state of the harbour at Balaklava since the appointment of Admiral Boxer to that post. I will not detain the House at any length, or wander into those points which have occupied the attention of hon. Members, but which have little or no connexion with the transport service; but, on the whole, I must express my thanks to the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Lindsay) for the testimony he has given with respect to the efficiency of the management of the transport service, and especially of the officer under whose charge the transports were taken up; and I will say, that a better public servant than that officer the Government or the country does not possess. Some observations have been made with respect to the high rate at which the troops have been conveyed, but the House will recollect that shipowners taking a cargo for their own benefit are able to convey passengers at a much lower rate than a vessel conveying troops, and which takes nothing else. So, in the like manner, if a vessel is employed to go backwards and forwards, conveying troops between particular places without delay or stoppage it might be done at much less trouble and cost. If men could be moved like pieces on a chessboard, then there might be some ground for complaint. But what was the fact here? The officers in command in the Black Sea wished to retain the transports in case their services were required for moving troops from one port to another; and, although complaints are made of vessels of large size being kept idle, the practical effect was, that they were rendered available for the purpose of conveying the troops from Varna to the Crimea. Then, again, with respect to the vessels detained there, they were detained not at the wish of the Admiralty or any other authority at home, but because it was the desire of the generals that they should be available for any service the necessity of which might arise. Whatever complaints may be made with respect to the ships which are now lying in Balaklava harbour, all I can say is that the best judges are those who were present upon the scene of operations, and they may deem it necessary that they should have the power of moving the troops at all times at their command. It is very easy to bring forward general accusations. Such accusations are very difficult to answer until they are brought to the test; but I boldly assert that not one single specific charge which has been brought forward has turned out to be correct. What was the case with respect to the assertion regarding the boots and shoes? It was utterly false. Then, again, there was an equally erroneous assertion with respect to the stowage of the medical stores in the Prince. It was alleged that the medical stores were placed below the Ordnance stores, whereas the assertion turns out to be utterly untrue, for the Ordnance stores were placed at the bottom of the hold, and the medical stores above them. They were, therefore, perfectly accessible, and there was no reason why they should not have been landed at Scutari, except the anxiety of the captain to proceed to the Crimea. Whenever there has been a specific charge it has been contradicted, and I do think that a little more inquiry would have prevented much misapprehension upon the subject.

COLONEL KNOX said he must apologise for having referred to the Secretary of the Admiralty, but was quite unaware of the cause of his absence.

M. G. DUNDAS said, he could give the First Lord of the Admiralty an instance of stores being improperly stowed. The Tynemouth was engaged to take out some heavy guns to Malta and shot to the Crimea. The shot was stowed on the top of the guns, and the guns were in the Tynemouth at the present moment.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would inquire into the case.

The House then went into committee pro forma and immediately resumed.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE—THE MILITARY CONVENTION WITH SARDINIA.

Order of the Day for considering Her Majesty's most gracious Message of Friday last, read.

THE EARL OF CLARENDRON: My Lords, in moving your Lordships to take into consideration Her Majesty's gracious Message, I feel that it would be unbecoming in me to detain your Lordships for any lengthened time, as I think that your Lordships would consider that it would be superfluous for me to offer any argument in support of the Address in answer to the Message which I intend to propose; because, my Lords, although the treaty which, by Her Majesty's command, was proposed to the Sardinian Government has only recently been ratified, we must all agree that the treaty is one which has long since received the assent of Parliament and of the nation. My Lords, I well remember the cheers which from all parts of this House greeted the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) when, with even more than his accustomed fervour and eloquence, he declared the gratification he had experienced upon learning that the treaty had been signed, which has since been laid upon your Lordships' table. The only drawback which there appear to be to the satisfaction of the noble Earl was that diplomacy had had something to do with the matter. It will, therefore, be agreeable to your Lordships to learn that no solicitation was required to be made on our part to the Sardinian Government to bring about a result which, I must say, more than any other event of a similar kind within my recollection, has been received with satisfaction by all ranks and classes of the people of this country. The only merit which diplomacy or Her Majesty's Government can claim, is having thought that the time had arrived when an invitation to the Sardinian Government to adhere to the Anglo-French treaty of April 10 might be acceptable. We were not disappointed in our expectations; for within a very few hours after the proposal was made to the Sardinian Government by those of England and France, the Sardinian Government, acting with that vigour of purpose and perfect good faith which characterise all its proceedings, and which has secured for it success at home and respect abroad, agreed to those preliminaries which left us in no doubt about the ultimate arrangement of the treaty. I think it will not be unacceptable to your Lordships to learn the precise grounds on which the Sardinian Government adhered to the Anglo-French treaty, and I will, therefore, read to you a short extract from a despatch from the President of the Council and Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Cavour, which has been officially communicated to Her Majesty by the Minister of Sardinia in this country. In that despatch he said—

" When the treaty of alliance of April 10, 1854, between France and England was officially communicated to Sardinia, the Government of the King, while it recognised both the right and the duty of the Great Powers to oppose the encroachments of Russia, and to defend the Ottoman Empire from an unjust aggression, while it proclaimed its sincerest sympathies in the cause which France and England were generously defending, nevertheless abstained for the time from availing itself of the stipulation in article 5 of the treaty. Now, however, the war has assumed great dimensions in the East and in the Baltic, and the whole world is convinced that the question which is agitated in the East is a European question, all are now agreed that if the Great Powers have in it an interest more direct, the States of second order are threatened in their commerce, and, what is of more importance, in their independence, by the ambitious progress of Russia. The moment is therefore arrived for opposing to the vast means of action that she possesses, and even the enormous advantages of her geographical position, the united efforts of the Powers, who, free from all ambitious projects, aspire only to guard against dangers which it might afterwards be too late to avert, and to secure the triumph of the eternal principles of justice and of right."

My Lords, to a Government animated by such sentiments no solicitation was necessary. Nor should I omit to remind your Lordships that, in adhering to the Anglo-French treaty, Sardinia had adhered to that article of the treaty which I will call the self-denying article—the article by which England and France bound themselves to derive no advantage from the war—a stipulation which is not, I believe, to be found in any other treaty, and which, therefore, reflects the more honour upon those who have set such an example. Sardinia adheres to that engagement, and thereby meets the accusations which might and would otherwise have been brought against her of wishing to engage in this contest in order hereafter to procure territorial aggrandisement, profiting by the troubles the war produces, or claiming such advantages on the proclamation of peace. Sardinia takes her full share in the war, and I think it is honourable in her not to demand any such advantages. She makes no such demand; but her finances not being equal to meet the expense of placing upon a war footing a large force whose numerical strength is always to be kept up to a certain amount, without undue taxation to the people, she applied to England for an advance of money, the interest of which she will pay and will provide a sinking fund for its ultimate redemption. Not having means of transport at her disposal, she also asked that these troops should be conveyed by us. Her Majesty's Government, waiting the approval of Parliament, have agreed to the advance of money, and at this moment a British fleet is on its way to Genoa, where it will embark for the theatre of war these men who, if reports be correct, are inferior to none in Europe in organisation, in discipline, in equipment, and in courage. This will be effected at no eventual cost to England, and at a much less present expense than that for which a similar number of British troops could be sent out. The extract which I have just had the pleasure of reading shows the complete identity of purpose which now unites Sardinia with England and France in this contest. Give me leave to say, also, that I think it manifests the spirit of independence and of justice which animates the Sardinian Government, by which they have been able to surmount many and peculiar difficulties at home, and by which, while scrupulously fulfilling their engagements with foreign Governments and maintaining good faith, they have secured for themselves rational liberty and constitutional freedom. With their struggles we in England have always sympathised ; we have rejoiced at their success ; but we have never directly or indirectly interfered in the matter. I believe that one great cause of the success of Sardinia is that it has been wholly free from the action of foreign Governments. The institutions which its people have given to themselves are of native growth and culture, and are on that account stronger and more deep-rooted, and better adapted to their purpose. Sardinia has been free from the curse of foreign parties in her own territory, intriguing and competing for a nominal and worthless influence ; and such complete confidence has been established among all classes, that the King, with the full approval of his Parliament and his people, is enabled to send forth the flower of his army to contend in a just cause, without a thought or a fear of revolution or disturbance. My Lords, Sardinia is a territory small in itself, but she will raise herself in the scale of nations by taking part in the settlement of one of the greatest questions that has agitated Europe in modern times, by placing her army side by side with those of France and England—destined to share the same toils, the same dangers, and, as I hope, the same triumphs. I think also we may anticipate, hereafter, a closer alliance between England and Sardinia, founded upon a more intimate knowledge of each other, and an increase of that kindly and cordial feeling by which the people of England are now animated towards her. The noble Earl concluded by moving that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her for Her most gracious Message, and promising Her the support of the House in carrying out the stipulations of the Treaty She has entered into with the King of Sardinia.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE wished to say, that he concurred most completely with the Address which the noble Earl proposed to lay at the foot of the Throne ; and if he were to make any remark upon the subject, it would be, that he quite agreed with the noble Earl, not only as to the policy of supporting the treaty, but also in the high encomiums which the noble Earl had bestowed upon the Sardinian Government. He had himself had an opportunity of knowing many persons who were connected with the army of that country ; and amongst them he had always found a generosity and nobility of character, which he had not been prepared to meet with very frequently amongst the Italian people. The Sardinian people, whatever unfavourable circumstances they might have had to contend with, possessed a very high sense of the value of liberty, and a genuine love of liberal institutions, which they had cherished in the face of the greatest difficulties, and without the assistance of any foreign Power. There was no nation, he believed, to the south of France, which had evinced so great a capacity of self-development, not only in the improvement of her agriculture and commerce, but in the growth of her liberal institutions, as the Sardinians had. There were no people animated with a higher sentiment of national honour. He (the Earl of Hardwicke) had had an opportunity, too, of seeing what the Sardinian soldier was. A better disciplined force, he believed, existed not upon the face of the earth. At the time he saw them they were a defeated army ; they had just suffered a severe defeat at the battle of Novara ; but he found them, even in that condition, an organised body of men, and commanded by most able officers, and at their head was General de La Marmora who was about to proceed to the Crimea at this time. He could state, for the satisfaction of the English army, that the General was a man of high ability, whose soldierlike qualities would merit their esteem, and that he possessed, moreover, so much openness, frankness, and nobility of character, that he would be always accessible to their communications, and receive them in a congenial manner ; the General was a good soldier, and a perfect gentleman.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that much as the present unhappy war was to be deplored, it would not be unattended with some compensatory circumstances, one of which was the intimate relations about to be established between this country and Sardinia, and the position which that country was about to take among the nations of Europe, a position due, not to her geographical extent or the number of her people, but to the vigour of her principles, the nobility of her efforts, and the wise and righteous administration of such men as were now at the head of her affairs. The people of this country are regarding with the most intense interest and anxiety the struggles of that noble country for civil and religious liberty—for independence without and independence within ; and if —which God forbid —the Government should be called upon to appeal to the people of England to defend Sardinia against external aggression—come from whatever quarter it might—rely upon it they would meet with such a response from the most northern to the most southern point of England, from John o'Groat's House to the Land's End, as had never before been made.

Address agreed to, Nemine Dissentientibus;
and Ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH AUSTRALIA.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he was charged with a petition from the Australian Postal Association, praying for the re-establishment of the Postal Steam Service between Australia and England, in explanation of which he would describe the strange position, at present, of the postal service between this country and Australia. The question of postal steam communication with Australia had been agitated since 1846. In 1851 the attention of Parliament was particularly called to the subject, and a Committee was appointed, on the Motion of a noble Lord in the other House, to make inquiry into the postal service of Australia. The result of that inquiry was that two special contracts had been entered into to carry on that service. One contract was made with the Oriental Steam Navigation Company to carry the mails to the Mediterranean, whence they were taken to Singapore, to be from thence conveyed to Australia; the other arrangement was for their conveyance by way of the Cape of Good Hope, and the contract was given to the General Screw Steam Navigation Company. These arrangements were for alternate months, the mails of one month being conveyed by one route, and of the next month by the other way; and the time occupied in so carrying the mails to Australia was, by one route, from sixty to sixty-five days, and by the other route, from sixty-four to seventy days. Such were the arrangements up to the commencement of the war. Whether they were perfectly satisfactory or not he would not say, but they gave a constant and tolerably rapid communication between Australia and the mother country. Now, the great importance of that communication was evident from the fact that the mails carried via Singapore generally amounted to thirty or forty tons in weight, contained in 300 or 400 boxes; and the amount of postal revenue received on them was now 90,000*l.* a year. The value of our exports to Australia in 1853 was no less than 14,506,532*l.*—an unheard-of amount, exceeding our average exports to America by a million and a half, and being double our exports to India or to Germany, and six times greater than our exports to France; seven times greater than our exports to China. That our Australian colonies should have risen so rapidly to such great commercial importance, was a strong argument for a speedy and sure postal intercourse with them. The grievances, however, they complained of now were, that at this moment, when such large quantities of English goods were lying there, and when it was particularly important that their owners should be able to send out instructions how to dispose of them, postal communication was stopped. He meant, that as sailing vessels had been substituted for steam vessels, the people must now wait three, four, or five months for the return of their correspondence, whereas formerly the time a letter took to reach them was six weeks. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey), in receiving a deputation from Australia on this subject, said "he viewed the establishment of steam postal communication as a matter of the utmost importance, and that he should be happy to do what he could to remove the obstacles in the way of its establishment," and he therefore hoped he should have his assistance on the present occasion. The petitioners, while they admitted that the war must have diverted a portion of the steam marine, said that by proper arrangements the steam postal communication with Australia need not have been interrupted. The petition having given information as to the subject of which it complained, went on to propose the remedy. Their Lordships would remember that in other colonies, such as the Canadas, they were allowed to arrange their own postal service; and the petitioners asked on the part of Australia that she should be allowed to do the same thing. They stated that there existed in Australia wealthy steam companies, possessed of steamships well adapted for the conveyance of mails, and willing to establish a branch line between Sydney and Singapore, and they prayed the House to take into its earliest consideration the injury sustained by the commerce of the colony in consequence of the suspension of all steam intercourse with this country, and to vote an address, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to direct that arrangements might be made for the re-establishment of postal communications between the two countries. Whatever difficulties there might be in the way of carrying on the postal service as it had been carried on before the commencement of the war, he could see no objection to allowing the colony to do that which had been done by other colonies—namely, establish a postal service of its own.

VISCOUNT CANNING said, that the question which the noble Earl had brought under the consideration of their Lordships was undoubtedly one of considerable importance to the mercantile community in this country, and of vital interest to that body in Australia. But he thought that the noble Earl had been misled with respect to some of the details he had laid before their Lordships. He was surprised to hear the noble Earl state that the revenue derived by this country from the conveyance of the mails to and from Australia amounted to 90,000*l.* a year.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE explained: What he meant to say was that that was the gross revenue derived from that service.

VISCOUNT CANNING: He could assure the noble Earl that even that statement was a very exaggerated one. It appeared from the Report of a Commission which had last year been laid before their Lordships, that two years ago the gross revenue derived from that service had not quite amounted to one-half of the alleged sum of 90,000*l.* a year; and since that time the revenue from that source had been diminished by the reduction effected in the rate of postage, so that, according to the nearest estimates he could obtain, it did not at present amount to more than about 36,000*l.* a year. The noble Earl had stated that there were in Australia ship-owners who would be willing to undertake the carriage of mails between this country and Australia. An application had been addressed to him by an Australian company that he should enter into engagements with them to the effect that, if they were to construct certain vessels which they did not at present possess, they should receive a contract from the Government.

But he had declined to accede to that application, because he considered that it would be rash and very unadvisable to entertain the proposals of a company which had not already the means of carrying out their undertaking, and which could not give some substantial proof that they could fulfil their contract. With regard to what was called the suspension of the postal service with Australia, he must remind the noble Earl that the war in which we were engaged not only called for every resource which the country could command, but paralysed the means by which those resources were maintained. Two companies had not long ago been engaged in carrying on that postal communication; but last year, at the outbreak of the war, a number of large ocean steamers had been hired by the Government for the purpose of military transport from several companies, and from those two companies in particular. It so happened that he was at that very time in communication with one of those companies — namely, the Peninsular and Oriental—for the purpose of obtaining from them the conveyance of a monthly instead of a bi-monthly mail; so that while the contract with the General Screw Steam Shipping Company would also have continued in force there would have been eighteen instead of twelve mails each year between this country and Australia. The exigencies of the war, however, had not only prevented such an arrangement, but had even led to a reduction of the postal communication previously established. Australia was not the only sufferer. The lines to all the other colonies and to foreign countries had been interfered with. The Peninsular and Oriental Company had, a short time ago, eight of their vessels employed in the conveyance of troops; the General Screw Steam Shipping Company had seven vessels engaged in the same service; eight of Cunard's vessels had been similarly employed; and altogether there had been not less than from twenty-seven to thirty large postal steamers in the service of the Government for the purposes of the war. Australia had certainly suffered more than our other colonies from that interruption of its ordinary postal communication, because, from its greater distance, it had become impossible to find any substitutes for the steamers which had been so withdrawn, and the Government had necessarily been compelled to fall back on sailing vessels for the conveyance of the Australian mails. But they were so convinced of the inconvenience which had been produced by that change, that, notwithstanding the exigencies of the war, they were at present in communication with the parties who were most likely to be able to supply the existing deficiency—the Peninsular and Oriental Company—as to the terms on which that Company would be able to establish a postal service with Australia by way of Singapore and Point de Galle. He did not look forward to this as a permanent arrangement, as he thought that hereafter a much better one might be made, both as regarded the public here and the colony. He repeated that he thought there were some errors of the statement in the petition which the noble Earl had just laid before the House. In opposition to the allegation of the noble Earl with respect to the capabilities of companies in the colony for carrying out that communication, he should observe that he had reason to believe that there were not more than one or two steamers in Australia that could undertake the long ocean voyage. Again, the noble Earl had fallen into a serious error in speaking of the difference of time in which the voyage was made by the steamers and by sailing vessels. The noble Earl had stated that in consequence of the employment of sailing vessels instead of steamers it took four or five months at present to send a letter to Australia and to receive an answer to it, although the same service had formerly been performed in five or six weeks.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that what he had intended to state was, that whereas the passage between this country and Australia had formerly occupied only about six weeks, it occupied at present three or four months.

VISCOUNT CANNING: That, too, was a mistake. The passage between this country and Australia had never been performed in so short a time as six weeks: the average time consumed in the passage by the vessels of the General Screw Steam Shipping Company had been from eighty-five to ninety days. It was the intention of the Government to establish again, as soon as possible, an efficient steam communication between this country and the Australian colonies; and he would take the liberty to add, that he hoped the colonists and those who influenced their councils would be patient with the Government in this matter. He thought it was not unfair to remind them that we were engaged in a very serious contest, and that whatever might be thought of the manner in which that contest had hitherto been conducted, one thing was certain, that the evils of war had not affected the distant and peaceful shores of our Australian colonies, and that neither their enterprise nor their tranquillity had in any way suffered, or even been threatened. That being so, he thought he might fairly ask that they should display a little indulgence, and that they should evince their readiness to forego for a time the convenience they had hitherto derived from the employment in their postal service of vessels which were at present found essentially necessary for the vigorous prosecution of the war.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he was informed that the Australasian Steam Packet Company possessed twenty vessels, many of which were of 700 or 800 tons burden.

DESPATCH OF BUSINESS—COURT OF CHANCERY BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the Bill read.

Moved, that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee upon the said Bill.

LORD LYNDHURST said, that the Bill referred to very important matters, which he thought it most desirable that it should be referred to a Select Committee. He had to present petitions in favour of such a course of proceeding from the Incorporated Law Society, and from the clerks referred to in one of the clauses of the Bill. The noble and learned Lord, who was very indistinctly heard, proceeded to condemn the existing mode of remunerating solicitors, which, he contended, required a thorough revision. Until such a step were taken, most of our other reforms in the judicial system of the country, whether relating to equity or to the common law, would be in a great measure nugatory and abortive. In adducing authorities in support of this view, the noble and learned Lord quoted an opinion expressed before the Incorporated Law Society by the late Lord Langdale, then Master of the Rolls, which was to the effect that the present system gave to solicitors and all other legal practitioners a direct interest in increasing the length of documents and in protracting the duration of proceedings; and that in many cases a solicitor was compelled, in his own defence, to put his client to very heavy and unnecessary expense, in order to obtain some remuneration for services in respect of which he could not otherwise make a legal demand. The noble and learned Lord then illustrated the practical working of the system by reference to particular instances, characterising it as absurd, unequal, unjust, and impolitic, and arguing that under its operation the solicitor had an interest directly adverse to that of his client, and antagonistic to that speedy and efficient administration of justice the promotion of which had been the object of so much of our recent legislation. The system was closely connected with the speedy and efficient administration of justice in the Court of Chancery; it called for investigation, and he believed it could not be investigated better than by referring this Bill to a Select Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR agreed that the question of the remuneration of solicitors in the Court of Chancery was of the greatest importance; at the same time it was one of very considerable difficulty, and he thought he had some right to complain that his noble and learned Friend had not communicated with him previous to bringing it under the notice of the House, as he then should have been able to enter into the subject more fully. Shortly after his acceptance of the Great Seal he had been waited upon by a deputation from the society referred to; and, in consequence of the representations then made to him, he had thought it his duty to look into the subject to see if he could devise any more satisfactory plan by which the remuneration of solicitors should be calculated upon the principle of the quantum meruit, which ought, in truth, to be the object of all systems. The noble and learned Lord said that the remuneration ought to be calculated on the scale of quantum meruit, but the difficulty was how to ascertain the quantum meruit. The scale of fees at present in force had been fixed by his predecessor in office after great consideration; and, no doubt, it would be extremely inconvenient to be changing the fees every year, so that persons would never know what it was that they were to receive. It very often happened that the interest of the client conflicted with that of the solicitor, and, if proceedings were to be paid for by their length, not very honourable practitioners would be occasionally tempted to lengthen the proceedings, in order to increase their remuneration. The proposal to pay them according to a per centage of the value of the property involved appeared to him perfectly preposterous, for sometimes a question involving 100,000*l.* might occupy a very short space of time. In like manner, it would be impossible to look into each separate case to see what remuneration should be given for the particular service performed. He had, however, consulted the three Judges and the taxing master upon the subject, beside several eminent practitioners in the Court, with a view of devising some more satisfactory scale; he found, however, that he was fully justified in saying that the matter was full of insuperable difficulties, and he had been obliged to leave it as he found it, with the exception of making some slight alterations in the fees adopted in 1842. This was in the spring of 1853. Since then the Master of the Rolls had informed him that he had gone into the subject, but had not succeeded in framing any plan which would exactly meet the views of all parties, and he had abandoned the task. It was customary for the Judges of the Court of Chancery to meet together, in the evening of the first or second day of each term, to consult as to any alterations of practice which might have been suggested by the proceedings of the previous three months; and at one of these meetings, at the beginning of Michaelmas or Trinity term last, it was represented to him by all the Judges of the Court of Chancery that it would be of great advantage if largely increased remuneration were given to solicitors in cases where, by their having got the facts into a neat and intelligible form a long inquiry was superseded, and the hearing compressed into an hour or two, instead of being spread over two or three days. This was an alteration which he had been of opinion could safely be made; but he owned he entirely despaired of ever arriving at any general system of remuneration which should exactly satisfy the wishes of all parties. If his noble and learned Friend would move for a Committee to inquire into that subject, he should be the last man to oppose it, provided it was to be effected in a legitimate manner; but he certainly could not consent to such an inquiry being tacked on to this Bill, with which it had nothing whatever to do. With respect to the present Bill, the original object in introducing it was to obtain power to appoint additional junior clerks to assist the senior clerks in the Judges' chambers, it having been represented to him by the Judges that the business in their offices was greatly impeded by the want of such clerks. The senior clerks, it appeared, having each only one junior clerk under them, were often obliged to do work which would properly fall to the lot of a junior clerk to attend to, and it was thought advisable that extra assistance should be afforded them by the appointment of a second junior clerk in each office. He originally introduced the Bill with that sole object; but his attention was then called by persons connected with the Court of Chancery to the fact, that there was one office, that of Master of Reports and Entries, the abolition of which had been recommended by a Committee of the House of Commons, but that was not adopted by the Act passed three years ago, although other recommendations of that Committee were adopted; and the second object of this Bill was virtually the abolition of that office. The reason why the recommendation he had mentioned was not adopted was, that his noble Friend, Lord Truro, thought that that was a hasty recommendation—that the office was useful—that, if necessary, its duties might be increased; he therefore thought it was better it should remain. But it had since been found that the office did not work well. The office of Clerks of Records and Writs, in which most of the business of the Court of Chancery was carried on, could transact more business, and more effectually, if it were separated from the Office of Reports and Entries in the way in which it now existed. It was therefore suggested as desirable, practically to abolish the Office of Reports and Entries, the present holder of that office to be called upon to perform other duties, with the same salary, during his life, and that the duties he had hitherto discharged should be transferred to the Clerks of Records and Writs. He had made it his duty to go and inspect the Office of the Master of Reports and Entries, and he must say that it was in a most discreditable state. The place was crowded with documents so as to defy all attempt at arrangement, and the whole floor was covered with papers that were of the greatest importance. By the Act of the 15 and 16 of Vict., four clerks were appointed to perform the duties of Clerk of Reports. One of those appointments fell vacant the other day. The Master of the Rolls had not felt it to accord with his views to fill up that vacancy, so that three clerks were now discharging the whole of the duties of that office. It was proposed that they should continue to do so, and that if it should appear to the Lord Chancellor that the additional duty cast upon them deserved additional salary, he—with the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls—was empowered to give it, so that the whole amount paid for such salaries in any one year should not exceed, if divided equally, 250*l.* for each clerk. Under the Act which abolished the Masters' Offices, power was given to the Lord Chancellor to let or sell the Masters' Offices; now by a former Act, the fee of these offices was vested in the Crown; and the third object of this Bill was, that the piece of ground in Southampton Buildings and the buildings thereon should be vested in the Lord Chancellor for the time being for the purposes of the said Act. With regard to the proposal of his noble and learned Friend to refer the question of solicitors' fees to a Select Committee, he thought it was going out of their Lordships' way, and would be doing an act which was not at all necessary.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that one thing was most obvious, that nothing would be more unwise than to disturb the late settlement on this question without grave consideration. What he called the late settlement was the Act passed in 1852, when the new arrangements were made with regard to the Court of Chancery, affecting not only the matters referred to in the Bill now before their Lordships, but the whole business of the highest court of judicature in the kingdom. He was not disposed to offer any opposition to the present measure; but there ought to be great forbearance exercised in coming to a decision upon any particular branch of the system until they saw how all its parts worked together. If their Lordships allowed a pressure from without to have too much influence, they might by and by find it exceedingly inconvenient. Give the system a little time to work, and whatever evils might be found in it, set about and correct them. As regarded the appointment of an additional junior clerk to each chief clerk, it was impossible to resist that demand. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend, as to the appointment of an additional chief clerk, that if not absolutely necessary he should regret its being done. If the Judges did not require it, he was sure the chief clerks did not require it. If there were more chief clerks, it appeared to him that the great security of the whole plan of 1852 would be violated. That plan was based upon this:—that the clerks should be kept in their proper position ; that they should be men of ability and of judicial power, but that they should not be viewed in the same light as the masters were, but should depend upon and be under the sole direction of the Judge. The duties of the chief clerks, from what he had himself seen, had been well discharged, and he believed the offices were filled by men who had proved themselves competent for the duties intrusted to them. With regard to the building of new courts, he certainly would press upon his noble and learned Friend the necessity of taking the subject into consideration without loss of time. He rejoiced that he had successfully resisted the transferring of the Judges chambers to the masters' offices. He felt that the locality was extremely prejudicial for carrying on the business of the Court of Chancery ; but, although he did so, never thought of hiring chambers except as a temporary arrangement. There was a spot in Lincoln's Inn on which two new courts could be built, with convenient chambers for the Judges' clerks, and if the Masters' offices in Southampton buildings were sold and the money applied to the new building, the expense would be very small indeed. He thought the Government ought to erect the building suggested, as it was almost essential to the working of the legislation of 1852. As his noble and learned Friend retained the Master of the Records and his salary, he did not object to that part of the Bill. He considered the clerks had mistaken the course which they ought to have taken, and that, instead of petitioning against the Bill, they should have gone to his noble and learned Friend and respectfully submitted to him any complaint on the subject of remuneration. Unless the new system were watched they would have abuses springing up. It was not sufficient to carry measures of reform. It was the duty of his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, of his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Lyndhurst), and of himself—who understood the subject—to give their anxious attention, for the benefit of the suitor, to see that the system worked as was intended. It was said that the attorneys did a great deal of work and had very little to show for it ; but they must take the business altogether, and consider whether the whole did not produce sufficient remuneration. His noble and learned Friend said the attorneys had the temptation to make conveyances of unnecessary length for the sake of costs ; but he did not believe—though in every profession there would be some persons who would act dishonourably and discreditably—that any respectable professional man would indulge in great length for the mere purpose of making charges. If they altered the fees, that would give an additional motive for delay. They could not prevent delay except by such arrangements as those of 1852. His argument with the attorneys was that, although the scale of fees was not so large, the facility with which cases would be decided and these bills paid would be more advantageous than those long-winded suits in which the interest of their money absorbed a great proportion of their profits. He could have no other motive in settling the fees of 1852 than that of giving fair remuneration to the attorneys, standing as he did between them and the suitors. If it could be shown that they were entitled to higher remuneration he was perfectly ready to join with his noble and learned Friend in giving it ; but still he must say they ought to take the rough with the smooth—it would not do to take all the plums and leave the rest of the pudding. The attorneys desired to have any expense saved by their exertions considered in the amount of remuneration. If that could be done he should not object, but there must be something by which to measure the value of services, and, therefore, the proposition on the part of the solicitors did not seem to him to be practicable. He would not oppose the Committee, but he was bound to declare that he should not go to that Committee with any hope of ever coming at a satisfactory conclusion. There were in the scheme of 1852 several things requiring attention, and one was the operation of the regulation relative to the examination of witnesses. Care should be taken to see that the expenses were kept within narrow bounds, and that no special examination was taken without very sufficient grounds. There ought also to be some check upon the number of counsel who attended before the examiner.

LORD LYNDHURST said, it was now nine or ten years since he had washed his hands of the Court of Chancery, and he had never wished to entangle himself again in its folds. He had to-night presented a petition from the Incorporated Law Society, who were more minutely acquainted than any other body of men with the proceedings of the Court of Chancery. He had no doubt their statements were correct, and he had founded his observations upon the statements of that petition.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR had referred to the petition of the clerks in the Record office, who had not adopted a perfectly correct course in presenting a petition to their Lordships' House without previously communicating with the head of that Court. The circumstance should never be an obstacle in their way as far as he was concerned, but he must protest against such a course as irregular. He thought it right to add that he had received a letter from seven other clerks in that office, who stated that they entirely disengaged from the petition.

LORD LYNDHURST said, that the Bill did not put the clerks of the Record office on the same footing as the other offices, as was recommended by the Select Committee of the House of Commons of 1848.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made; The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

SCOTCH MILITIA.

MR. EWART inquired whether any measures were in contemplation for relieving certain towns in Scotland from the billeting of the militia, which was now complained of as being severely oppressive.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL stated that orders had been given through the Ordnance that buildings should be hired for the accommodation of the militia in Scotland.

BLOCKADE OF THE BALTIC.

MR. SANDARS inquired of the First Lord of the Admiralty at what period it was intended to establish a blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic and White Seas, and if the blockade was, from the first to the last, to be an effective one.

SIR C. WOOD stated that it was intended, as soon as the Baltic ports were opened, to establish as effective a blockade as possible, and that the blockade would be effective from first to last.

THE TREATY OF THE 2nd OF DECEMBER.

MR. LAYARD: I rise to ask my noble Friend at the head of the Government whether it is in his power to lay upon the table of the House any correspondence that has taken place between the allied Powers upon the subject of the treaty of the 2nd of December—any documents which have been communicated to the Russian Government upon the Four Points—and whether he has any objection to place upon the table protocols which, it is understood, have been signed, giving a construction to at least two of those Four Points?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is an invariable practice, and it is a wholesome custom, while important negotiations are pending, not to lay before Parliament fragmentary portions of the correspondence which may have taken place on the subject. I, therefore, shall not be able to comply with the request of my hon. Friend. I may, however, say that no communications were made directly from the British to the Russian Government; that whatever took place has been conveyed through the medium of the Austrian Government, which was then friendly to both. Since the declaration of war, it is obvious that no direct communication could take place between the Governments of Russia and Great Britain.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE—THE MILITARY CONVENTION WITH SARDINIA.

On the Motion of VISCOUNT PALMERSTON,

The House went into Committee to take into consideration the Queen's Message with reference to the Treaty with Sardinia.

The QUEEN'S MESSAGE read.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to propose to the Committee a Resolution for the purpose of enabling Her Majesty to fulfil the engagement which by treaty she has entered into with the King of Sardinia; and I will now state the grounds on which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the arrangement made is one which it is befitting for Parliament to sanction. It is well known that we are engaged in a war with a great military Power. It is true that we are acting in concert with another great military power—the Emperor of the French, who has at his disposal a large amount of military force; but the circumstances under which this country engaged in a war—namely, beginning operations on a peace establishment, naturally had the effect of limiting within a more narrow compass than might have been expected at a more advanced stage of the war, the military resources of the country applicable to the operations which we had to carry on. Therefore, as we have not the power which other countries have of suddenly, by conscription, adding a large amount of force to their existing establishments, it became necessary for Her Majesty's Government to consider by what means we might make a rapid augmentation of that military force which it had become necessary for us to employ in the operations of the war. With that view it was that we had recourse to Parliament to enable Her Majesty to accept the voluntary services of a portion of her Militia for garrison duty in the Mediterranean. It was also for that purpose that we applied to Parliament to enable Her Majesty to accept the services of such foreigners as might be inclined to enlist in Her Majesty's service during the war. It was for this purpose, too, that the treaty with Sardinia was formed, and which is the subject of discussion on the present occasion. By that treaty, Sardinia engages to furnish an auxiliary force of 15,000 men to co-operate with the armies of England and France, and of course to maintain that auxiliary force at that effective strength. But as the sending forth of an army of that amount to a distant country must necessarily be attended with a considerable immediate outlay, it was agreed between the Government of Sardinia and that of Her Majesty, that application should be made to Parliament to enable the Queen to advance 1,000,000*l.* sterling to Sardinia, for the purpose of defraying the expense of this expedition—Sardinia paying 4 cent. interest upon that advance as a loan, of which 1 per cent. is to form a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of the loan. Now if we come to consider, in the first place, what is the value of the auxiliary force thus obtained, I think nobody, who knows anything of the state of Sardinia, or of the Sardinian army, will be disposed to underrate the value of that assistance. It is needless to refer to the records of history, which show that Piedmontese troops have always been distinguished, not only for their bravery in the field, but for all those military qualities and scientific attainments which render armies available, and increase, as far as numbers go, their chances of success, whenever or wherever they may be employed. It is well known that the Sardinian army is one of the best armies in Europe. The auxiliary force will be commanded by a general distinguished for his personal abilities, as well as for his professional knowledge—I mean General La Marmora; and I must say, Sir, that I anticipate great advantage from the co-operation of so valuable a force. The history of the House of Savoy is full of glorious records, but I will venture to say that there is no page in that history which will redound more to the honour of that dynasty and country than that which records the treaty by which Sardinia has associated herself with England and with France in the cause of the rights of nations, and of the independence of States. The position of Sardinia was peculiar with regard to this contest. Any immediate danger from the aggressions of Russia was less likely than danger to the interests of England and France, but the Government of Sardinia felt that the great principles of right and wrong could not be violated without danger to all—that the aggressions of power over weakness must, in their ultimate result, threaten all States, even those which were more remote from the immediate source of danger, and that, if once the ascendancy of might over right should prevail, it would be impossible for any State to know whence the next storm might come, or on whose devoted head it might burst. Sardinia, therefore, judged rightly when she thought that she should not be acting a part consistent with her national interests and honour if she did not engage with England and France in the conflict in which these Powers were engaged. But, Sir, if it is honourable to Sardinia to have thus taken this large and enlightened view of the position in which she stood, it is equally honourable to England and France, because it is a proof that we have on our side the sympathy of independent States, whose general conduct entitles them to respect, and whose opinion, therefore, is valuable as a testimony of the righteousness of our cause. I say it is honourable to both that this compact should have been concluded; and this transaction will, I trust, be attended with other advantages of a collateral description. Up to a recent time, and for some time past, there has been a unfortunate animosity prevailing between the Government of Sardinia and the Government of Austria, which has tended to disturb the tranquillity of the Italian peninsula. I trust, however, that when Sardinia and Austria find themselves both ranged morally and in opinion, though in a different degree, on the same side, in this great European contest, that identity of views and consentaneity of purpose will obliterate all those feelings of animosity which may have hitherto prevailed between them, and thus the greatest advantage will be derived, not only to both these countries, but to the other States of the Italian peninsula. When we see the wisdom with which the Sardinian Government have administered their affairs—the justice and the liberty which prevail in Sardinia, and contrast them with the far different state of things which unfortunately prevails in some of the more southern parts of the Italian peninsula, it is impossible not to anticipate that the cordial union between Austria and Sardinia, and between those Powers and France and England, may have a beneficial moral effect on the condition of the other States of Italy, and may lead, perhaps, to a more fortunate state of things in the Roman and Neapolitan States. These, therefore, Sir, are the grounds on which I propose to the Committee to sanction the engagement which Her Majesty has entered into with Sardinia; they are—that we want all the military assistance which we can obtain for the purpose of the war—that, by this means we shall be enabled to procure the co-operation of a most valuable and gallant body of men—that the alliance is one honourable alike to all the parties concerned, and that there is every rational hope for thinking that this alliance—coupled with the good understanding now happily prevailing between France and Austria, and which is a security for the peace of the northern part of the continent of Europe—that this union of cause, and this agreement of opinion, between Austria and Sardinia, will have the same beneficial influence upon the southern part of that empire in the peninsula of Italy. I trust that, for these reasons, the House will concur in the Resolution which, Mr. Bouvierie, I now place in your hands.

The CHAIRMAN then read the Resolution, which was an echo of the Message from the Throne.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not think that

a Resolution of this nature should pass unnoticed, for the grounds upon which it has been recommended by the noble Lord appear to me to be of a very limited character. It must be a matter of congratulation to the Government, and also to the House, that a European Power, possessing a considerable military force, and distinguished, I am happy to say, by a liberal spirit and an anxiety to co-operate with us in that cause which we all have at heart, and which I believe to be a cause which involves the question of civilisation in Europe—it must be, I say, a source of congratulation that a Power of such a character should be ready to co-operate with us and our allies in the struggle in which, unfortunately, we are engaged. If that, however, were all I had to consider, I should entirely agree with the noble Lord in congratulating the House upon that circumstance, for I should feel that it afforded an additional security for a happy termination of the struggle in which we are engaged. But that is not the only question we have to consider in agreeing to this Resolution, and I do not think that it would be becoming to the House of Commons if it was passed unnoticed. It is not from mere sympathy on the part of the Government of Sardinia with us and our allies, not merely because they feel that general interests are concerned, that they are prepared to take the step they contemplate. There are other inducements and other influences involved in this Resolution which must not be lost sight of. I acknowledge at once the importance of the adhesion of Sardinia, but what I wish to call the attention of the Committee to is the fact that we are asked to assist Her Majesty in the contract which she has entered into to advance a loan of a considerable sum of money to the Sardinian Government. I think, Sir, the House ought to pause before it agrees to advance a sum of money to any foreign Power. I will not at this moment say that there are not circumstances which may justify it. So far as I can collect from Her Majesty's Gracious Message, and from the explanation (not very ample) with which the noble Lord has just favoured us, this is a loan which probably will not be very speedily repaid. I understand from the noble Lord that Sardinia is to pay for this advance at the rate of four per cent. interest, one-fourth of which interest is to form a sinking fund. The noble Lord has not favoured us with a calculation of the period when the aggregate amount raised by the sinking fund will form a sum which may repay this advance, but I do not think that is a period which can at all enter into our financial considerations for the present. Well, we heard last year of some financial operations which were described as loans in disguise. Now, Sir, I cannot help feeling that this is a subsidy in disguise; and if we are commencing a system of subsidies, I think it becomes the House of Commons to consider well before they sanction such a step, and not hereafter, when attention may be called to the consequences of perhaps a precipitate act, render themselves liable to be reminded that they allowed such a course of policy to be pursued without comment and without consideration. It is unnecessary at the present moment to enter into any elaborate reasoning to prove that the system of subsidies is one vicious in principle and usually pernicious in operation. At the end of the last war I think it was the unanimous opinion of this House and of the country generally that, although under circumstances of extreme difficulty, and during a contest prolonged beyond the average of even great wars, we had been often without thought hurried into a financial course which depended much upon a system of subsidies, still I believe it was the general opinion of both sides of the House that nothing but extreme necessity could sanction a recurrence to a system so pernicious in its principle. That system is one which tends, I think, to lessen the character of the country which has recourse to it, as well as of the country which receives the aid. If Sardinia, for example, from considerations of high policy, feels that it is her duty to embark in this struggle, a State, under such circumstances should certainly prima facie not require foreign aid to assist her in the fulfilment of that which she deems her highest duty; while, on the other hand, every man must be conscious that a country which has recourse on principle to foreign arms to support the contest in which it has embarked is, in fact, placing itself almost in the position of a tributary, and is having recourse to mercenary aid to accomplish those results which should be achieved from her own essential strength and resources. I wish to guard myself against stating that there may not be exceptions to the principle which I lay down—namely, one hostile to any recourse to loans; but it should be a case of extreme necessity which should authorise even the House of Commons to consider the expediency of recurring to such a system. Now, does that extreme necessity exist at present? And if it does exist, what is the cause of that extreme necessity? These certainly are questions which we ought to have solved—questions which will be demanded of us by our constituents, and which, on an occasion like the present, should, I think, at least be heard in this assembly. Sir, we are embarked (the noble Lord tells us) in a war with a great military Power. Undoubtedly we are. But before we embarked in a struggle with a great military Power surely it was our duty to consider the risks we incurred, the sacrifices we should be called upon to make, and the resources we had at our command. It is not a sufficient vindication of this policy of subsidies to be told that we are embarked in a struggle with a great military Power. Before we entered into such a struggle we should have duly considered what must be the inevitable consequences of the policy we were pursuing. We have been at war but a year; and it is at the end of the first year that we are obliged, according to the representations of the noble Lord, to originate this recurrence to the system of subsidies. The noble Lord has given us to-night, as his principal reason for the deficient military means which we have at our command and the deficient resources we have displayed—he has given, I say, a reason which has been offered before in this House, but which has not yet been considered satisfactory. He says that we entered into war on a peace establishment. Is that true? And, if it be true, are not the Ministers responsible for entering into war under such circumstances and at such a disadvantage? Sir, we did not enter into this war hastily. It was not on a sudden that England found herself involved in a struggle with a great military Power. The whole country, long before the Message of Her Majesty came down to the Houses of Parliament, was prepared for more than the possibility of such a great contingency. The Ministry who for more than a year had been carrying on negotiations—were they during that period making no preparations for the war which they must have considered inevitable, and which, if they did not consider it inevitable, was at least a proof of their want of becoming prescience? Her Majesty's Ministers, we now know, were in possession of secret information a year before war was declared—they were apprised of the most confidential intentions of the late Emperor of Russia. I say, then, that after having been placed in possession of those intentions, Her Majesty's Ministers must, or ought to, have felt it their duty to prepare for the great struggle which was more than possibly impending. The noble Lord may tell us, as he has told us before, that when negotiations are going on it is not becoming to increase the military establishments of a country; but I doubt the validity of that position. Why, Sir, negotiations are going on now, and never were military preparations being made on a greater scale. According to the argument of the noble Lord, which he used some months ago, and to which I have referred, he might as well say that because a Congress is at this moment sitting at Vienna our fleet should not now be preparing for the Baltic, and the armies of France should not be about to embark for the Crimea. The argument of the noble Lord—if you can call it an argument—appears to me one refuted by facts and circumstances hourly occurring, and requires hardly any answer. But, Sir, if war was more than possible a year before it was declared, I deny that it was merely by an ostentatious increase of our military establishments that we should have prepared for that war, or that we need have rendered necessary a recurrence to the pernicious system now introduced to us by the noble Lord under a cloak. We might, without exciting any odium, without taking a single step which any foreign Power could have challenged as one menacing to the then still existing peace of Europe—we might, I say, have laid the foundation of a military power and of military means which would have rendered this recurrence to a system of subsidies unnecessary. What were the steps which Ministers took with regard to the Militia—that force which had been called into active life before even the fear of a Russian war was prevalent in the country, and when the possibility of such a war could only have been known to those in the secrets of the Cabinet? What was the course, I ask, which was pursued by Her Majesty's Ministers with respect to a force which by developing they might have rendered a source of inexhaustible strength and of almost unlimited military means? Sir, they entirely neglected that great source of power, and there is no Minister in this country, in my mind, more responsible for that neglect than the noble Lord who now occupies the most eminent post in the Government, and who has this evening, in a brief speech, expected as a matter of course that the House of Commons would immediately, and in silence, sanction a recurrence to the odious system of subsidies. Why, Sir, even so lately as the commencement of the year 1854, after eight months of bootless negotiations, after eight months had elapsed since Her Majesty's Ministers were aware of the secret policy of the late Emperor of Russia, when we were on the eve of declaring war, what did the noble Lord do with regard to the Scotch and Irish militia? It was pressed upon his notice not merely to embody on a much greater scale the English militia, but to call out the Scotch and the Irish militia; and what was the course pursued by the noble Lord? Silence and negligence; no notice of the appeal made to him; and when at last that appeal was noticed, it was only by words in this House, not by acts in his office, not in that spirit which would have impressed upon the country the importance of the exigency, and would have laid the foundation of military means which would have prevented the necessity of the course recommended by this Resolution. Why, Sir, even after war was declared—even after the 25th of March, the date of Her Majesty's declaration—the noble Lord took no steps for the further development of the military resources of the country in regard to the militia. Not only was the militia not embodied, but the noble Lord still neglected calling out the Irish and Scotch militia, and it was not till months after the declaration of war—not till after Midsummer—that the noble Lord at last had recourse to these means. Had they been appealed to six months or a year before—and we should have been perfectly justified in appealing to them at least a year before—we might have made that appeal without our policy and conduct being held out by foreign nations as circumstances menacing to the still existing peace of Europe. The noble Lord and his colleagues, and especially the noble Lord, neglected those means, and from that moment we have reaped the bitter fruits of official negligence and want of confidence in the resources and support of the country. I shall not, of course, take upon myself the responsibility, in the present state of the country, of opposing the measure which the noble Lord has brought forward, but I will not allow it to pass in silence. I will not, as far as any influence which my words may exercise, allow it to be unknown to the country that at the commencement of the second year of war we are beginning a system of subsidies, and that we are beginning a system of subsidies because Her Majesty's Ministers have from the first neglected those national means which would have prevented a recurrence to so odious a measure. Sir, with these views, I shall not, as I have previously stated, oppose the Resolution which the noble Lord has moved, but I trust the House of Commons will not allow it to pass in silence. I trust the House of Commons will pause to consider that they are now, perhaps, at the commencement of a system which may bring disgrace and disappointment upon their arms and upon their hopes, as that system has brought upon them before, and that we shall on this and every occasion impress upon the Government of this country our conviction that if war is to be carried on by England it must be carried on mainly with the resources and by the spirit of England.

Viscount PALMERSTON: Sir, as the right hon. Gentleman has announced that it is not his intention to oppose this Resolution, I apprehend very little is required from me in reply to the observations which he has made; but I cannot permit the right hon. Gentleman to attempt to confound a system of loans bearing interest, with a system of subsidies, upon which no interest would be paid, and which would be a pure and entire sacrifice upon the part of this country. The right hon. Gentleman may think less highly than I do, less highly than Her Majesty's Government, and less highly, I venture to say, than the country at large do, of the responsibility of that country with which we have contracted these engagements annually, and of the means which the kingdom of Sardinia possesses of paying the small amount of annual contribution which will annually be required as the interest of the loan; but, supposing even that the loan was a sacrifice for a certain number of years—which it is not—any man who has cast his eye over the Estimates, and knows that the ordinary expense of 1,000 men on a peace establishment is 40,000*l.*, in comparing that expense with the advantages which we are to derive from the services of 15,000 excellent, well-trained, well-disciplined, and ably commanded troops, will at once perceive the advantageous nature of the contract we have entered into with Sardinia. But, forsooth, the right hon. Gentleman says, we ought at the time when negotiations were pending to have come down to this House and increased the war estimates, placed our army and navy upon a war establishment, and prepared for an event which we had then every reason to hope would never occur. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman knows very well that no such proposition could have been carried. I should like to know what would have been the indignant denial with which the right hon. Gentleman and those who sat around him would have met a proposition for greatly increasing the army at a time when negotiations were being carried on, which we had good ground to expect would have ended in the amicable settlement of the affairs in dispute. The right hon. Gentleman compares the course which he says we ought then to have pursued with the course which we are now pursuing, and, because we did not choose to interrupt the progress of hopeful negotiations in a time of peace by ostentatious preparations for war, he tells us we ought now, when we are engaged in war, when our troops are engaged in a great, important, and difficult undertaking—on the same principle we ought now to abstain from making preparations for continuing the war, and that we should, as it were, lay down our arms, because negotiations are going on for peace. The right hon. Gentleman says, that although negotiations were then pending, yet there were then as good grounds for making preparations for war as there were now for proposing this loan to Sardinia, although negotiations are now pending at Vienna; but the two cases have no similarity whatever. They are as different from each other as two things can possibly be. The right hon. Gentleman reproaches the Government and myself individually with a want of proper foresight in not having called out the militia before the war began. Now, Sir, if there be any want of foresight in regard to the militia, I think that the right hon. Gentleman and those who sit near him are responsible and ought to make their defence to such a charge. What was the Militia Bill which they brought in? It was a Militia Bill—good in many respects, no doubt—inasmuch as it established a most valuable force for the defence of the country; but it did not establish a force for carrying on operations in the Crimea, and it was by no means such a force as would have superseded the necessity or diminished the advantage of having a well-disciplined, well-trained, and well-commanded force like that of the Sardinian army. I admit and fully acknowledge the merit of the Government to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged in reorganising and re-establishing the militia, but let me ask what was the condition upon which it was established? Could it be embodied in a time of peace? Could the embodiment of the militia be one of those measures of military and threatening preparation for war, during the pending of negotiations for peace, which the right hon. Gentleman says we ought to have had recourse to? Certainly not, for there was no power to embody the militia in a time of peace. Then, could we have embodied the militia when war was declared? No, Sir, we could not. The Bill only gave power to the Crown to embody the militia in a case of "actual invasion or of imminent danger thereof." Now, Sir, in a war with Russia, with the Baltic and the Black Sea blockaded, and our troops going to the East, could any man pretend to say that there was any actual invasion of this country or imminent danger thereof? Sir, we embodied a certain number of militia regiments as soon as war broke out, and how did we embody them? Not by any power which the Bill gave us, but by the voluntary offers of these regiments, which, with no power to compel them to serve, gallantly and voluntarily tendered their services in aid of the national efforts to carry on the war in which the country was engaged. In all, sixteen militia regiments were embodied at a time when we had no power of compelling them to serve, and when the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite had given us no power of ordering them to be embodied. Well, we then brought in a Bill to enable the Crown to embody the militia in time of war, and when that power was given to us we proceeded to embody a number of other regiments. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman says it was a proof of a want of foresight that the militia was not embodied before the war and at the commencement of war, I say that that want of foresight belongs to those who sit around the right hon. Gentleman, and not to us. We had no remedy in our case, and it is for hon. Gentlemen opposite to answer the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has made. But, Sir, would the organisation of the Scotch and Irish militia, even at an earlier period, have superseded the necessity for the assistance which we are about to derive from a Sardinian force? Will any man tell me that raw troops, just enrolled, partially disciplined, recently trained, incapable of going abroad, by the very terms of their service tied to the defence of the country —will any man tell me that the Scotch and Irish militia, under these circumstances, would have been a substitution for that Sardinian army, ably commanded, well trained, and well disciplined, which you are about to obtain by the Resolution now under the consideration of the House? No doubt, I shall be told, "True, the Scotch and Irish militia could not have gone abroad, but they would have afforded recruits to the British army. No doubt they would, and gallant and good men they would have furnished. Many militiamen have honourably and nobly volunteered their services into the line, and will still, I hope, do so, and highly honourable it is to the commanders of militia regiments to find them contributing in this manner to the service of the Crown and the country; but I say that, however these Scotch and Irish regiments might be useful in that respect, it is absurd to tell me that they would be a substitute for a well-organised army of 15,000 men, which is to be kept up to that establishment. The Scotch and Irish militia will enable us, I trust, to keep our own army complete, but they never could be considered as a substitution for that force which this treaty places in co-operation with our army. With regard, therefore, to the charge of want of foresight and neglect of duty in respect to the militia, I think that charge does not apply here, but it is for those who sit behind the right hon. Gentleman to answer it.

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, he took a view of this transaction different from that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), and he could not but regret some of the expressions which had fallen from him. It did not seem to him (Mr. Denison) to be a transaction discreditable to one party and derogatory to the other, but, on the contrary, alike honourable and advantageous to both. The people of Sardinia and the Government of Sardinia deserved the warmest sympathy of that House. There was not only a gallant and spirited people, but also a faithful and upright king. It was owing to the fortunate combination of these causes that constitutional liberty had taken root and flourished in that country almost alone of any of the southern countries of Europe. As no opposition was to be offered to this vote, he regretted that it should be given in a grudging spirit; he could have wished it to be given with the hearty good-will of the House. Let it not be forgotten—rather let it be publicly proclaimed—that this tree of liberty which had taken root and sprung up in that country was flourishing among a population, not the entirety, but the great majority of whom professed the Roman Catholic religion. In that country they had been wise enough to recognise the close connection of religious with civil liberty—and greatly to their honour, they had respected the liberty of conscience, and had granted perfect freedom to the exercise of religions of all denominations and creeds. He could not but congratulate the able Minister who presided over that country and the representative of our Queen there, on having brought these negotiations to a successful issue. He trusted that the free Government of Sardinia might long flourish. He was sure that the only prospect for liberty in southern Europe depended upon the success of that Government. He trusted that it might long prosper—that the union between the two countries might become close and intimate. That the example of successful constitutional Government which are there exhibited might long prevail, a spectacle alike instructive to people and to kings.

MR. BRIGHT: It strikes me, Sir, that the question which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) has introduced, and upon which the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) has touched, is hardly the one which is before the Committee. With regard to the defect in the Militia Bill, I certainly think the noble Lord was hardly fair in his remarks upon hon. Gentlemen opposite, because, if any attempt had been made to remedy that defect when the Bill was passing through this House, no one knows better than the noble Lord that the Bill would not have been passed at all. The question before the Committee is that of lending 1,000,000*l.* this year and 1,000,000*l.* next year to the Government of Sardinia, in return for which they are to furnish us with a force of 15,000 men for the war. The noble Lord says this is not exactly a subsidy, because the Sardinian Government are to pay interest upon the loan, and a part of that interest is to go in reduction of the debt, but the noble

Lord has not told us anything about the security. I believe that debts of this kind, from one State to another, are generally shuffled off under some pretence not very long after the money is advanced, and I should be infinitely better satisfied with some security, whatever it might be, if we were not to have these 15,000 men. I sympathise quite as much as the hon. Gentleman who last spoke with the progress which Sardinia is making in civil and religious freedom, but I contend that nothing can be more hostile to such progress than that Sardinia should needlessly throw herself into a struggle like this, in which she cannot have the remotest interest, and from the issue of which she cannot gain the remotest benefit. I think it is one of the great misfortunes, among many others, of this war, that we are endeavouring, wherever we can do it, in the case of large States to coax them, and, in the case of small States, to bully them, into entering upon a struggle which, with regard to ourselves, has been attended with so much ill-success and so many disasters. If there be a country in Europe which can have no interest whatever in the war it is Sardinia, and yet the hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. Denison) thinks it very honourable and advantageous to Sardinia to get into this scrape, just as if a war was something exceedingly valuable—something like a nugget which is found by two or three men, but in the scramble for which everybody is ready to join. I am not going to divide the Committee upon this Resolution. I think it an unfortunate thing for ourselves that we should have entered upon a war which we find ourselves altogether unequal to carry on. The notion of this country's sending land forces to any portion of the continent of Europe is foolish enough, but that we should send land forces to the very extreme point of Europe, to a distance from England by sea of 3,000 miles, is, to my mind, little less than an act of lunacy. The consequences of such acts we have already seen to a certain extent, and if we persist in this course much longer we shall experience them to a still greater extent. While I have no sympathy with measures which will lead other nations, who have from their position a more remote interest than ourselves in the struggle, to engage their forces in a war which I believe never should have been entered upon, I wish also to express my entire dissatisfaction with the plan of subsidies, whether in their original form or in the shape of a loan. I wish further to express my deep regret that the kingdom of Sardinia should have left the peaceful and honourable pursuit in which she was engaged, of settling her own internal freedom on a firm and satisfactory foundation, and should have thrown herself into a struggle from which greater countries than Sardinia cannot retire without loss and disaster, and probably dis-honour, and from which I believe that Sardinia, especially if her forces are placed under your generals and under your management, will retire with the same dis-honour as ourselves.

MR. BOWYER said, he wished to address a few observations to the House upon this subject, which related to a country in which he had resided for many years, and which he had very lately visited. He did not wish to throw obstacles in the way of any measure which Her Majesty's Government believed to be essential to the prosecution of the war, and he had no intention of disparaging or undervaluing the assistance which might be derived from the Sardinian army. Indeed, he believed that a better disciplined and more gallant army did not exist in Europe, but he thought Her Majesty's Government should not be relieved from the blame which attached to them for resorting to means of this kind in prosecuting the war. When he asked the noble Lord at the head of the Government the other day whether he was prepared to afford the House any information as to the state of the Sardinian finances, he expected that the noble Lord would at least have been ready to have given the House such information as would show that good security could be given for the proposed loan. He had been surprised to hear the noble Lord say he believed it was a matter of notoriety that the credit of the Sardinian Government was good. Did the noble Lord rely upon the accounts of newspaper correspondents, and could he not have obtained an accurate knowledge of the state of the finances of Sardinia from our Minister in that country before he advised the advance of so considerable a loan as was now proposed to the Sardinian Government? It appeared to him (Mr. Bowyer) that this recklessness with regard to the means of repaying the advance was a strong indication that it was to be, not a loan, but a subsidy. Supposing, however, that it was intended to be a loan, the noble Lord must be aware the state of the Sardinian finances was such that the money would never be repaid. The noble Lord certainly said that interest was to be paid upon the loan, but what prospect, he wanted to know, was there of the return of the capital? He thought it was evident that the advance must be looked upon as a subsidy, because, if the credit of Sardinia was good, why did not the Government borrow this money from the great capitalists of Europe in the ordinary way? He could not show by exact figures the financial position of Sardinia, because the Government now in power had never laid before the House of Representatives, as he was informed by a member of the Assembly, any complete balance-sheet representing the precise state of the revenue and expenditure. It was notorious, however, that there was an annual and increasing deficit in the revenue of Sardinia, which amounted to several millions of francs; the taxes were heavy; commerce had been stimulated to the utmost; there was considerable over-speculation, and, therefore, an unsound state of credit in the trade of the country. There was an increase of expenditure every year arising from the manufacture of places, which were disposed of for the purpose of enabling the Government to manage the House of Representatives and obtain that influence which was necessary to carry their measures. Then there was a great standing army, out of all proportion to the resources of the country or to its necessities. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) had referred to the absurdity of Sardinia engaging in the present war. This view would be confirmed when it was considered that Genoa, the great trading port of the country, must be seriously injured, indeed, almost ruined, by such a war. The trade of Genoa was carried on principally with Russian ports, and it was impossible that it should not receive serious injury. When the noble Lord, therefore, induced Sardinia to embark in this war by a loan of 2,000,000*l.*, he should have considered how much the security for that loan would thereby be diminished. The Government of Sardinia had resorted to a series of measures which strikingly exemplified the insecurity of the financial affairs of that country; but he would refer only to two of these. There was in Turin a great hospital which had revenues arising from large estates in Italy. Two years ago the Government, finding themselves embarrassed by a large deficit, brought in a Bill to purchase the property of that hospital. It seemed strange that the Government should have purchased these large estates ; but they passed a measure by which they were enabled to sell the property and apply the proceeds to the current expenses of the year, giving the hospital nothing in return but the interest in Government paper. The next case to which he would allude was the confiscation of Church property. They had brought in a Bill to take possession of, or sell the property of different cathedral churches and religious bodies, and apply the proceeds towards the current expenses of the year, while the only reimbursement given was in the shape of Government debentures. These two circumstances—to which he could assure the House he had referred to without reference to any religious or ecclesiastical considerations — were quite sufficient to show how uncertain was the security they possessed when they made this loan to Sardinia. He also must complain of the employment of foreign troops to do that which our own troops would have so much better done, had not our resources and the energies of our army been so disgracefully mismanaged and crippled.

MR. GLADSTONE : Sir, until I heard the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, I felt that the course of this debate or conversation was eminently satisfactory in one respect, namely, in this, that although different views have been taken by different Gentlemen of the proposal now made by Her Majesty's Government, some of them supporting, and others of them on one ground or another questioning or even objecting to this proposal, yet not a word has been said by any Gentleman in any quarter of the House which could tend to give a false impression respecting the feelings of this country towards Sardinia. And if I rise to offer a few observations to the Committee, it is because I think that the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, if no comment were made upon it in a different sense, would convey an inaccurate impression to the country respecting the feelings of hon. Members in this House. The hon. Member for Malton (Mr. Evelyn Denison) has stated, and stated well, the special claim that Sardinia has on our sympathy and respect. In the midst of events, in many respects far from favourable to the progress of constitutional government—at a period when many nations have had the prize of freedom apparently within their grasp and lost it again—when retrogression rather than advancement has in many cases marked European history—Sardinia is the country that, amidst difficulties almost unprecedented, has succeeded in establishing for herself the blessings of a free government. It is undoubtedly true that she has not succeeded in conciliating the revolutionary spirit ; and those who are true revolutionists, whether with respect to Italy or any other country, have manifested the nature of their feelings, and have borne the strongest testimony to the true policy of Sardinia by this fact, that the friends, I will not say of freedom, but the friends of revolution and the political incendiaries have manifested even greater animosity to the free constitutional government of Sardinia than they have shown to despotism in other parts of Italy and Europe. I think, Sir, that is a fact which ought to secure from the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer), as I am certain it will secure from almost every one who hears me, that respect which is due to an assertion alike firm and temperate of the principles of freedom combined with the principles of order. I am bound also to say, and I hope I shall not offend the feelings of any Gentleman in this House by saying so, that I think the hon. Member for Malton was justified in advertizing to the union that prevails in that country between civil and religious liberty—a subject in connection with which we may open some painful chapters in the recent history of Sardinia. It is impossible, however, not to feel that Sardinia has had difficulties, and I will also venture to say it has enemies, of a peculiar character to contend with. Her internal difficulties fo-mented from without are of a nature which has greatly increased the weight of responsibility upon her statesmen, but which must also greatly increase her claims upon our sympathy and respect. The hon. and learned Gentleman who just sat down has stated to us that the credit of Sardinia is bad—that the finances of Sardinia are deranged—that, so far from economy being the result of this state of things, the greatest extravagance prevails; that this extravagance has not reference to the legitimate purposes of Government, but that the lavish expenditure takes place for the purposes of corruption ; and then he goes on to show us instances which he thinks proves his view of the case, and testifies to us that Sardinia is an untrustworthy debtor. I was sorry to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman utter a portion of those observations, because, when the hon. and learned Gentleman says that the finances of Sardinia are expended for the purpose of Parliamentary corruption, he ventures upon statements which he knows it is unlikely that any of those who heard him can be supplied with the means of refuting. I do not think that with regard to a friendly Power—but, above all, with regard to a Power that does not stand in the first rank in Europe in regard to the magnitude of her resources—such a charge should have been made by the hon. and learned Member unless he had been prepared not to deal in generalities alone, but to go forward and to supply us with facts which would warrant him in casting so serious an imputation upon that country. As to his charge with respect to the state of her finances, I do not think the case he quoted was at all conclusive. He says a law was passed by which the Government was authorised to sell the property of an hospital in Turin, and to provide for the maintenance of the hospital by means of Government paper; but I apprehend that in this country, when we have occasion to borrow or obtain money under the sanction of the law, we are very apt to give to those from whom we get the money no other instrument or security but that which the hon. and learned Gentleman seems to have condemned under the name of Government paper. [Mr. Bowyer rose to explain; but, amidst cries of "Order!" resumed his seat.] I understood the hon. and learned Gentleman perfectly, there is no necessity for any explanation; he has no right to complain of what I say. Government paper is a very good thing or a very bad thing in proportion as the Government is a Government of character or otherwise. No doubt there are many countries—some States of Italy, for instance, where I might go, if necessary, to find an example—where Government paper is of very little value, indeed; but the question with regard to Sardinia which it is material for this House to consider is this—has Sardinia ever broken her financial engagements? I may be wrong, but, so far as I am aware, all the financial obligations of Sardinia, notwithstanding the great political difficulties she has had to confront, have on every occasion been met and discharged with exemplary fidelity; and, for my part, I can hardly understand why this insinuation and imputation should be cast upon the character of a Government whose faith has been as yet untainted by suspicion. So much for the character of Sardinia, with respect to which it is felt to be material, not on one side alone, but throughout this House, that no mistake should exist with regard to the feelings that animate Englishmen. As regards the questions immediately before the Committee, I shall venture to say a few words. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) says that last year he heard of a loan in disguise, and on the present occasion he thinks he has heard of a subsidy in disguise; and he was followed by the hon. and learned Member near me (Mr. Bowyer), who not only concurred with that remark, but went greatly beyond it, because he produced facts and statements which, as he considered, demonstrated that this loan bore the character of a subsidy. Now, Sir, I feel with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the whole question of subsidies is a grave and serious question. I feel the great responsibility which a Government incurs in proposing a pecuniary grant to a foreign State under any form whatever; but how far greater would that responsibility be if they were to propose it to Parliament in a form they believed to be delusive. You cannot treat this as a matter of slight importance—it is a matter of the highest importance; and if this professed loan really be not a loan, but a subsidy, then Parliament should know it. I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Bowyer) and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) will remember that discussions in this House at the present moment on the question as to whether this is a loan or a subsidy are not mere passing words, but that these very discussions might hereafter, under possible circumstances, be determining elements in the question, and actually decide the question whether it should be a loan or a subsidy. It is not merely what is written in a treaty that decides that question, but the spirit also in which the proposal was received, and the general impression with which the vote of Parliament is given. This is, I believe, a loan as it professes to be, and is not a subsidy in disguise. The hon. and learned Gentleman says he can demonstrate it as a subsidy. He says, if it be not a subsidy and only a loan, why should Sardinia come to the British Government to borrow money? Why does she not go to the money market as other nations have done? He says the Emperor of France has gone into the money market, but he might have quoted the case of a Power that has not such good credit as the Emperor of France. The Sultan of Turkey went into the money market within the last twelve months, and obtained from the capitalists of this country a loan of several millions. The hon. and learned Member then asks, why did not the King of Sardinia go into the money market like other States? Now, I do not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman is justified in founding any conclusion upon the fact that the King of Sardinia prefers a loan which he expects to obtain, through the power and resources of England, at 3 per cent interest, to a loan which he would possibly contract, as Turkey contracted in the money market, at the rate of 6 per cent. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that the credit and resources of France are infinitely beyond those of Sardinia, yet it must be remembered that the French loan was only obtained by the Emperor of France at a rate somewhat exceeding 5 per cent. Is it not natural that the King of Sardinia should have wished to obtain the money on the most reasonable terms he could obtain it, and as it was possible to get it from the English Government on terms more reasonable than he could get it in the open market, it was natural that he should wish to reduce the burden he was entailing upon his country for interest, to one-half what it would otherwise be. When there is this motive for his conduct, why should we be driven to the necessity of imagining illegitimate motives and concealed purposes, or of supposing that the King of Sardinia was attempting a juggle upon the people of England, and was endeavouring to extort from us a grant of money under the plea of a loan. Hon. Gentlemen can correct me if I am wrong when I state that the Government of Sardinia, during the communications that have preceded this engagement, have been by no means indifferent on the question whether this should be a loan or a grant. Their opinion was, that it would not be compatible with the disinterested motives with which they entered into the war, or, on the other hand, with the real and unimpaired dignity belonging to their country, that they should accept a grant from Great Britain for the purpose of the war, and I believe themselves were the parties that were the least anxious to obtain a subsidy. Perhaps I do not say too much when I express the opinion that they were determined not to have a subsidy from the British Government. The engagement into which they have entered is a perfectly bond fide engagement. They borrow money on favourable terms, and they enter into an obligation that binds them, within half a year from the present time, to make the first payment of interest. If that payment shall not be made, it will be competent for the hon. and learned Gentleman, and entirely consonant with his duty as a Member of Parliament, to call the attention of the House of Commons to that default on the part of the Government of Sardinia. Parliament is under the greatest obligation, for the sake of the country at large, to take care that they treat this with which we are dealing as a loan and not as a grant. My belief is that it is a loan, and I repeat that the expression of a contrary opinion might possibly, under certain circumstances, have an unfavourable influence. The character of a loan has been stamped upon it throughout, and the definiteness of the terms of the engagement, and the unqualified assurance of the Government of Sardinia, carry entire satisfaction to my mind, as they carried it to the minds of my noble Friend at the head of the Government, and of the Earl of Clarendon, the Minister chiefly responsible for this transaction. If it be a loan, still I grant that the expenditure of 2,000,000*l.* for aid extended to a foreign country in carrying on this war, is a very serious matter. It is not the first time, however, that aid has been extended to foreign countries during the present war. It is the first time, no doubt, that service has been rendered in the shape of money, but most important services have been performed in other ways, which, if stated, in the shape of money, would be found to amount to a very considerable sum, both in the Baltic and Mediterranean. I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman does not mean to go to the extreme—I will not say extravagant—length of arguing that we are entirely to abjure the principle of making the resources of this country available for war otherwise than through the medium of our military establishments. Whilst I feel with him that the system of subsidies carried on during the last war was, both in its nature very dangerous and in its consequences very frightful, yet I think there are circumstances attending the position of this country, the amount of its pecuniary means and resources as compared with that of its military means being also immense, which teach you not absolutely to cut yourselves off from granting to foreign nations assistance, through the medium of money, for prosecuting the common objects of the war. It is not in the last war, but in every war in which you have been engaged since the Revolution, you have found it necessary to act upon that principle. The whole question then is, is the form in which it is done safe and judicious, and is the necessity which produces it absolute enough to justify the proposition? I believe the form is a safe and judicious one, but, more than that, I give the Government entire credit for the bona fides of this proposition. I believe it is not a subsidy in disguise, but that it is what it professes to be—a loan of money. As to the necessity of the measure, I think that requires little demonstration; it was not requisite for my noble Friend to enter into details with the view of showing the immense advantage of bringing so important a contingent into active service in the Crimea at the very shortest notice, and in the highest possible order. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) said that at the end of the first year of the war we are driven to ask military aid from a foreign Power. That may be so, but there have been other wars in which we were engaged, and in which, at a period of the contest not much later, we asked similar assistance from that very foreign Power; and I think it was either in the second or third year of the revolutionary war that we found it necessary to give a subsidy to Sardinia. The quicker it is done, I say, the better, if it is to be done. There is no good policy, no economy, no humanity, in protracting the operations of war. Perhaps, in the present case, the error has been on the other side, and, instead of making efforts too slight and too late, as has sometimes been imputed to the Administration, our exertions have been on too vast and excessive a scale. But to accumulate the means of carrying on great operations with speed and effect, and to strike your blows at the most vital parts of your enemy, are, I believe, the foundations of sound military policy; and the great and effective aid you are about to derive from the Sardinian contingent will, I must confess, supply an adequate justification for the proposals of Her Majesty's Government, though I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the whole question of pecuniary aid to foreign Powers is one which ought to be sifted and scrutinised by the House of Commons with the nicest jealousy, and that such measures are of a nature which cannot be justified without the clearest views of public advantage, and without the strongest necessity for their adoption.

MR. ADDERLEY said, it seemed to him that when a country was willing to furnish aid it did not much matter whether that aid was in the shape of men, of ships, or money. All he asked was that, as it had been argued that men were required, that the country should first be allowed to furnish its own men rather than to employ the men of another nation. The noble Lord who brought forward the Resolution, in the short speech which he had made, thought it was quite sufficient if he passed a panegyric on Sardinia to make the proposal acceptable to the Committee, and he was followed by the hon. Member for Maltby (Mr. Evelyn Denison), who had asked whether Sardinia was not a fine country, with a noble king and a noble constitution? They all agreed in that, but still it did not appear to him a sufficient argument for the loan; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) added to that argument that her finances were in a good condition, he made the demand for the loan much less accountable than ever. He granted that if this country was exhausted, the noble Lord could not have gone to a better country than Sardinia to procure men, for he believed there was not a finer army in Europe than the Sardinian army, nor a nobler or more chivalrous Monarch, who had, in the bloody field of Novara, where three horses were shot under him, proved himself a most gallant soldier, as well as a constitutional King. But did that settle the point whether they were to give aid to Sardinia, for whether it were a loan or a subsidy it was an aid. Indeed, it bordered very nearly on the character of a subsidy if they looked to the length of time before the sinking fund proposed would cover the capital, and, however faithfully Sardinia might fulfil her engagements, few Members of that House then present would see the day on which the loan would be entirely repaid. There was also, let him say, something on the face of the Resolution calculated to raise a grave suspicion that by its terms the country was being asked to furnish Sardinia with an annual loan.

durante bello. The noble Lord when asked to state the ground upon which this money was to be lent, said that every one who was acquainted with military affairs must know that it took 40,000*l.* per annum to maintain 1,000 men. Well, for the 15,000 men of the Sardinian army it would, according to this calculation, take only 600,000*l.* a year, being little more than the half of the sum of 1,000,000*l.* that was asked for. It really appeared to him little other than a proposed annual subsidy to maintain 15,000 men, and he protested, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member of Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), against a recurrence, on the part of this country, to that system of subsidies which during the late war had occasioned such difficulties. The noble Lord had unfairly taunted the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, when he said that, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the country should lay down its arms and contract its operations. What the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do was, to develope the resources of the country so as to enable us to fight our own battles with our own men. If this was a temporary difficulty it should be met by a temporary grant, but if, on the other hand, it was to be a permanent provision for Sardinia, why should England be called upon to make it more than any other country involved in the war? In entering into this quarrel, Sardinia would be fighting her own battle and advancing her own interest, not animated by a pure philanthropy in the interests of others. Let them first develope their own resources, let them encourage volunteers and the militia, and, above all—and he called the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to this subject—let them do their utmost to develope the resources of England in her Colonies. He wished to press upon the Government this fact, that one regiment of volunteers from a British colony would be worth more, for the prestige of this country, than fifteen regiments from any foreign Power. But it might be said that Canada offered only recruits, and what was wanted was drilled men. Could the noble Lord assure them that the proposed Sardinian forces were not recruits themselves, and not the veteran soldiers that were so necessary. In following up the objections which had been taken by his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire, he did so with no desire of in any way impeding the Resolution for a loan to Sardinia, but in order to urge upon the Government the importance of losing no time in developing to the fullest extent the resources of our own country.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he viewed with the highest admiration the conduct of the Government of the King of Sardinia, and he regretted that the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) and the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) had not come forward to advocate the cause of the depressed people of Italy. Although, however, he was not surprised at the observations of the hon. Member for Manchester, he must express his extreme astonishment that the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had selected such an occasion for the discussion to which he had given rise. It was remarks such as those which the right hon. Gentleman had employed that evening which had nullified the proposition of the Government for obtaining the assistance of foreign troops on a previous occasion when the Foreign Enlistment Bill was under discussion; and now the right hon. Gentleman repeated those remarks, and again spoke about a "tributary and a mercenary army." He had himself received letters from officers in Switzerland, in which they stated that, from no mercenary feelings, but from those of the purest sympathy, they would have enlisted under our standard, but that nothing should induce them to do so after the manner in which they had been spoken of in the House of Commons. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should have used expressions which must tend to diminish that cordiality between this country and foreign nations, which was necessary to carry out the war to a successful termination.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I have never listened to anything in this House with more surprise than the language of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. Does the hon. Gentleman mean to say, when he expresses his feelings of astonishment and regret at what he heard me utter, that he really expected a Motion of this kind would have been passed in silence in this House? Why, Sir, what is this Motion? It is a Motion for a Vote of the public money to the amount of 2,000,000*l.*! The hon. Gentleman expresses his surprise that a Member of Parliament should get up and make a comment upon a proposition of this character! Why, Sir, I hold that it would be most indecent in the House of Commons, however unanimous

we might be on the policy of this Vote, if we allowed to pass in silence a proposition of so large a character, affecting the public purse, without a comment or any demand for explanation. I entirely protest, also, against what I have observed much in the course of this debate—namely, an anxiety to dwell on the nature of the Government to which we are about to make, what I will now call to prevent discussion, a loan. It is of the utmost inconvenience when questions of this kind are brought before us—when we are asked, on the ground of public policy, to advance from our Treasury a loan of money for the aid of a foreign potentate, that we should have discussions upon the form of constitution, or the nature of the religion professed, in the particular State in question. Sir, I entirely object to those elements being brought into our discussion. I have as much sympathy in the progress of Sardinia as any Gentleman in this House; but if we are called upon to agree to such a Vote as this, on account of the ecclesiastical changes that are making in Piedmont, or on account of the new constitution that recently has happily been established there, we shall, I conceive, be laying down a most dangerous precedent. Why, Sir, we should have, when similar propositions were brought forward in respect to countries where there may be that free constitution or those elements of religious liberty which exist in Sardinia, a new chain of arguments brought into the debate, and a Minister might often find it difficult to recommend his measures to Parliament, if, instead of looking to the abstract policy of the proposition, we should be called upon to consider it in reference to the state of religion or the particular degree of freedom that might or might not exist in the country to which the loan was to apply. There were one or two remarks made by the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown, which I will take the liberty of noticing. I never wish to avail myself of the privilege of speaking a second time in Committee; but as the noble Lord has spoken twice upon this occasion, he, at all events, cannot have any just cause of complaint against me. The noble Lord's answer to my objections, so far as I could follow him, consisted of imputations against myself. First, he says, I attempted to depreciate the character of Sardinia. Now, Sir, I studiously guarded myself from doing so. It is not very likely that I should be guilty of such conduct, which is so alien to my feelings. But I avoided altogether touching on a point which has nothing whatever to do with the matter. The noble Lord, in the second place, imputed to the Government of Lord Derby, that it was from their negligence the power of our militia had not been more effective and earlier developed. Now, that is an objection which I consider has been already disposed of by a single observation which fell from the hon. Gentleman opposite; and as the House seemed also to be of the same opinion, I thought it unnecessary to dwell upon it. The noble Lord must remember that it was with the utmost difficulty the original Militia Bill was carried which secured the services of this body in this country. It is also well known that it was sought to introduce a clause into that measure which would have secured its condemnation. The noble Lord also says, that it would have been preposterous before war was declared that any attempt should be made to increase the forces of our army by the development of the power of our militia. Now, this is the second or third time that the noble Lord has urged that argument; but he quite forgets that while these negotiations were going on—before war was declared—this country was preparing, under a Government of which he was a Member, two magnificent fleets. It appears, then, that the noble Lord had no objection, while these negotiations were going on, and before a declaration of war, to take part in preparing those two vast armadas. Why, then, should we not try to increase our militia force, and thereby secure the strength of our army, I cannot comprehend. I can only account for it upon this ground—that the Government were not sincere in their attempt to carry on the war in which we were unfortunately engaged. The Government in the first instance attempted merely by a demonstration to carry on this war. You sent out large fleets, which came home again without meeting our enemy. I can only account for this by supposing that you never intended to enter upon real warfare, which by your miserable policy you entailed upon this country. The noble Lord has been guilty of another misrepresentation—and in so short a speech I must say I never listened to so many. He says, in the few remarks which I had made I had recommended, at the moment important negotiations were going on, that our military preparations should cease. Why, Sir, on the contrary, I urged upon the Committee, when the original negotiations were going on, and before war was declared, that our military preparations should be pressed forward with much greater vigour than at a time when we should be involved in extreme difficulties. As I said originally, I shall support this Resolution—I shall support it, though I object to the policy of it, because I think that at this moment there is a State necessity which would render it almost the duty of the House of Commons to secure every means that are placed at the command of the Government to carry on the war. But although State necessity may justify me in taking a course which abstractedly I should think impolitic, and which under ordinary circumstances I should deprecate, still I cannot shut my eyes to this fact—that it is the impolicy of the Ministers that has brought about the circumstances that have rendered this State necessity so imperative and inexorable. All that the noble Lord said respecting the conduct of the Government of Lord Derby in reference to the militia I deem too idle for me to notice. But what the noble Lord says in vindication of the Government of which he was a Member, and of that particular department for which he was personally responsible, cannot for a moment be allowed to pass. He wants to persuade us that he did not call out the militia, because there were not then any indications of disturbance in the progress of the negotiations; and that, in fact, his apparent negligence was the consequence of his prescience and sagacity. Why, Sir, it was only last May the noble Lord gave us reasons why he would not call out the Scotch and the Irish militias. And those reasons were that the expense would be too great for him to take the responsibility of incurring. Now, what must be thought of a Minister who in the month of May last, when war had been declared, declined on the ground of expense to call out the militia of Scotland and Ireland? I say that this neglect of developing in its full force and most comprehensive character that nursery of our army is the cause, and the only cause, of our being obliged, under these circumstances, to supply ourselves with this foreign contingent. There is another cause, no doubt, for the necessity of our having recourse to the Sardinian contingent. If you had done your duty with regard to the British army sent out to the Crimea, this measure would never have been necessary. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone)—upon whose speech it is unnecessary for me to make any comment, because, subsequently, the right hon. Gentleman agreed with me in everything I said—observed that vigorous action was most necessary if we agreed in carrying on the war. I concur, Sir, with the right hon. Gentleman in this remark; but there is one thing more important than even a British militia or a Sardinian contingent, and that is, if you have a great and gallant army in the enemy's country, you should take care that they do not want raiment, that they do not want food, that they do not want medicine, that they do not want shelter. The hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) attacks me and my Friends because, in December last, we succeeded in defeating the measure of the Government in regard to the enlistment of foreigners; that we did not formally, but that we virtually defeated that measure. Well, I must say that I am happy I contributed, however slightly, to so fortunate a result. If in December we knew what we ascertained a few days after the adjournment of the House, do you think that our debates upon the Foreign Enlistment Bill would have occupied our attention? No, instead of such debates we would be calling you to account for the state of the British army in the Crimea. It is possible or probable that this Resolution which you have put into the hands of Mr. Bouvierie may be a necessity. I will not take the responsibility of saying that it is not. I will support it, however, upon that issue, though I am opposed to it abstractedly as to its general policy. But I admit its necessity, because of your mal-administration. It is a necessity, because you have, first of all, failed in making the proper preparations to meet the war in which you have involved the country. And, secondly, by the inefficient measures with which you have conducted the war you have driven yourselves, even at this early period, to this objectionable proceeding. I call it objectionable, because, notwithstanding the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), I still retain my opinion as to the nature of this particular advance. I will not now discuss whether this is a disguised subsidy or a formal loan; but this I know, it is most unfortunate that at so early a period of the struggle we should find ourselves obliged to have recourse to

means of this kind. And whether it be right or whether it be wrong, I am not sorry I have had this opportunity thus early of protesting against a renewal of a system of subsidies by this country. If you are not recommending that system, so much the better for England. I should be glad to acknowledge that I am in error in this respect. The system is one which failed in the hands of Pitt—it broke that mighty spirit; and I confess I have not that confidence in the noble Lord at the head of the Government to believe that he will succeed in that in which Mr. Pitt failed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I think that the right hon. Gentleman has misconceived and misrepresented what fell from the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird). I did not understand that hon. Gentleman as finding fault with the right hon. Gentleman for disapproving either of the policy of the Government or of the measure now produced. But that which he did disapprove of was the language which he thought the right hon. Gentleman had used, representing these Sardinian troops as mercenaries, and tending to cast upon them those imputations which he had cast on other foreign troops which the Government attempted to raise, but whose services the right hon. Gentleman, in his observations upon the measure before Christmas, had prevented us from obtaining. If the right hon. Gentleman did not apply his observations to that measure, then the comments of my hon. Friend would fall to the ground. But my hon. Friend spoke in the belief that the application had been made. Now, I must confess I was rather surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman—wincing under the taunt—driven to express congratulations to himself that a measure which Parliament had deliberately sanctioned was, by means of imputations cast by him upon foreign troops, indirectly defeated. I should hardly have expected the right hon. Gentleman, in the position which he occupies, to congratulate himself that by the adoption of such means he had prevented a measure, which had been deliberately sanctioned by this House, being carried into effect. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that that success which he boasts of as having obtained over that measure, has by no means tended to raise him or the party with which he is connected in the estimation of foreign nations. On the contrary, I am bound to say that the indiguation which his observations have excited on the Continent has had the most injurious effect upon the general reputation of England in foreign countries. I therefore think that the right hon. Gentleman has been rather hasty in expressing himself in such a spirit. Another observation made by the right hon. Gentleman will not, I think, stand the test of argument. It has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman that it is rather disgraceful to the Administration, that so soon in the course of the war they should be obliged to have recourse to this extraneous means for increasing our effective force. Now, Sir, I say that it is precisely at the beginning of a war that it may be necessary to employ such means, and that after the war has lasted a long time, if unfortunately it should do so, when Government has been able, by those means of voluntary enlistment at its command, to raise the number of efficient men to the required amount to undertake great operations, then these foreign auxiliaries are no longer necessary. At the commencement of a war, when the country is called upon to make great efforts, is precisely the time when foreign auxiliaries are most required, and, therefore, I do not think there is much force in that argument of the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the question, as to whether this advance is a subsidy or a loan, I can confirm what has been stated by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) that, from the very beginning of the negotiations, the Government of Sardinia have repudiated all notion of its being a subsidy, to accept a subsidy being, in their view, inconsistent with the dignity and honour of their country. They thought it was more convenient to obtain the money they wanted, and that it might be obtained on easier terms, through the medium of England than if they had gone alone into the market; they added that they took this money on their own responsibility; and I do not think the engagement thus entered into was one which should be regarded as insufficient. The right hon. Gentleman has deemed it necessary to apologise for trespassing upon the Committee in two speeches, and such an apology is, perhaps, more called for from me, who have exceeded the right hon. Gentleman by one. I wish, however, to observe that on another subject, with regard to the militia, the right hon. Gentleman misunderstood the force of what I said in reply to him. His reproach to Her Majesty's Government was, that we did not, even before the war began, but certainly immediately afterwards, embody the whole militia, and that thus we showed a want of energy and of vigour. My answer to this was complete. It was that as the law stood, the law as brought forward and passed by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member, we had not the power to embody the militia; and that the law only gave us that power in case of actual invasion or apprehension thereof. It was not until Parliament had passed another Bill, allowing the militia to be embodied in time of war, that we had the power to do what the right hon. Gentleman said we ought to have done. With regard to the Scotch and Irish militia, new Acts of Parliament were required in each of those cases also, and we proposed those measures, and, as soon as they passed, embodied the whole of the militia of those countries. But even if we had had the Scotch and Irish militia embodied at an earlier period, that would not have given us a force available for those purposes for which we now propose that Parliament should give us this contingent.

MR. WALPOLE: I do not wish, Sir, to stop the progress of the Resolution before the Committee. There is no difference of opinion with reference to the passing of that Resolution, though some difference has been expressed in regard to the policy which may be supposed to be contained in it. I think, however, that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) may very well congratulate himself upon having brought this subject before the notice of the Committee, for if it had not been fully debated very great misconception might have taken place with respect to the question of loans and subsidies. As it is, the discussion this evening gives a clear intimation of the opinion of this House as to when loans ought and ought not to be made in these cases, and especially I refer to the opinions expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), which appear to me very much in conformity with those of my right hon. Friend, and in which opinions I need hardly say that I entirely concur. The observations of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) put this question in the best light. He said, with reference to the Resolution before the Committee, that two points were to be established; one being whether this was a safe and a judicious course, and the other whether it was a case in which necessity justified such a course. Now, with reference to the latter point, there cannot be two opinions. A great State necessity has arisen, though upon the causes of that necessity we may possibly differ. In regard to the point, that this is a safe and judicious course, the authority of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) who must have known what was going on before he left the Cabinet, and of the noble Lord the head of the present Government, shows that there is no idea of a subsidy in this advance to Sardinia, but that it is bond fide taken as a loan. Now, until these declarations were made, great misapprehension, I think, was entertained upon the subject, and my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli), therefore, has done great service to the country by eliciting these observations. With respect to the remarks of the noble Viscount, that my right hon. Friend had used the phrase of "mercenaries," in referring to the Sardinian troops, I am perfectly certain, as far as my own recollection serves me—indeed, I may say, from my own knowledge—that the noble Viscount, as well as the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird), was entirely mistaken. I have often heard my right hon. Friend express his opinion on this subject in private (and I am sure he said nothing in contradiction to that opinion this evening), namely, that the Sardinian troops, instead of being mere mercenaries, are some of the best troops in the world. [Viscount PALMERSTON: I did not say the right hon. Gentleman used that expression.] With regard to the militia, what my right hon. Friend complained of was, that the necessity which has now arisen has been to a great extent occasioned by the Government not making sufficient preparations for the war in which they must have foreseen they were likely at no distant period to be engaged. Allow me to remind the noble Viscount, that it was my right hon. Friend in the month of July or August, 1853—[Mr. DISRAELI: It was 1854]—it was, speaking more correctly, in 1854 that my right hon. Friend called upon the Government, in the case of war, or the probability of war, not to allow Parliament to be prorogued for the usual period, but that they should meet in the course of the autumn, in order to provide those other measures which now my right hon. Friend justly says the Government neglected to provide. When Parliament met in the spring of 1854, the militia had not been embodied, and, I think, had not been called out for more than the shortest period for which it had been called out before—namely, for twenty-eight days. At any rate, I am sure the noble Viscount never brought in his Bill until late in the Session to enable him to embody the militia in the event of war in the same manner as he could under the Bill which, as an instrument of the Government to which I belonged, I had the honour of introducing to this House, and by which the militia was to be embodied in the case of invasion or imminent danger thereof. Now, nobody knows better than the noble Viscount, for he was Secretary of War during the revolutionary war, and down to the peace in 1815, that under certain words in the old Act of Parliament, and continued in that which was passed through this House by the Government of which I was a member (aided very materially, I admit, by the noble Viscount himself), you always called out the militia before. I agree that there may have been a reasonable doubt upon that point; but instead of charging Lord Derby's Government with want of prescience in not making provision for calling out the militia in time of war, a very great doubt, indeed, has always existed in my mind whether you were justified last year in passing a Bill, as you did, for altering the character of the force you then raised. At the time I said nothing, because I would not impede the Government in raising what they believed a necessary force for the service of the country; but I believe as a general rule it would be better that the militia should only be raised in case of invasion or imminent danger of invasion, except for the purpose of garrisoning your towns. You should give every possible encouragement to the militia to enlist into the army; you should render it a nursery for the army; you should call them out for longer periods to train for the army, and then turn them into the line, instead of (except in great emergencies) drawing these persons altogether from the avocations in which they are engaged, they being a civil as well as a military body. It is not my wish to pursue this subject into anything like a hostile controversy with the noble Viscount, for on this side of the House there is the strongest desire to support him in the prosecution of this war with vigour and efficiency; and no party considerations will induce us to swerve from that determination. I hope, however, that in the prosecution of the war the end of that war will be more carefully looked to than it has been hitherto; that is to say, that you will propose to yourselves a clear, precise, definite aim—that you will know exactly what you intend to do, and that Parliament may be informed as to what you propose; for, as long as we remain in the same uncertainty on the subject in which we have been from the very beginning, I fear you will neither prosecute the war with so much vigour as you would otherwise employ, nor—which I still more apprehend—will you be able to accomplish a peace which will be safe and honourable to the country, and which England as well as the rest of Europe, provided that it is safe and honourable, emphatically desires.

MR. J. BALL said, he would admit that it was true that the finances of Sardinia had been to a considerable extent embarrassed of late years, but it was important to consider whether it arose from chronic causes, such as deficiency of resources, or merely from temporary causes. He thought that they were purely temporary causes, and that the embarrassment had been brought about by the enormous sacrifices made in 1848 and 1849, and by that most unfortunate campaign with Austria, and also by short crops. There was not the slightest reason to believe in the permanence of the state of things that had arisen from these causes, and in proof of that, he might refer to the great industrial exertions, and the development of the railway resources, which had occurred in Sardinia. In no country in Europe had there, since 1848, been so much capital, in proportion, laid out. Cultivation had also much increased, and the mining resources of the country had been developed in the highest degree. At the same time, he could not avoid stating his belief that some of the recent measures of the Government of Sardinia had been highly impolitic, but he quite agreed with the general course of legislation in Sardinia. As to the charge of culpable extravagance in Parliamentary corruption, he would say that though he had had great intercourse with people in that country, he had never heard an imputation of the kind, except from some of the more violent radicals. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) said the people of Sardinia had acted contrary to their own interests in entering into a treaty, but surely the representatives of the people of Sardinia, who voted for the treaty, ought to know what was best for the interests of that country. If the war were to continue, he did not think it right or just that it should be supported solely by France and England, when the whole of Europe was interested in the objects for which it had been undertaken.

MR. COBDEN said, he thought the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. J. Ball) had somewhat misapprehended the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright). His hon. Friend approved the efforts of Sardinia to advance liberal institutions as much as the hon. Member for Carlow, but he thought that they had acted unwisely in this instance. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ball) said, the majority of the representatives of Sardinia were in favour of the step which had been taken; but the treaty, if he was rightly informed, was by no means unanimously agreed to by the Sardinian Parliament; and it sometimes happened that Parliamentary majorities were wrong, and minorities right, though the hon. Gentleman would have the decision of a majority submitted to as a doom of fate. He (Mr. Cobden) had watched for some years with great interest the progress of Sardinia, and he yielded to no one in his wishes for the prosperity and freedom of that country; for he regarded Sardinia as the only ray of hope in the dark political horizon of Italy, and he felt that if Sardinia and her Parliamentary and representative Government failed, a heavy blow would be dealt to the hopes of every other State in Italy. That being his feeling toward Sardinia, he could not be accused of speaking of her in a hostile spirit, when he said that he doubted whether she had consulted her own interests in entering into this war. Why should Sardinia, which was the only antagonist to the power of Austria in Italy, be forced into the war before Austria had fired a shot? Was it not like the monkey putting the cat's paw into the fire to draw out the chestnut? During the last two months enough had been heard of Austria entering into the contest. And why, then, was she not invited to enter into it first, rather than a smaller Power, which had always been regarded as a sort of equipoise against the influence of Austria in Italy, and a most salutary equipoise wherever it had been felt? While Austria preserved its neutrality—for virtually she was neutral—could anybody suppose that Sardinia, as against Austria, could gain power and influence? He was sorry, as he had just said, for the step which Sardinia had taken, but he would go so far with the hon. Gentleman below him as to express a sincere hope that the head of the Sardinian Government, in whose abilities he had great confidence, was right, and that Sardinia might be ultimately benefited by the engagement into which she had entered with England and France. Leaving this part of the subject, he was desirous of calling the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to a point in the discussion of the question which he was surprised had not been alluded to before—namely, the time and the circumstances under which the House were called upon to vote this money. For four or five months they had been told that terms of peace had been proposed to Russia, which terms of peace were made the basis of negotiations so far back as last December. On the 2nd of December the Four Points were drawn up, on the 27th of December the interpretation of those points was handed in to Russia, and so long ago as the beginning of January they were told that Russia had accepted them as the basis of negotiations. From that time to the present, everything they had heard tended to the belief that Russia had entertained these Four Points as grounds for negotiations for peace, and, latterly, the steps which had been taken had assumed a far more important aspect. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London had withdrawn from most important functions at the Colonial Office, and was now at Vienna solely for the purpose of negotiating peace upon the Four Points, and they were told, though he did not know how far the report was true, that already two of these points had been definitely arranged. They were also told, that in the course of another fortnight they might expect the noble Lord home from Vienna. Surely, then, they were justified in assuming that this was an important crisis in the war, and that within a fortnight the electric telegraph might flash from one end of Europe to the other the announcement that the dispute had been finally and satisfactorily arranged, and that there was no reason why the belligerent Powers should not agree to an armistice. This must be the result of the Vienna conferences, or else everything that had been done up to this time would be mere childishness and trifling. In a week or ten days they would either hear that peace was probable, or they would be painfully conscious that war upon a much larger scale, and extended, perhaps, all over Europe, would be inevitable. He would suggest, then, to the noble Lord whether, under such circumstances, it was absolutely necessary that the 1,000,000*l.* of money now asked for should be voted; and whether, considering that peace might be entered into, it would not be as well to take into consideration the propriety, at all events, of not involving this country in the advance of so large a sum of money to Sardinia. He assumed that it was not the interest of Sardinia to go to war for the sake of war, and he was told that the troops had not yet sailed from Piedmont to the Crimea; it was, therefore, still possible that no expense would be incurred for the transmission of troops. He would, therefore, advise the noble Lord to look a little before him, for, from the moment that peace took place, a retrospect would begin as to the conduct of the war—the tongues of all parties would be let loose, and every item of mismanagement, waste, and extravagance would be revived to the prejudice of the Government. Was it not possible, if peace should be the result of the negotiations, that this very Vote would be revived against the noble Lord's Government as an item of extravagance for which that Government was responsible. Upon this ground, therefore, he would suggest to the noble Lord to take into his consideration the contingent circumstances which might arise to render the vote unnecessary.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he rose to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether, supposing peace should be concluded before the Sardinian expedition sailed to the Crimea, the obligation we had incurred with regard to the loan would be insisted upon?

MR. BOWYER said, he wished to explain a point to which reference had been made by the right hon. Gentleman near him (Mr. Gladstone), who appeared to imagine that he had charged the Sardinian Government with corruption. No one could be more adverse than he was to attacks upon foreign Governments, but the statement he had made was made for the purpose of showing that the Sardinian Government could not administer its finances in a safe and proper manner, and he could produce facts to prove that what he had said was not a mere vague assertion. His statement with regard to the confiscation of the property of a hospital at Turin was, that the fee simple of the estates had been sold and the proceeds employed by the Government, and repayment of the capital not having been secured to the hospital,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : The treaty was made with Sardinia upon the supposition that the Sardinian contingent would have to go to the seat of war, and carry on operations in conjunction with the British army during the year. The 1,000,000*l.* was to be advanced in two halves, one as soon as possible after the assent of Parliament had been given, and the other at the end of six months. Of course the Sardinian Government wanted the money to meet the greater expenses that were incurred by an army in the field than by an army stationed at home. Some of these expenses would have been incurred in preparing the contingent to take the field; and everybody acquainted with these matters knew that there were a great number of things requisite to equip an army for operations in the field which must be prepared before the army embarked. If peace were proclaimed before the army embarked only a certain portion of expense would have been incurred; on the other hand, if the army embarked and reached the scene of operations before peace was made, a greater portion of expense would have been incurred. Again, if peace were made only after the army had been there a certain time, a still greater portion of expense would have been incurred. The only answer, therefore, that he could give his hon. Friend (Mr. M. Milnes) was this—if peace should be made at an earlier period than the treaty contemplated there would naturally be a fresh arrangement between the two Governments, dependent upon the particular moment at which peace should have been made. If the Sardinian army should have reached the Crimea before peace was made, then an expense would have to be incurred in providing for their return; but he could not imagine that the Sardinian Government would wish to burden itself with a greater amount of loan than was necessary for the particular service which it had engaged to perform, and which it would be called on under that engagement to perform.

Resolved—

"That the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorised to issue, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the sum of One Million Pounds sterling, during the present year, by way of Loan, to the Sardinian Government, in accordance with the terms of a Treaty concluded between Her Majesty and the King of Sardinia, and the like sum of One Million Pounds sterling in the following year, in the event of the War not having been brought to a close before the expiration of twelve months after payment of the first instalment of the above-mentioned Loan."

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. DEEDES said, he had not had the good fortune to be present upon a former occasion, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced to a Committee of the whole House the Resolutions upon which this Bill was based; but on reading in the usual channels of information the account of what then occurred, he (Mr. Deedes) had been forcibly struck by the very slight encouragement that appeared to have been given to the right hon. Baronet by those who followed him in the debate. It appeared to him that every hon. Member who spoke on that occasion had some stone to cast at the right hon. Gentleman, and that they generally concurred in pointing out to him that the measure he proposed to introduce was not likely to secure the approbation of the country at large. It was his sincere belief that if the right hon. Gentleman had adopted the advice then tendered to him, if he had abstained from proposing legislative interference on this subject, and if he had not followed the example of his predecessor in office, he would have escaped a very difficult task, and he would have had no difficulty, under existing circumstances, in justifying such a course both to the House and the country. He considered, indeed, that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman himself established a strong case against the necessity or advisability of bringing forward this question at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman based the necessity of the measure upon certain Resolutions which were passed unanimously by that House during the last Session, at the instance of the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson). Now, he might observe in passing that he considered abstract Resolutions and abstract declarations of opinion, whether proceeding from bodies or from individuals, as extremely dangerous. Such Resolutions ought to be adopted with very great caution, for they were very apt to rise up in judgment against people at times when it was exceedingly inconvenient to carry them into effect. With regard to the financial portion of the question, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) seemed to him to dispose altogether of the necessity for the introduction of this measure. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"If we had at this time a surplus revenue, and if the expenditure of the country did not greatly exceed its ordinary revenue, the newspaper stamp would have a fair claim to be considered on any plan for repeal or any readjustment of taxes, and those who object to it might claim that its repeal should have precedence in any financial scheme. This, however, is not the present financial state of the country, and, if the House should decide in favour of this measure, it would be my duty to call upon them to provide for the deficiency of the revenue which might thereby be occasioned by some other mode of taxation."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 786.]

The right hon. Gentleman afterwards went on to say—

"It is my duty to inform the House that the estimate of persons of authority as to the loss of revenue must not be taken to be less than 200,000*l.* Such a loss of revenue is no doubt inconvenient at the present moment. On the other hand, the House will bear in mind that to refuse to repeal the stamp would be to recede from the unanimous resolution which it agreed to last Session, and will render necessary the passing of some measure declaratory of the law."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 787.]

He (Mr. Deedes) would be the last person to argue that any general Resolution of that House should be lightly passed over; but there was, in his opinion, a fitting time for all things, and he grounded his opposition to the present Bill on the conviction that this was not the fitting time for proceeding with such a measure as the one now under the consideration of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, however, determined to proceed with the Bill, and he (Mr. Deedes) would propose as an amendment that the second reading of the measure be postponed till after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made the financial statement. It might be supposed, from the terms of this amendment, that his objections to the Bill were entirely of a financial nature, but that would not be a correct idea of the fact, for he thought it was open to objections infinitely stronger than those of a financial character, and to which he would shortly draw the attention of the House. His objections went far beyond pounds, shillings and pence, and he would therefore state at once some of those objections. The first clause of the Bill was to him at once a "stopper." He considered that that clause contained the pith and marrow of the Bill, the subsequent provisions relating almost entirely to matters of detail. He found the first clause provided that there should be no further compulsory stamp duty upon any newspaper—that, consequently, did away with the necessity for compulsory registration, and also that no declaration should be required. The regulations which would thus be dispensed with had been established by previous legislation on this subject in order to prevent unfair attacks from being made upon private character, and with the object of raising as much as possible the character of the publications to which such legislation referred, as well as offering a remedy for abuses of the press. These regulations, however, were no longer thought necessary by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he (Mr. Deedes) must say, he would regard with very great reluctance, and even with considerable dread, any relaxation of the law which would allow persons to write upon public affairs in such a manner as to excite the minds of those who were comparatively uneducated and ignorant, and whose powers of discrimination were not of a high order. He had seen within the last day or two some papers and publications of the description to which he referred, and he could only say that he should be very sorry to see them multiplied in this country. He objected entirely to the principle of taxing information by the inch, and he saw no reason why the conductors of a paper, who took great trouble and incurred great expense to provide information which was palatable to its readers, should be called upon to pay higher taxation than the conductors of a paper who catered less expensively for the public amusement and information. He would ask the House whether they were satisfied that the present law was so faulty as to require immediate amendment, and, if so, whether the proposition of the Government was calculated to remedy any evils that might exist? He was quite ready to admit that there were faults in the present system that required amendment; that there were anomalies which it was desirable to remove; but he denied that those faults and anomalies existed to such an extent as to render it necessary for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come down to Parliament at this particular moment with a Bill on the part of the Government expressly providing for their remedy or removal. At some future time a measure of that kind might be introduced with considerable benefit, but he did not think the present Bill was calculated to remove faults and anomalies with fairness and justice to existing interests. He was one of those who thought that the press had sometimes, perhaps, exceeded its fair powers—that it had at times pressed unfairly on individuals, and in its attacks laid hold of points of character which it was very difficult indeed, for those so attacked to set right, or scarcely to defend. He thought that in some of the letters and communications sent from the seat of war the state of matters there had been over highly coloured—so much so as to cause one to entertain a measure of doubt as to the whole of the transactions reported to have taken place. But, notwithstanding the high colouring and some exaggeration that might have occurred, he believed that on the whole this country was greatly indebted to the press for the exertions which it had made to furnish us with information from the seat of war, and he should have deeply regretted to see the press restrained in the discharge of that duty; for he was of opinion that the advantages more than counterbalanced the occasional hardships that might be experienced by indiscreet or overcharged descriptions. In looking at this question, he could not altogether disconnect it from the subject of the general education of the country. There were at that moment on the table of the House two Bills relating to the improvement of general education, and no man could be more anxious than he was to see the working classes partake to the utmost possible extent of the blessings of sound religious instruction. There were on the table of the House the Bill of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonial Department and the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), and a third Bill was likewise promised from the other side of the House upon the same subject. These Bills, it was said, were to be referred to one Committee for consideration; and he would say that if the tendency of the measure at present before the House was to multiply in the country, or place with greater ease and readiness in the hands of the young and less educated portion of the community, publications which it would be better for their morals they should not have an opportunity of reading, it should be in the power of that Committee to say whether the system of education which they might propose would be improved by having a measure, like the one for which a second reading was now asked, carried through the House. He should like, if it were possible, to have the opinion of the Committee on this question as one closely connected with the general education of the country. Another question of great importance to which he would allude was that of copyright. In dealing with this point he had the advantage of the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. When speaking on the subject he said—

"There is another point which is not a matter of indifference to me—namely, the question of copyright for the protection of literary property in newspapers. I don't wonder, so far as we know anything of the plan of my right hon. Friend from his explanation to-night, that he has not included in his Bill any clauses upon this subject. I think, indeed, it is a matter with reference to which it would be very difficult to devise a plan. At the same time I am under the impression that the proprietors of newspapers, in many cases, entertain great anxiety that the provisions of the law with respect to the protection of literary property should undergo special consideration, and should, if practicable, receive some extension with a view to the protection of literary property in newspapers. Undoubtedly, so far as the article that is most strictly called 'news' is concerned—for instance, the communication of facts, which may generally be comprised within a very brief space, and the language, the outward shape and form of which can be varied almost at will—I do not know how you are to introduce any further provisions than the law at present contains; but I have understood from some persons, who ought to be well informed on the subject, that the great anxiety of those who think this question worth consideration in the press as it stands, is not so much directed to the protection of their 'news,' strictly so called, which, in point of fact, it would be very difficult to protect, as to the protection of what may more fairly be called their literary compositions: . . . . I, for one, am very anxious that, either in the plan of my right hon. Friend, or in some other effective form, this question should be brought to a settlement."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 792-3.]

Having read this opinion, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether he saw any settlement of this question in the Bill before the House. There was no protection whatever to copyright in this Bill. The words in which the right hon. Gentleman concluded this part of his address were so strong that he would read two sentences more:—

"I do not venture to prejudge this question, but I would venture to express a hope that, in endeavouring to carry out the principle of the freedom of the press, my right hon. Friend will not be indisposed to take into his favourable consideration any reasonable proposition which may be made to him for the improvement of the law of copyright, in order that we may not run any risk of breaking down that system under which the highest talent in the country is applied largely and advantageously devoted to supplying the public with intelligence, and to the discussion of that intelligence. I must confess that I should regard the destruction of that system as a public misfortune—a misfortune which I am the less disposed to incur, because I do not look upon it as a natural or necessary consequence of the important measure of emancipation which is now contemplated by Her Majesty's Government."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 794-5.]

Now in his (Mr. Deedes's) way of reading the measure, he could see no chance of remedying the misfortune which the right hon. Gentleman deprecated. He thought the general tone adopted by the press of this country had very much improved compared with what it was some years ago, and therefore he thought that its interest should be the more protected. He remembered, not so very long since, when day after day, and week after week, prosecutions were instituted on the part of the Attorney General against publications that were a disgrace to the country, and he should be excessively sorry to see that time return again. He believed that the country at large was very well satisfied with the law as it now stood; that it was equally satisfied with what the press did for it in the way of publishing all events that it was desirable to know, and which were increasing every day, and therefore he submitted that, unless in much more favourable circumstances than the present, there was no ground for interference, particularly of the nature proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It might be asked why, when he (Mr. Deedes) had these objections to the Bill, he did not at once move that it be rejected altogether. This would probably be best answered in the reply which he gave to a question put to him several times since he had placed his Amendment on the paper—namely, whether he wished to turn out the Government. To that he answered decidedly not. He did not wish to turn out the Government; on the contrary, he would regard it as a calamity were such an event to happen at a moment when a distinguished Member of that Government was carrying on negotiations for peace at Vienna. He brought forward the motion in no hostile spirit to the Government. He was one who approved entirely the course taken by the noble Earl who was first sent for by Her Majesty on the occasion of the recent Ministerial resignations, and who thought it was advisable to endeavour to call in the assistance of those not immediately connected with him in politics, as he could not form a strong Government without so doing, and he considered that he was right in the course he subsequently took. He was ready to give every independent support to the Government, and he did not know it could be said that he had, ever since he had a seat in that House, manifested anything like factious opposition. He would now pass to the financial aspect of this question, and in referring to which he was at a loss to imagine on what ground the proposition he now made could be reasonably resisted. He had already stated the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the finances of the country, and he would now bring before the House the view taken by his right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) who once held the high position of Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. Gentleman thought the House might count on the loss of 250,000*l.* of revenue in adopting the proposed arrangement. He added—

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer has fairly told you that if you pass this measure he must of necessity propose some other taxation to compensate for the sum it is now proposed should be lost. Well, then, let us know what is the taxation which the right hon. Gentleman will propose in lieu?"—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 796.]

That was but right and reasonable in his (Mr. Deedes's) opinion, as the present was not the time when large sums could be passed over without explanation, or without the House being told what was the remedy to be applied in each case. His right hon. Friend (Sir F. Baring) proceeded to say—

"We ought not to proceed to vote away a quarter of a million of public money until we have before us the whole state of the finances of the country, and are thereby able to take a full and comprehensive view of the subject. I will not now enter further into the details of the plan which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained so clearly and candidly to the House, but if he proposes, after bringing in his Bill, to pass it before his financial statement is made, I am afraid that he will find me prepared, even if I should find myself in a minority of one, to vote for the postponement of the measure."—[3 Hansard, Ibid.]

He (Mr. Deedes) claimed to be allowed to make number two in that minority. The hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) said—

"It was impossible for that House to conceal from itself that the expenditure of the country exceeded by many millions any sum which could reasonably be expected to be raised by taxation during the year; and, under these circumstances, it was, in his opinion, wrong to remit a tax which produced 200,000*l.* At such a time it was not expedient to remit taxation in order to court popularity, however unpopular any tax might be."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 807.]

The hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) and another hon. Member followed in the same strain. He alluded to the speeches of these hon. Gentlemen in order to justify the course he had adopted of submitting an Amendment to a Bill of such importance as that before the House, and to show that other Members took the same view that he did, whose opinions were entitled to infinitely more weight than he could pretend to. Turning to the speech of the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) and that of his hon. colleague (Mr. Bright), he could not hope to receive much support from them, but he was thankful for the little he could get. The right hon. Gentleman had said, "that he quite agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the difficulties to be met, and that they must be careful in a time like this of abandoning any sources of revenue." He (Mr. Deedes) thanked the right hon. Gentleman for so much, as it strengthened the view which he (Mr. Deedes) took as to the impropriety of interfering, as they would by the present measure, with the sources of revenue at the present time. The hon. Member for Manchester's speech gave but little indication of support to the Amendment, and he, indeed, seemed to anticipate that an application would be made for the postponement of this measure, for he said, "that he did not consider the measure to be as good as that proposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. He denied its being a matter of revenue, and urged upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring in a Bill, and to pass it as fast as the House would allow him to do so." He should not trouble the House with any further extracts, and should say but little more in support of his Amendment. He had said that he considered that the press of the country was generally well conducted, and that its exertions were so meritorious, and that in it was embarked so vast an amount of property as fairly to entitle it to protection; he looked, also, to the present measure with fear, as he thought it would lead to the introduction of papers of a low and immoral character, which would tend to injure the ignorant and the young, and to detract from that high character and standard which the press of this country had now taken. He believed, moreover, that the country did not require this change, and that by far the greater portion were satisfied with the law as it at present stood, and that, if the country could be polled as to the advisability of the change proposed, and of substituting a fresh tax for 250,000*l.*, that there would be no doubt as to the result. He also pressed the adoption of his Amendment on the House, on the ground of the extreme unfitness of the moment chosen by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for making this change. He considered also that this question had not been sufficiently long before the House to enable them thoroughly to understand all its details, and if the postponement of the Bill should be permitted, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be disposed, after he had made his financial statement, to press this measure, he would be able to do so then with as great advantage to himself as he would derive from pressing it forward at the present time.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon Monday the 30th day of April next."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR BULWER LYTTON: I can, Sir, assure my hon. Friend the mover of the proposed amendment, that it is with great pain that on this question I am conscientiously compelled to differ from him, and, I fear, from some other gentlemen on this side of the House with whose opinions on most subjects I cordially concur. Before I sit down I shall examine the validity of the arguments on which my hon. Friend has based his amendment; but I am glad to hear from him that he would not restrict the debate to the cramped and narrow ground on which his amendment would place it—that he would not reduce to a question of pounds, shillings, and pence a principle which I will endeavour to show to be one of the most important, and in point of time, one of the most pressing, which a House of Commons can entertain. I can, indeed, advance some claim to the original paternity of the measure my hon. Friend considers to be so mischievous. I believe I was the first person who ever introduced into this House a motion for the repeal of the taxes on knowledge, including the stamp duty on newspapers. Sir, when my hon. Friend says that this subject has not been sufficiently long before us, he must allow me to tell him, that it is more than twenty years ago that I first brought this question before the House; I was then a very young man, but the opinions I then entertained in favour of the total repeal of the newspaper stamp duty are not removed—they are strengthened by the lapse of time; for within the last twenty years there has been a great increase of intelligence among the people, and any danger to be apprehended from the sudden diffusion of cheap newspapers is, therefore, considerably less now than it was then. But why is the danger less? Why has intelligence increased? Because within the last twenty years all kinds of cheap publications have abounded, and the public have had the wisdom to choose the best and reject the worst. The very arguments now used by my hon. Friend against cheap newspapers were once used much more boldly against the principle of cheap publications altogether. We were then told that the common mass of the people would prefer worthless and inflammatory works, and that to adapt the market to their pockets would be to corrupt their understandings. Now what has been the fact? why that in proportion as good books have been made cheap, bad books have retreated from circulation. Ask anywhere what books most please the artisan or mechanic, and you will find it is either elementary works of science, or if books of amusement, the very books of amusement that scholars and critics themselves prefer. And now that the people have thus nobly disproved the fear of cheap publications which prudent men might once have entertained, have we a right to listen for a moment to such assertions as I see the newspaper proprietors have put forth, and my hon. Friend has condescended to echo—that any newspaper cheaper than their own must necessarily appeal to the worst passions and prejudices of the lowest class? Now, Sir, is it the cheapness of the newspaper that will corrupt the artisan, or is it the baseness of the artisan that must corrupt the newspaper? What are these assertions but the most groundless declamation, disproved by all the experience we have now obtained of the taste and inclinations of the working class, disproved by the thousands and hundreds of thousands of cheap publications which have brought to the cottage and the loom—what?—a debased and contaminating literature? No, the same refined and elevated knowledge which delights and instructs ourselves. I beseech the House to separate the details of this measure from the broad principle. On the second reading of the Bill, it is to the principle we should look. I agree with my hon. Friend (Mr. Deedes) that there are provisions in the measure that require alteration, but those portions of the Bill that are objected to can be altered in Committee. Many details may require hereafter our most serious consideration, but I will now only make upon some of them one or two passing remarks. For example, I think it an act of justice and sound policy, not only to secure the copyright of all original matter to newspapers, but to give a cheap and summary mode of protecting that copyright similar to that which exists for copyright in manufacture under Sir Emerson Tennent's Act. I think, too, that the complaint of The Times as regards itself is just. When you are introducing a general law by which newspapers are to go through the post at a penny, it seems to me fair and reasonable that you should take as your standard of weight or size that newspaper which has the largest circulation and in which the public feel the deepest degree of interest. I am told that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer means to recur to the principle of weight. If so, I say, weigh The Times as your standard—

"Expende Annibalem—quot libras in duce summo Invenies."

And it seems to me not a worthy distinction in so wholesale a change to separate The Times from the Supplement, which is an integral part of the paper, and that, too, a part of which the unrestricted diffusion is of so great an importance to the intellectual and commercial community. I agree in all that my hon. Friend has said with regard to the high character of the press of this country. Far from entertaining any grudge to the existing newspaper press, far from seeking to undervalue its signal merits, I grant that it is an honour to the country from the ability of its compositions, the integrity of the men who adorn it, the vast and various information it diffuses, and making fair allowances for the heat of party spirit and the temptations of anonymous power, for its general exemption from wilful calumny and personal slander. And if I desired to leave to remote posterity some memorial of existing British civilisation, I would prefer, not our docks, not our railways, not our public buildings, not even the palace in which we now hold our sittings; I would prefer a file of The Times newspaper. Could I, then, believe that the change proposed would deteriorate the moral and intellectual character of the newspaper press, I fear I might have the weakness to cling to the existing system, if it had not so crumbled away that I can find nothing to cling to but an Attorney General who dares not prosecute, and a jury that would not convict. But then it is the taste of the public that forms the newspaper, not the newspaper that forms the taste of the public; and if the press is an honour to the country, it is because it represents what honours the country still more—the good sense and civilised humanity from which the press takes its colour and its tone. Now, you have been told that this change will degrade our press to the level of the American, and you have been led to infer that the American press is left solely in the hands of ignorant adventurers, whereas the remarkable peculiarity of the American press is that it represents nearly all the intellect of that country. There is scarcely a statesman of eminence, an author of fame, who does not contribute to the American periodical press; and, therefore, the editor of one of their journals says on this very subject, "If the American press is inferior to the English, it merely argues that the intellect of the country is inferior, for nearly all the available intellect of the United States is engaged in their press." This serves to show you that if our press is superior to the American, it does not depend upon fiscal laws, but upon the general standard of civilisation; in other words, the press can but reflect the public.

Upon the financial part of the question, on the alleged loss to the revenue, I will touch later; but I cannot consent to allow the grand principle involved in this Bill to be dwarfed down to the level of a budget. What is that principle? I will place it upon broader ground than that taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, indeed, seems to regard the Bill rather with the reluctant and frigid toleration of a stepfather than the glowing love of a parent. The principle is this—that you ought not in a free country to lay a tax on the expression of political opinion—a tax on the diffusion of that information on public affairs which the spirit of our constitution makes the interest and concern of every subject in the State. Still more, you should not, by means of that tax, create such an artificial necessity for capital that you secure the monopoly of thought upon the subjects that most interest the public at large to a handful of wealthy and irresponsible oligarchs. That is the principle at stake ; that is the question before you. Turn it as you will, you cannot get rid of the fact that as long as this newspaper stamp duty exists no man, whatever his knowledge, his honesty, his talent, the soundness of his conservative opinions, can set up a daily journal on the affairs of the country without an enormous capital—not even a weekly one without a capital of some thousand pounds ; and, therefore, the stamp duty does confine the liberty of expressing opinion as much as if the State actually sold for a large sum of money the right to monopolise the market of public information. Now, one result of thus narrowing the representation of opinion is, that large sections of opinion are either not represented at all or represented very inadequately. And I doubt very much if there are ten thoughtful men on either side the House who can say that, on many of the most important questions, there is now one daily newspaper with which they can cordially agree. Take the great Conservative party ; consider, first, its numbers throughout the kingdom—in the counties generally a large majority ; in the towns, even most hostile, generally a large and influential minority ; compute its strength, not in numbers alone, but comparative intelligence ; consider how large a share of the highly cultivated classes, in the learned professions, in commerce, among the gentry, entertain Conservative opinions. Now turn to the daily newspapers, and ask yourselves if those opinions are represented in any proportion to the numbers and intellectual eminence of their supporters throughout the country ? There are two ways of representing opinion—one through Parliament, the other through the press. Now, I ask, how are the Conservatives represented in Parliament ? My hon. Friends will tell me that they are confessedly the largest single and integral body in the House of Commons. How are they represented in the press ? Why, no single subdivision of political opinion is represented so sparingly. Compute the number of Conservative journals, compute the number of copies they sell, at the price you are told to keep up, and you will be perfectly astounded at the disparity between the influence of the Conservative party in the country and their representation in the press. But if this stamp duty were removed—if every able man among you had the right to defend your cause in the form of a journal without this necessity for capital, can you doubt that all which talent or knowledge can bring to bear on behalf of your political creed would find its fair and natural channel ? And though the best newspaper, as a record of news, will be always that which has the largest capital, yet the best opinions are not always found in the best newspapers, and many readers who would take one journal for the sake of its general news would take another on account of their sympathy with its political doctrines. No doubt all opinions—those you condemn as well as those you approve—would obtain their utterance. But twenty years ago I assured myself that on the liberal side of the question safe and sound thinkers would hold it an imperative duty to stand forward and counteract the danger of all socialist and revolutionary doctrines, and, on the Conservative side, are we so barren of literary talent, or so indifferent to the spread of our principles, that free competition will not yield us additional advocates ? No ; a host of writers would appear to divest the popular mind of those prejudices against existing institutions which are now left to circulate in defiance of this law, and without any answer at all ; for I cannot learn that there is at this moment a single Conservative journal which penetrates the mass of the working class. Sir, I am convinced that if this stamp duty, this obstacle were removed, many an eminent public man, many an eminent man of letters, would start small cheap papers, not attempting to vie or interfere with the special province of The Times, but conveying opinions stamped by the responsibility of his avowed name. You would thus call in the principle of cheap competition, not to lower, but to elevate still more the character of the newspaper press ; for nothing would so exalt the social position of gentlemen engaged in newspaper literature as some signal exceptions to that anonymous mystery which now shrouds all attacks on the characters of public men. I do not mean to say that the preservation of the anonymous system may not at times be useful and even necessary ; but I do say that its rigid and uniform use is the only power of the press which I hold to be invidious and derogatory. No more able, no more accomplished gentlemen than the contributors to the higher departments of the press can adorn our circles; yet it is in vain to deny that we feel a certain uneasiness in the social intercourse with men to the exercise of whose talents secrecy is so imperative a law that the man who clasps us by the hand to-day, may, in the discharge of his professional duty, sting us to the quick to-morrow, darkly and in secret. Mr. Fox once told this House an anecdote of a witness on a trial, I think, for murder, who gave his testimony against another man on the ground that a ghost had appeared to him, and said so and so. "Well," said the Judge, who was a person of considerable humour, "I have no objection to take the evidence of the ghost; let him be brought into court." These anonymous newspaper writers are as ghosts. We do not object to take their evidence, but there are times when I should like them brought into court.

This subject has been far too much argued as if it were a question between the tax collector and the newspaper proprietors. I could not help smiling when the other evening I heard an hon. Member say that they did not complain of the law, and why, then, should it be changed? What corporate body, I ask, ever did complain of a law which restricted competition, and secured to itself a virtual monopoly? And I am perfectly amazed to see these journals, most of which honoured us poor Protectionists with such hard names, now arming themselves with all the antiquated arguments in favour of protective duties, amounting to absolute prohibition, which during the last ten years of the discussion on the corn laws the stoutest friend of the farmer would not have ventured to use. Sir, the question really is between the tax collector and the public, and it is this—whether it is not time that we should enforce that great principle of the constitution of civil liberty, and of common sense which says that opinion shall go free, not stinted nor filched away by fiscal arrangements, but subject always to the laws of the country against treason, blasphemy, and slander. Those laws will still remain, though the question has been argued as if they were to be swept away. But thus much it is just to say on behalf of the working classes, to whom we are told that cheap libellous periodicals will especially appeal—that no class hitherto has so little supported newspapers of a libellous and gossiping character as the working classes of this country. I remember when certain Sunday journals profaned the Sabbath by hebdomadal ribaldry and scandal. Who supported them? I fear it was the clubs and the drawing-rooms. Certainly it was not the working class; and those journals ultimately perished, because they could obtain no circulation among the common people, and no sympathy from the public in the actions that were brought against them. It is a remarkable fact, and one that shows how little the danger of publications depends on their price, that profligate and licentious literature always begins by corrupting the higher class before it reaches the lower. I know no instance to the contrary in the history of all literature, ancient or modern. Take the examples with which we are most familiar. It was the nobles and wits, the well-born abbés and great ladies of Paris who brought into fashion and introduced to the artisans of France the chimeras of Rousseau, the infidelity of Voltaire. And I do not believe that the inflammatory catchpennies that now, in defiance of your law, circulate through our manufacturing towns, would last six months after the repeal of the stamp duty had removed the morbid attraction which belongs to things proscribed and forbidden, and exposed them to the competition of sound and healthful writings at the same price. This is not a mere theory, it has been partially tried. It appears in the evidence of the Committee of 1851, that the appearance of one or two legal threepenny papers in London, though they were by no means first-rate, sufficed to destroy an immense swarm of unstamped pernicious publications which had before circulated throughout the metropolis. Let us, then, do with this field of letters, what we country gentlemen are learning to do with our fields at home; if we want the corn to have fair play, we clear away an unnecessary hedgerow full of thorns and brambles, and expose the ground well to the sun and to the air. But at this time of day it is superfluous to argue the principle that opinion should not be indirectly suppressed by a tax, when the boldest man among us dare not invade it by an open law; and, indeed, if we desired to do so, we have no longer the power. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us without any exaggeration, though perhaps rather reluctantly, that the stamp duty has broken down in all directions. There are not, as he states, only 100, for there are no less than 250 publications subject to the Statute, only partially stamped, and all liable to prosecution. If you do not prosecute them all, with what justice can you prosecute one. It is all very well for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say, with that grim complacency, if you don't pass this Bill you must arm the Government with new laws—with new powers of prosecution. Now, Sir, I feel confident that this House of Commons will do no such thing; if we did frame new laws for checking the circulation of knowledge, or if we did make what is asked—a new arbitrary distinction between political journals and those of a different nature, we should do more to expedite the march of a democratic reform Bill than all which the restless spirit of the noble Lord the Member for London—that is to say, when out of office—could effect. And if we were blind and harsh enough to frame such laws, I should like to see the Attorney General who would have the courage to enforce them, or the Government that would have the insanity to allow him. While we discuss, the law for all good purposes is virtually dead. You may retain the sword for a time in its nerveless hand. I defy you to renew the energy of its muscles. I defy you to strike the blow.

I now come to my hon. Friend's Amendment. He says, "Will you hazard the loss of 200,000*l.* of revenue at a time when you will require new taxes for carrying on the war with Russia?" But against what do you wage war? It is not against Russia as Russia. In commercial interchange Russia is our natural ally. It is against Russia when she appears as the symbol of barbaric usurpation and brute force. Why, then, out of the millions you devote to secure the distant boundaries of civilisation, grudge a paltry fraction towards the service of those two great agents of civilisation at home—freedom of opinion and popular knowledge? I ask my hon. Friend, is there any usurpation more barbarous than that which usurps the utterance of thought upon public affairs? Is there any type of brute force more odious than that which an Attorney General will embody if he is to say to a jury, "This publication is harmless—nay, its contents are most valuable; but the proprietor was not rich enough to pay a duty imposed on the liberty of printing, and I call upon you, in the name of the law, to stifle the knowledge you admire, and to ruin the man who has a claim to your gratitude." Now, Sir, I do not believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer will lose one single farthing, if he adds to his Bill, as is proposed, the privilege of transmitting all printed papers by the post at the same proportional charge as periodical journals. More than twenty years ago I went carefully into the details on this very subject, for it formed a part of my own scheme, and I convinced myself that the number of tracts of all kinds, religious, literary, or commercial—of catalogues of booksellers and land agents—of writings purely intended for diffusion, would, under the plan proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) yield a sum far exceeding the deficit now alleged, while the addition to the paper duty itself will, I think, prove sufficient compensation. But even if it were otherwise—I put this question to my hon. Friends as Conservatives—are 200,000*l.* too dear a purchase for restoring authority to laws that no more stringent provisions will enable you to enforce? Should the dignity and efficacy of the law be to Conservatives mere items of revenue? No; they are objects beyond all price, and I am persuaded that we should not have heard a word on the fiscal part of the question—never have had this Amendment—if hon. Gentlemen were but convinced that the measure itself were safe and prudent; if certain interested parties out of doors had not sought to alarm us by assertions of another kind of danger than that of loss to the revenue—assertions so absurd to the sense of all who are acquainted with the practical conditions of our literature that those who make them would be the first to laugh at our credulity if we believed them. Assertions that a fivepenny journal must be respectable, and a penny journal must be licentious, and all such trumpery, as I find in this notable electricism of twaddle and bugbear, which has been circulated among us, and called "Objections to the Newspaper Stamp Act." This was against the first Bill, but it is meant equally to apply to the present. Here I find it stated that among the most active agents for a change are persons whose avowed object is the diffusion of opinions adverse to religion and subversive of the rights of property. And this courteous insinuation against those who differ from themselves is put forth by the very innocents who have such a horror of libel ! Whom they mean, I know not. Among the most active for a change are the hon. Members for Manchester and the West Riding, who hold doctrines some of us consider extreme, but at least they express their doctrines openly and plainly, and I have never yet heard that they avowed opinions adverse to religion and subversive of property. Among those whom I have remembered most favourable to a repeal of this duty were the late Lord Althorp, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell. Lord Lyndhurst, has, I think, expressed himself in favour of it. There is also that very natural enemy to the rights of property, the heir of the house of Derby (Lord Stanley). There is that notorious foe to religion, the representative of the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). And the most active agents for a change are Her Majesty's Ministers, who, whatever their faults, are, I presume, tolerably well satisfied with what is called the established order of things. I have looked well through this paper ; all its arguments are comprised in two libels ; one against those who advocate cheap newspapers, the other against those who will read them. It reminds me of what Horace Walpole said of a lady, "That she had as fine a set of teeth as any one could have who had only two, and both of them black." Do not let hon. Members be thus led away. Do not let Conservatives continue to be cheated out of all fair chance to explain their opinions to the working class. My right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) in the course of his luminous speech on introducing his noble Bill on education, alluded to the letters of our private soldiers in the Crimea, which have excited such just admiration. Let me ask, Sir, how have the minds of these soldiers been trained to love and defend their country ? — trained to those great conservative principles, humanity, discipline, fortitude, and patience ? Is it not, in part, by the cheap publications that have instructed the childhood of the present generation ; and ought not that to teach you how little, as Conservatives, you have to fear from any department of cheap knowledge ? Do not fancy that this penny tax is a slight imposition. Do not fancy that a penny paper is necessarily low and bad. Once there existed a penny daily paper—it was called The Spectator. Addison and Steele were its contributors. It did more to refine the manners of this people than half the books in the British Museum.

Suddenly a halfpenny tax was put on that penny paper, and so one fatal morning the most pleasing and graceful instructor that ever brought philosophy to the fireside had vanished from the homes of men. True that it survived the first stroke which laid low its feebler contemporaries ; it doubled its price—it did not immediately decline in its circulation ; Dean Swift believed that it would still lift up its head, and march gallantly under its burthen. But no, it began to stagger—to droop. On the third month from the day it first took the load, with so haughty a crest, it fell to the ground :—an attempt was made by its writers to raise it under a new name, and strengthen it by the tonic of party politics ; that attempt, too, finally succumbed. It then, after a long interval, resumed its old appellation—The Spectator appeared again. Addison put into it the noblest efforts of his strength—in vain. The fatal tax was too powerful for Addison. In a few months it sunk, never to revive. Yes, Sir, a halfpenny tax sufficed to extinguish The Spectator, and divorce that exquisite alliance which genius had established between mirth and virtue. I turn to my hon. Friends around me. I say that I am convinced, earnestly and conscientiously convinced, that a penny journal, containing moderate Conservative opinions, managed by some gentlemen as familiarly acquainted with the tastes and feelings of the humbler classes as, for instance, many of our plain squires and country clergy are, would do more to popularize Conservatism, than half the party speeches we make in this house. For what is Conservatism ? Surely not that which its enemies, surely not that which three-fourths of these fivepenny journals represent it to be ? It is not a stern and lifeless system of restraint and terror, but a warm and generous love for the free laws, the liberal altars, and the glorious people of the land in which we live. Is it the constitution you would conserve ? What is this English constitution ? Not a crazy and decrepit form that must shrink from every breath of air, that cannot face the rude popular gaze, nor stand the manly shock of contending opinions. No ; it is a robust organisation of sound principles, which has received its life and its soul not more from the wisdom of statesmen than from the courage of dauntless patriots. As such, are we not bound, we lovers of the constitution, to prove that we do not fear discussion ? Are we not bound, we Conservatives, bound especially, to justify resistance to wanton inroads on that constitution, by showing that it needs no hazardous Reform Bill to give to the people every access to knowledge—every facility to make themselves better and wiser? And it is because I believe this to be our duty and our policy as true Conservatives; it is because I hail an occasion to show that we do not dread the good sense of the humblest class of our countrymen in any fair discussion between them and us; it is because I am convinced that as we widen the field of literature, we raise up new champions for ourselves, and best counteract the poison to which a worthless law now forbids the antidote, that I give to the main principle of this measure my most cordial and hearty support.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought that the House ought clearly to know how this matter stood, for when that was explained he thought that all hon. Gentlemen would agree with him that it would be most inconvenient any longer to delay the second reading of the Bill. The present condition of the law was most unsatisfactory and perplexing, and matters were in a very anomalous position, arising out of the permission which had been accorded to certain classes of publications to omit the affixing of the stamp. There was no doubt but that, in the first instance, the stamp duty upon newspapers had been imposed for political purposes; of late, however, that view of the matter could hardly be maintained. Hence it was that after a time Government had permitted certain periodicals, which strictly fell within the intention of the Stamp Act, but which did not come up to the popular idea of a newspaper, to stamp only a portion of their impression. Such periodicals were addressed specially to certain subjects, almost, indeed, to certain classes of readers exclusively. As instances, he might name the Athenaeum, the Literary Gazette, the Musical Times, the Builder, and certain papers devoted to legal subjects, such as the Jurist, &c. In course of time this led to a new class of papers coming into existence—papers which, though not devoted to those higher and more intellectual subjects which at first were held to form fair grounds of exemption, yet confined themselves to one subject exclusively. Of this class were The Racing Times, which was devoted to subjects connected with the turf, and The Police Gazette, which gave reports of the cases before the police courts. It became, then, a question whether the indulgence should be extended to papers of this description also, and eventually it was considered most advisable that, instead of constituting the Board of Inland Revenue a tribunal to decide how far a particular paper was deserving of exemption, one general rule should be adopted, and that all papers devoting themselves to the discussion of one subject should be alike exempted. A great variety of class papers then came into existence, but presently some of them began to publish what certainly was news in the general and more popular acceptation of the term, and it then became a question as to the amount and character of the intelligence which should take a paper out of the category of class publications. Was a paragraph to be sufficient—or half a column, or a whole column? In this way there arose a most embarrassing difficulty. If, on the one hand, the officers of the revenue did not enforce the law rigorously, and put down papers of this class, then immediately a great outcry arose from the papers subject to the tax against the injustice inflicted on them; and if, on the other hand, they did insist upon the payment of the tax by this description of class papers, there was a great outcry from these in their turn against the system which allowed some papers to be issued without a stamp, and, at the same time, singled out others for prosecution. A further embarrassment was immediately afterwards added to this perplexing state of things. The House of Commons interfered, and, on the motion of the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) declared that the law was not properly administered, and that the Government ought not to take upon itself to make a distinction between one class of periodicals and another. Under these circumstances he had felt it his duty to represent to the Government the position in which he, as law officer of the Crown, was placed. His hon. Friend (Sir B. Lytton) was wrong when he said the law was a dead letter. The law, if enforced, was strong enough; but what would be the outcry if the officers of the Government, called upon to enforce the law impartially, should enforce it against newspapers which had been encouraged by successive Governments, the proprietors of which newspapers had been led to believe that they might safely invest their capital so long as they confined their publication to the exposition of subjects which were not connected with news in the ordinary acceptation of the term? What would be the outcry if these newspapers were called upon to contribute to this tax? So far, also, his hon. Friend (Sir B. Lytton) was right, that they would have to appeal to juries, and how strong would be the impression on the minds of the juries when they were reminded of the impunity and exemption which these publications had so long enjoyed, and they were told that this tax was that which stood in the way of diffusing political information among those classes among whom it was most desirable that political information should be diffused. It therefore became necessary to dispose of this question at the earliest possible period, and although nobody could admire more than he did the tone and temper in which the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Deedes) had brought forward his proposition, he (the Attorney General) could find in his observations no argument for delay. No doubt there would be a certain diminution in the revenue, although his Friend the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir B. Lytton) thought that the increase in the revenue of the Post Office would more than compensate for such deficiency; yet, assuming for the sake of argument that a deficiency would arise, they would know the extent of the loss. If they were not prepared to meet that loss, let them put an end to the question by voting against the second reading of the Bill; but, if his views so eloquently put forward by his hon. Friend who had just sat down would induce them to get rid of this tax, they would not surely let 200,000*l.* stand in the way. The subject, however, would come before them again and again. If they, on the one hand, told him that, as Attorney General, he was bound to enforce the law, that must be done, but that would create such an outcry in the country that the matter must again and again be brought under the consideration of Parliament. They knew the extent of the loss, and they had two Chancellors of the Exchequer who had come forward and said that, although the country was at war, yet they thought that the finances were in a position to bear the loss. It therefore became a question whether, independent of financial considerations, they should put an end to this tax. There were some who thought the tax should be maintained to keep up the present high character of the press in this country. He did not think there was any soundness in that argument. He believed, on the contrary, that they would be doing a great public benefit by getting rid of the tax. Were those who upheld the present system prepared to prove that the remission of this tax would not be beneficial to the interests of the press itself? He thought those who advocated the proposition possessed a great advantage over the opposers, for they said, "This is a tax which prevents the diffusion of political information; it is stated it can be given up with safety to the finances of the country, therefore it ought to be got rid of, unless there are great commensurate evils, which, on the other hand, weigh against the benefits that would result from the remission of this tax, which stops the progress of knowledge." No one would be bold enough to say that it was desirable to keep the great mass of the people in ignorance. If there were any who were bold enough to avow that opinion, he trusted the House would receive such an avowal in a proper spirit. It was said that the abolition of the tax would diminish the character and influence of the present press, and would deteriorate the moral condition of the people, and that it would open a great door to slander. Now, in the first place, was it to be apprehended that they would so impair and deteriorate the character of the existing press that any amount of appreciable evil would result? The argument was, that the more they cheapened periodical publications the more the middle and lower classes would have recourse to the cheaper publications and abandon the dear ones, and the consequence would be that they would diminish thereby the means whereby the dearer publications obtained the information which they communicated, and commanded the eminent skill and ability which they employed. If he believed that the effect of this measure would be to lower the character of the press in this country, he should start with apprehension, but he had not heard one single argument which would cause him to believe it for a moment. Would any man believe that so long as they gave the same facilities for transmission through the Post Office, that The Times, or any of the great leading journals, would lose one single reader? No; the fact was, that the cheaper class of publications would call into existence a totally different class of readers, which would adapt themselves to the capacity,

pecuniary and intellectual, of the poorer classes, among whom the dearer publications did not go. No one would believe that a paper published at twopence or threepence could compete in information or ability with a paper that was published at a higher price; and the man who could afford to pay for the dearer commodity would continue to purchase it, and the dearer commodity would maintain its relative value. They would make other commodities cheaper, but the rich man always bought the best article; it was in the nature of things; but was that any reason why they should deny to the poorer man the article which alone he could procure? What right had they, in justice and in principle, to keep up the higher price of the commodity in which the rich man rejoices, and to prevent the poor man, who could not procure that commodity, from getting one adapted to his own means? Then it was said, and this was deserving of their most serious consideration, that they would not only deteriorate the efficiency of the existing press, but that they would produce a class of papers which would disseminate irreligious opinions, and slanderous and immoral articles. He did not believe it. He did not conceive such bad taste existed that publishers would find it to their interest to circulate such publications; but, if they did, the law was strong enough to control them, and it must be remembered that the proposition for doing away with the safeguards of securities and registration formed no integral part of the measure, and could be dispensed with. Why, the hon. Member for East Kent had stated how the improvement of the public press had gone on. But since when had this improvement taken place? Why, since the duty had been reduced from 4d. to 1d. The real truth was, that these were imaginary apprehensions, which sprung up in the minds of men naturally enough when they proposed to deal with existing things. It always had been so, and always would be so. When it was proposed to expose manufacturers to competition by admitting foreign productions, they were told that the British manufacturers would be annihilated. What was the result? That they prospered more than they had ever done. When it was proposed to do away with protection to agriculture, they were told that the agricultural interest, and all the interests that were inseparably bound up with it, would all perish together; but what had been the result? Let hon. Gentlemen opposite say. Again, they were told that if they abolished the navigation laws they would annihilate British shipping, and what had been the result? Let British shipowners say. He therefore did not believe that the great papers would suffer, or that the press would teem with blasphemous or libellous publications. Why, they were told by his hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire that the taste for libel and for slander was not in the poorer but the richer classes. The poorer classes wanted information which applied itself immediately to the circumstances in which they were placed, but the rich and the idle wanted the peppered spice, the condiment of intellectual depravity. The feeling of society was such, that whenever a libel on personal and private character arose there was no difficulty in inducing juries to convict and to give exemplary damages. The Satirist was annihilated by the repeated verdicts for damages that were obtained against it by individuals whose characters were traduced by libels. Such was the feeling of society that he undertook to say if such a paper was produced now it would not exist a month. Then, again, he said that this great question was ripe for solution, and he trusted the House would not adopt the view of the hon. Member for East Kent. An observation had been made on the subject of copyright. The law of copyright was strong now. He did not believe that the great newspapers of the day would be exposed to any more depreciation from their cheaper brethren than they were at the present moment. They were exposed now to depreciation on the part of the evening papers, and on the part of the weekly papers, but yet they did not find, practically, that the great journals had anything to complain of in this respect. Any information that came a day after, or a week after, or which it was necessary to condense or transform, could do no harm, and would not prejudice the paper it was taken from. It was true he had heard it said that if the tax were taken off it was possible some papers might be started to steal from the morning papers the reports of the debates and all the leading events of the day. He believed that if such a publication were likely to answer, the difference of a penny in the price of a paper would not prevent those who would engage in such an act from doing it now. But he was perfectly sure that if such an atrocious attempt at fraud and robbery were to be made by any person, or body of persons, on an action being brought the indignation of the jury at such an outrage would be so great, that they would give such damages as would at once put a stop to such a robbery. But if the law of copyright was not sufficient under the ordinary state of things to protect the great journals, it would be the duty, and he was sure it would be the inclination, of Parliament at once to make a law to render copyright more secure. He was sorry to have detained the House so long, but he was anxious to show the great difficulties which those who have to administer the law were placed in. He implored the House not, for the sake of getting rid of a momentary difficulty, to trifle with this question, but at once to come to a decision. It was perfectly monstrous that the law should continue in its present state. There were at the present moment, in addition to the newspapers to which he had called the attention of the House, others springing up by scores. The great interest excited in the public mind by the events of the war had called up newspapers devoted exclusively to that subject. They were assuredly class publications; but he had no hesitation in saying they were, in point of fact, political newspapers in every sense of the term, and against which he thought the law ought to be enforced. But they were in this difficulty, that at the very moment these newspapers were started the Government had determined to bring the matter before Parliament; and it would have been acting with extreme rigour if they had proceeded against these parties under such circumstances. The matter had stood over; but, on the other hand, it did not stand over with regard to other newspapers which did not pay the tax. They remonstrated and complained, and, he thought, with justice. It was right that that state of things should be done away with. The law must be enforced equally and uniformly; but then it was most difficult to enter on a career of prosecutions which would assume almost the character of persecutions when Parliament had in its hands the decision of this question. He would, therefore, most earnestly impress on the House that it ought not to delay a single moment in dealing with this question, which he considered was now ripe for solution.

listen to the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir B. Lytton) and to the hon. and learned Attorney General, and I certainly have never more admired their talent and the way in which they dwell upon a question than on the present occasion, but I am bound to say that I think neither of them has tonight at all met the objections which have been stated by the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Deedes). He stated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, by his own explanation, about to propose an arrangement by which there would be a loss to the revenue of 200,000*l.*, and that it would be his duty, if the Bill passed, to bring forward some tax to supply that deficiency in the revenue. The hon. Member for East Kent, therefore, reasonably enough, asks that you will not consider the question without reference to the alternative, and that, if some new tax is to be placed upon the country, it shall be open to the House to decide whether they will submit to the present evil in preference to that of the new tax which is to be substituted for it. If the country is so agitated upon this point as it is stated to be, and if there is that unanimous feeling of the inconvenience of the tax which is said to exist, I am surprised that hon. Gentlemen seem so anxious to get rid of the duty before we have the equivalent before us. I confess that that great anxiety upon their part creates a doubt in my mind whether they are satisfied that the country will receive the equivalent with quite so much pleasure as they seem to anticipate. Upon a former occasion, I stated that the course pursued with regard to the present Bill was unusual and irregular, not merely in point of form but in point of principle. It is the usual course, upon a question of the reduction of taxation, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell you that you should take a full and comprehensive view of your finances, and that before you proceed to apply any surplus, even which you may appear to have to dispose of, you should have the whole plan before you and know what you have got to spend. We only ask upon the present occasion that you should not go out of the usual course, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should do what his predecessors have invariably done, with one exception, an exception which I think should be a beacon for us to avoid rather than an example to follow—I allude to the reduction in the rates of postage. We reduced the postage duty under circumstances of great political difficulty, and I cannot help thinking that at that time it was a most unfortunate proceeding. But what have I heard to-day? I have heard denied to-day what was stated on that occasion. We were then told that it was a great moral question, and that we ought not to consider it as one of mere pounds, shillings, and pence. We were told that it was for the benefit of a large class of society, and the then Chancellor of the Exchequer was assured that we should lose nothing in point of revenue. I don't underrate the value of that measure; but if you place your finances, from time to time, under these pressures and struggles, and especially at periods when you have large demands upon you, the result may be a great inconvenience. I am not contending that a reduction of 200,000*l.* in your receipts must necessarily lead to any great financial difficulties; but if you once admit this sort of argument and reasoning to justify the course now proposed to be followed, you may, in a matter comparatively trifling, be breaking through a rule essential to the protection of your revenue, the result of which may be, that year after year hon. Gentlemen will bring forward measures for the reduction of taxation, on the plea that this is a great nation, that the reduction proposed is a very small matter, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have no difficulty in finding means to make up the deficiency that may be created. But this difficulty would always have to be encountered, and on the present occasion I see not in what way it can be met. I can only make a conjecture as to what course the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to pursue. If he is really and bond fide about to follow the principle laid down by his predecessor, and to raise for the services of the year by taxation a revenue for the year, I am afraid he will find that even 200,000*l.* is not a sum with which he can dispense—that he will want every sixpence—and that he is acting a rash part if he consents to sacrifice one farthing before he knows well what his position is. But there is another possibility. There is the possibility that you may have recourse to a loan. I am not going to enter into that question. It may be justifiable to leave to posterity a part of the expenditure of a war which you may on public grounds enter into. But if you relieve yourselves from taxes already existing, and, by means of a loan, make up the deficiency which that course of policy occasions, thereby leaving it to posterity not only to pay the expenses of your war, but also to pay for the taxation which you have repealed, I do not think anybody can doubt that that is not an honest or rightful course to pursue. I do not, therefore, consider the present proposition for reducing the amount of revenue is so light a matter as it has been assumed to be. It has been said by the hon. and learned Attorney General that great inconvenience must arise from the postponement of this measure till after the Easter vacation. But I venture to remind him that after all it is not so long before the Chancellor of the Exchequer will bring forward his budget. He will do so the first week after Easter, it now being a few days only before that period. The inconvenience and injustice which the hon. and learned Member suggests must result from that delay I believe he greatly exaggerates. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir B. Lytton) say that they are not surprised at the objections made by the press, or by the persons now engaged in conducting newspapers, to this measure; or that they should acquiesce so willingly in the tax now imposed upon them. But I must say, that when I come to look at the tax now imposed, and the mode in which it is raised, I do not think it a very extraordinary circumstance that those engaged in the newspaper trade should not raise any objection to it, or that they should not be unwilling that things should remain in their present state. Generally speaking, there have been no complaints in the trade that their interests have been neglected. When we look at the taxation of the country, we find that a large portion of the paper duty has been taken off, that the advertisement duty has been abolished, and that the stamp duty on newspapers itself has been reduced from 4*d.* to 1*d.*; therefore the course of the Legislature as regards the newspapers cannot greatly be complained of. Most generally persons connected with a trade affected by taxes are found to complain that the taxes are so heavy that they destroy the trade. Is that the case on the present occasion? Do you find the newspaper proprietors complaining that the tax imposed upon them is so heavy that their trade is interfered with by it? That is a complaint which cannot be made, and therefore cannot be urged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a reason for proposing the abolition of this tax. But there is one view of the question which has been carefully avoided by hon. Gentlemen, and that is that this penny stamp duty can hardly be called a tax. It is a compensation for a privilege enjoyed under a Post Office arrangement, and which privilege is paid for in the shape of a stamp. The Chancellor of the Exchequer considers that mode of conveyance of newspapers to be so great an advantage to all parties that he is still inclined to keep it up. Will the House, for a moment, reflect what is the payment made by these parties, and what are the privileges they obtain? The Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night stated that of the gross weight carried by the Inland Department of the Post Office, 76 per cent was composed of newspapers, and 9 per cent of mail bags, of which, of course, the newspapers had their share. I think, therefore, it may be near enough to the truth to say that 80 per cent of all the postal carriage of this country was newspapers, and those newspapers paying 1d. each. But this conveyance is not confined to inland communication. Take your Colonies. I asked, the other day, at the Post Office, what a newspaper cost going to Australia, and the answer was that it was free of all postage. It is stated by the present Resolutions that they should be allowed to go to the Colonies for 2d. Now, when we come to consider that this stamp has the power of circulating and recirculating a newspaper throughout the country for 1d., and for a small additional sum throughout the Colonies, my own impression is that the charge is by no means an unfair equivalent for the postage. You pay for the conveyance of mails (and in this statement I throw out of consideration all the costs of the establishment of porters, sorters, and letter carriers); but you pay for the conveyance of letters in this country 693,000*l.*, and for the packet service 792,000*l.*, being about 1,500,000*l.* for mere conveyance. When we come to consider that the newspapers pay a sum of 400,000*l.* in stamps, I must say, remembering that upwards of 80 per cent of the weight carried consist of newspapers, that it is by no means a bad bargain for them, and the newspapers receive more than a full equivalent for the stamp duty which they pay. If you take the whole expense of your Post Office and packet service it amounts to 2,430,000*l.* The sum you receive is 1,208,000*l.*, so that about half the expense is a loss; and the sum paid by the newspapers towards  $\text{ }^{\circ}$  1,208,000*l.* is not 500,000*l.* When

1. Gentlemen talk to me of taxing

thought, and of taxing conveyance of information, my answer is, that the Post Office is open for the conveyance of information both at home and abroad at a cheap rate; and that we give you a great deal more in the shape of conveyance than you give in the shape of a tax. The hon. and learned Attorney General has made out a very grave case about the difficulties of the present state of the law on this subject. He has stated that there are only two courses to be taken on this question; either to prosecute parties according to the present law, or to repeal the stamp duty. It is very odd, but this is the first time in my life that I have heard that there was not a third course. I must say, without presuming to possess the ingenuity of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I should have thought that there was a third course, which was not to leave the law in its present state, as a net spread to catch every publication which it was possible to bring within its meshes, but to cause some better definition of what is and what is not a newspaper. The law was very strict. It was liberally construed. It was from that relaxation probably that most of the difficulties had arisen. I could hardly venture to give an opinion if the hon. and learned Gentleman had told me he had considered it, but if it has not crossed his mind I think I may suggest he might, like the Chancellor of the Exchequer, have consulted Punch, or any common-sense newspaper editor, and they would have helped him as to what, in the present state of public opinion, and of the law, might be considered as a newspaper. The hon. and learned Gentleman has argued this matter as if this were really a settlement of the question, and undoubtedly, if that were so, something might be said in favour of this Bill. But is it a settlement of the question, I ask? I find two clauses which still give newspapers certain privileges. Now, if my hon. and learned Friend is unable to say what is a newspaper, will he tell me how to construe those clauses? It is quite true the power is given to the Postmaster General to allow all newspapers to be transmitted to the Colonies. But if the Postmaster General comes and asks the hon. and learned Gentleman what is a newspaper, to be consistent he must say, the definition of a newspaper is of such a nature that he cannot act upon it, and consequently the same question again arises under those clauses. But that is not all. Two of the most eloquent supporters of the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. Gibson) who is the leader of this movement, both tell us it will be unsatisfactory to them unless there is some law of copyright. I must say, then, if the matter is to be settled, the Attorney General ought to tell us either that it is impossible to settle the question of copyright, or that, accompanying the Bill there is some arrangement with regard to copyright. I am not inclined to enter into the subject of the moral effect of the law. I hope, if the Bill passes, it may produce all the good which is anticipated from it. We must remember, however, this—that we have the result of the entire freedom of newspapers in a country not very dissimilar to our own, and I observed that the right hon. Gentleman opposite, when he came to speak of the press of America, was extremely careful not to give his opinion as to the state of the American press. The right hon. Gentleman did not say one word about the blessings of the untaxed press of America. Probably, as an Englishman, it is unfair for me to give an opinion on that matter; but, while we have heard in this House the press of America stated to be a great blessing, we have heard it stated by Americans that they considered it anything but a blessing to that country. I therefore think, upon every ground, there is no such strong and pressing necessity as would make this a tax which we ought first to abolish. If there were a great surplus of revenue it might then be considered. But, whether there is a surplus revenue or not, I still contend for the principle that you ought not to take off taxation unless at the same time you can show the means by which to make up the deficiency you create, and if the Motion comes to a division, I shall certainly vote for the Amendment.

MR. PACKE said, he did not despair of obtaining the vote of the hon. and learned Attorney General for the postponement of the Bill, because towards the close of his speech the hon. and learned Gentleman said, unless some great financial difficulty were in the way, he recommended the House to pass the second reading. He thought, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir F. Baring) who had filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, there had been reasons given against surrendering 200,000*l.* until they knew from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the financial state of the country. The whole question before the House had been completely lost sight of in what fell from his hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir B. Lytton) and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. The proposition of the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Deedes) was simply to postpone the measure for a certain time, that they might see whether they could part with the money which the Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipated he would lose. No one listened with more thorough admiration than he did to the eloquent speeches of the hon. Member for Hertfordshire; but the House was led away by the proposition of his hon. Friend, that the dissemination of intelligence ought to be free from taxation. That might be true or false, but the Bill before the House did not profess to abolish taxes on newspapers. It only rendered newspapers free of taxes to a certain portion of the population, and he believed the English farmer would, almost without exception, be deprived of the privilege accorded to the rest of the community. In the towns through which a railway passed the readers would receive their newspapers tax free, but he contended that the great mass of the population did not congregate in towns, and that persons in the country would still have to pay the tax, from which the inhabitants of towns would be exempt. The operation of the Bill, therefore, would be extremely partial, and consequently he did not agree in the argument, however eloquently expressed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire and the Attorney General, that it was a measure which would relieve political intelligence from taxation. They were not arguing whether the Bill should be read a second time or not, but whether it should be postponed until after the financial statement, and he thought that proposition so reasonable that he felt some astonishment that the Government did not accede to it.

MR. MIALL said, as one of the very few Members of that House who were connected with the press, he would venture to entreat their indulgence for a few moments while he made one or two observations on the Bill then under discussion. Upon former occasions when the question had been brought forward he had contented himself by giving a silent vote, and he should not have troubled the House then but for the course taken by a considerable and influential portion of the newspaper press of this country, in opposition not merely to the details but to the very principles of the two Bills which had been brought in by two successive Chancellors of the Exchequer. He was very anxious to disclaim all those fears which seemed to be entertained, and which had been expressed by Members of his fraternity, as to the damaging effect which this measure would have on the existing public press. He was still more anxious to disclaim most strongly and emphatically any concurrence in, or sympathy with, the reasons which had been put forward as the grounds of opposition to the measure. He could see nothing in those reasons but the argument always brought forward by those who advocated protective interests whenever threatened with unrestricted competition. The penny stamp appeared to be assumed to be the palladium of the respectability of the newspaper press. Remove that stamp, it was said, and the dignity, the intellectual and moral superiority of the newspaper press will be speedily swept away, and there will be an inundation of libellous and blasphemous publications. Under the existing system, said the proprietors of newspapers, we discharge our duties in a manner satisfactory to the public; and let well alone. He must say, that he quite shared the amazement expressed by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire in his brilliant speech at such statements. Perhaps the House would remember the violent sarcasms which the newspaper press had hurled against the producers of corn, who, under cover of similar pretences, had sought to retain a protective impost. Then the press of the country dwelt upon the wickedness of enhancing the price of bread by fiscal regulations, and they even suggested that the public ought to look with suspicion upon the arguments used by the owners of land, because they were personally interested in the question at issue. Now, however, that the newspaper press was placed in a similar position, it was not above reproducing, without a blush, those very arguments which it at one time was in the habit of treating with scoffing and indignation. He himself, as a Member of that House, connected with the press, could not have remained content had he not at once taken the opportunity of washing his hands of all participation in what appeared to him to be great selfishness and inconsistency. If newspaper proprietors wished to retain the facility of transmitting their papers by the post, there was nothing in the present measure to deprive them of that advantage; but when scarcely one-tenth of the papers published passed through the post, why should nine-tenths of the readers of papers pay for a contingent service which was never required? The real fact was, that the penny stamp upon every copy of a paper published was a protection to proprietors against the competition of cheaper publications, and that such was the case many newspaper proprietors were indiscreet enough or candid enough to avow. It was not necessary for him to enter into any vindication of the general policy which had been adopted by this country with regard to the diffusion of information on all points, for he believed there was scarcely a Member of that House who would deny the importance of giving the public as much information as possible of a social, civil, and moral character. It had been agreed by a majority of that House, that it was a matter of public policy that education should be diffused at the public expense, and also that the quality of the education should be improved. It was not to be confined simply to reading, writing, and arithmetic, but was also to embrace history and geography; and what history was more likely to be studied than the history of the occurrences of the day, or what geography so attractive as that associated with the events now passing? After the House, then, had resolved upon stimulating the intellectual appetite of the people of this country, would it, he would inquire, deprive them of intellectual food? It was a fact that of adults who were unable to read more than one-half were in that condition, not from never having been to school, but because, after leaving school, they had met with nothing to tempt them to the exercise of the faculty they had acquired, and that faculty had died from pure inanition. Perhaps the House was not fully aware of the extent to which the existing stamp caused a repression of information. Looking at the return of the number of newspapers issued during the last year, he found that, with regard to the metropolitan press, the total number of copies of daily newspapers issued was 26,450,955, giving in round numbers an average of about 85,000 a day. That number divided among the population of the country would give one paper to every 320 persons, or, divided solely among the population of England and Wales, would give one only to every 200 persons. If he next looked at the weekly metropolitan papers, there was a more favourable result. The total number of copies of them issued in 1854 was a little upwards of 32,000,000; the average weekly circulation was 620,000. This, divided among the population of England and Wales, would be about one in twenty-nine; namely, out of every thousand persons, about thirty-five would be found to take in a metropolitan weekly paper; and supposing there were six readers of every copy, then 800 out of every 1,000 would be found to go without reading a metropolitan weekly paper at all. What was done in the counties? In the West Riding of Yorkshire there were thirty weekly papers published, and the population was about 1,800,000. The weekly circulation of all the local papers was 73,000; so that only one in twenty-four of the population took in some local paper, and rather more than three-fourths of the inhabitants did not read any paper at all. In the county of Kent there were fifteen papers published, and while the population was 490,000, the average weekly circulation of the papers was 72,000, giving one newspaper subscriber only to every sixty-eight of the inhabitants. He might carry the calculation farther, but it was enough to show the great want there was of a cheaper means of diffusing political knowledge. Another fact was, that four-fifths of the non-subscribers, both of the daily and local papers, saw them at the public-houses. Thus the Legislature threw a temptation to habits of intemperance in the way of every intelligent young man in the country. But they were told the country was satisfied with the law as it now stood. But the House heard nothing of the feelings of the country except through the medium of the proprietors of newspapers. They pretended to be the mouth-piece of the satisfaction of the public, but he warned hon. Members against being led astray by the representations of the local papers, lest when they got upon the hustings they should find that their opposition to this Bill had given mortal offence to the liberal electors. One fact was sufficient to show the necessity of a change in the law. The desire for information had actually burst the bounds of the present law, and to this circumstance it was owing that successive Chancellors of the Exchequer had brought forward a measure on the subject. It was strongly argued that a deterioration in the character of the existing press would follow from the adoption of this Bill. It was assumed that we should be deluged with cheap publications of a light and blasphemous character, and that our newspapers would be assimilated to those of the United States. If he thought that the Bill would be followed by any deterioration of the British press he owned it would make him pause. He entertained a great respect for the daily and weekly press. For some years it was his duty to read all the organs of the daily press, many of the weekly journals, and from fifty to sixty local papers, and he was persuaded that not even in that House of Parliament was there a more steady and brilliant reflection of the manly intellect of the British people. With some defects, but taking the press as a whole, for intellectual power, promptitude, and vigour, nothing like it had ever existed either in ancient or modern times, and it would be a great calamity if anything should be done seriously to damage the character of the British newspapers. But was there any danger of such a result? Not the slightest. Every new journal would form a fresh circle of readers, and every paper would circulate in the same sphere as previously. There would be no competition between the highest and lowest class newspapers, the only difference between them being that they would circulate in entirely different spheres. The apprehension of piracy was a mere delusion. The difficulties in the way of speedy circulation would prevent piracy from being practised as a system and to any extent. Perhaps, in the transition state to a better system there might be some danger and inconvenience to existing journals, but he had unlimited and unwavering faith that the adoption of this, as well as all other measures of free trade, would be productive, not only of a great increase of production, but of a great improvement in the article. He believed that, if this Bill passed, there would be such an application of the resources of the press as to astound and delight even the most sanguine advocates of the present measure.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he rose under the painful sensation of holding opinions very different to those he had heard expressed on both sides of the House. He was perfectly conscious of addressing a body of the most devout idolaters, and he was conscious, also, that they would not like to have their idol examined, or, to use the figure of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir B. Lytton), in the course of his eloquent speech, their idol was a ghost which they would not like to have looked at. It was his firm opinion that the press, in its present state, instead of being the greatest glory and advantage to the country, was one of our greatest curses. These speeches, these panegyrics of a free press, would have been very valiant in the days of the Tudors, or even of the Stuarts, but everybody knew that the majority of them were base adulation of a power which the speakers were afraid of and dare not resist; and the writers in the press, who were the best judges themselves, boasted and said plainly that they were the true directors of the policy of the country, and that the Gentlemen who condescended to sit on the Ministerial bench and receive salaries had only been recorders of the decisions of the press. Well, the press ought to know their own business best, and for that reason he believed The Times, and three or four other newspapers of that kind, when they said that this Bill was a personal attack upon them, and that the standard of the press, such as it was, if this measure was allowed to pass, would be materially lowered. Now, he must confess that he was of that opinion too. People talked of this press as being the means by which the country was instructed. No wonder, then, the country was so ill-instructed. Then it was said that it was from the press we should study history, and he had been told not long ago by hon. Members sitting above him that it was more worth while to read a page of The Times than to read the whole of Thucydides. The truth of the matter was, that this was all cant and nonsense; the press was a mercantile speculation, and nothing else. He wanted to know why it should not be so. He wanted to know why Messrs. Walter and their families should not set up a manufactory of gossip just as well as the hon. Gentleman near him should set up a manufactory of calico? You must suit your manufactures in different countries according to the tastes of the public. In Rome, for instance, people occupied themselves in manufacturing antiquities. Well, nobody cared much for antiquities in this country. In Munich, again, they used to carry on a great manufacture of old medals. That would not do here, either, though, if somebody were to set up a manufactory of old china, that might turn out a good speculation just now. Upon the whole, however, the taste of the English people was for gossip—political gossip—and political gossip of one sort or another they must have, cost what it might. The Times seemed to him to carry on their business in this way better than any other people, and that was the reason, perhaps, why they were now attacked. It was not a very long time ago since this newspaper was set up. The first person belonging to it, whom he remembered, was a Mr. Tucker, and then after that came a great number of very clever men, because, of course, the Walter family could not carry on the whole thing themselves, and there was always a man of that accommodating class—a seven years' barrister, or some one of that stamp, who was ready to take up anything. These people, these barristers, reminded him a good deal of what they called on board a ship a "handy Billy"—a tackle that came in upon all occasions whenever it was wanted. There were since then Barnes, Alsager, Stirling, Delane, Morris, Lowe, Dasent, and others. Well, why should they not write? But why was it that when you heard these Gentlemen speak (and there was one of them in that House whom he was always delighted to hear), they then never frightened or alarmed you, but on the contrary, you were always excessively amused and instructed, whereas, when they used that dreadful "We" everybody was terrified, and looked upon them as most awful men. The press, in fact, frightened us with its editorial "We." Observe the art of this. These Gentlemen were all of different opinions. Now, the foolish papers who did not understand the matter, like The Morning Chronicle, for instance, took up with some particular party. One was a Peelite; another something else. When the Peelite party was thriving, the paper thrrove too, but when the Peelites went down, down went the paper. It was quite clear these were not men of business. The thing was to get a set of Gentlemen of different opinions, and to set them writing. Of course you could accuse no one man of inconsistency; he might always have held the same opinions; and so, individually, these writers were most consistent, while, collectively, nothing in the world could be more inconsistent. It seemed to him that the very perfection of journalism was—individual honesty and collective profligacy, political and literary. There was, nevertheless, a great advantage in this, and The Times newspaper always put him very much in mind of a bit of bog he had near a farm of his. He once thought of draining it, and asked the opinion of the farmer, who replied, "No, no! don't drain it. In wet weather there's something for the cow, and if there's nothing for the cow, there's something for the pig, and if there's nothing for the pig, there's something for the goose." So it was with The Times, if there was nothing in it for one man, there was sure to be something for another. There was, however, one very great evil, which he did think the House ought to have the manliness to contend with, and that was the present lawless system of libelling. This was carried to a most outrageous extent, and, so far from thinking the press better than it was, he believed, as far as his experience went, it was much worse. He never had any acquaintance that he knew of with the editor of a newspaper, but he was once obliged to go to the late Mr. Perry, who had it in his power utterly to ruin a friend of his. Mr. Perry had a letter in his hand which he was to have published the next day, and the publication of which would have been most detrimental to his friend, but, upon requesting him not to make it known, Mr. Perry in the most liberal and gentlemanly way, promised not to publish a single word of it. He (Mr. Drummond) therefore always had pleasure in bearing testimony to the kindness of Mr. Perry, and to his behaviour upon that occasion. But instances of the libelling to which he referred were without end; they were of daily occurrence, although people did not get to know all the cases. For example, his hon. Friend the Member for Launceston (Mr. Percy) brought forward the other day a most gross and most circumstantial libel upon a Dr. Meyer, who was described as a worthless, ignorant German, who knew nothing at all, and who was merely put into office because he flattered Prince Albert. This turned out to be a gross lie from beginning to end. Dr. Meyer was an Englishman, had received a good English education, and had never seen Prince Albert in his life. A circumstance happened with regard to a relation of his own the other day. In the course of his evidence before the Sebastopol Committee of the House of Commons, Lord Lucan said that the Commissariat sent out a parcel of ignorant boys, and on being pressed to give the names, he mentioned the name of Mr. Murray, the son of the Bishop of Rochester. At the end of his evidence he spoke of this same young man, and said how well he behaved and how well he had fulfilled his duties.

Well, the first part of this evidence was inserted next day, but the second never was, and when he (Mr. Drummond) sent by Mr. Macdonald, a message to The Times, saying how unfair it was, they never made a single word of explanation, nor did they make any contradiction until Lord Lucan himself wrote to the newspapers to do so. A letter in his possession spoke of the admirable manner in which this young man had behaved, how, in some cases, he had personally distributed the provisions in order that the men might not be kept waiting; and, when remonstrated with for undertaking so degrading an office, he replied, that the only way to receive or to impart instruction in the duties of his office was first to perform them himself, and that he was not afraid of degrading himself by showing how the subordinate duties of the office ought to be discharged. The same thing happened with regard to Lord Balgonie, against whom some asperion was directed, and the remark was revived that our soldiers were fighting under the cold shade of the aristocracy, whereas his general said he was one of the best officers he ever had. Then there was the case of a friend of his, whose trial he attended last year. The Times attacked him most shamefully for a long time, and upon the trial his justification came out, but while they published the whole of the first day's proceedings, which aggravated his offence, they never published his justification. These cases were occurring every day. The newspapers were accused of being bribed, but that seemed to him one of the most absurd charges that ever was made. Why did they set up shops except to sell their goods? Of course they took that which happened to be the popular side of the day. They did not want to guide public opinion, they wanted to follow it; and whatever the cry of the day was they repeated it. They did this on the trial of Queen Caroline. The Times first advocated one side, and then finding that the mob, who were not inclined to argue the merits of the case, took the woman's side, round went The Times and took the woman's side also. Well, there was no harm in that. The only harm in it was that people were apt to fancy that this paper was the guide and teacher of the public. At the same time they hated it, and they hated it the more because it was the very best of its kind. As to the bribery of newspapers there was positive proof respecting The Times of which

Napoleon said, "You have sent me The Times—that infamous Times, the journal of the Bourbons"—and it was stated in a work by Mr. O'Meara that 6,000*f.* had been paid for the supply of 100 copies a month. He had found the receipt for the money, signed by the editor. Mr. O'Meara also stated that several offers had been received from the editors of newspapers, and among others from The Times, to write for Napoleon before he went to Elba. Napoleon declined to accept the offers made to him, but afterwards regretted the course he took, observing that he would not have been so hated by the English people had he accepted the offers made to him, for in England the newspapers forced public opinion. The real evil of these newspapers was their insolence of language. They used language which they would never think of using if it did not suit their purpose—if they did not find Ministers tremble before them—and if they did not find Ministers not ruling the country, and governing the country, but suffering themselves to be 'driven into war by the language of The Times. The Times the other day remarked, in reference to a remark of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright)—

"If he means to intimate that notwithstanding injustice we are successful, he is certainly right. We are so, and as long as we discharge the duties which the empire and the world expect at our hands, we trust to continue so."

That was all very good; but then came another passage in which The Times offered an opinion upon the present state of affairs in the Crimea—

"The position of the allied army is precisely one of which a bold and original military genius might take advantage to retrieve the fortunes of the campaign."

Such an opinion would scarcely be given by any number of lawyers in Lincoln's Inn; but, nevertheless, it was volunteered by the lawyers of Printing House Square. The whole thing was absurd. In short The Times said, with the old sign of the public house on the road to Acton—

"We are the old magpie on the right,
The other has set up in spite."

We may chatter black one day and white another; we have the only right to chatter, and we are the only teachers of the world and the empire.

MR. DUFFY said, he felt it his duty, as an Irish journalist, to explain why he was prepared to support the measure now before the House. Since he had held a seat in Parliament he had never missed an opportunity of voting in favour of the removal of all taxes upon knowledge, and he felt that in supporting the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was supporting a measure that would confer a great benefit upon the country. In Ireland the masses of the people, having the political power to send Members to that House, never saw a newspaper at all under the present system, and it appeared to him to be a very bad arrangement that political power should exist without political knowledge to counterbalance it. He was not indifferent to the effect which the proposed change might have on existing newspapers; but his opinion was, that the best of those journals were not what the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) had called them; and still less what the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) had described them—mere mercantile speculations, the best of the existing journals not merely had newspapers to sell, but had opinions to promulgate, and though the hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the whole of the existing newspapers, and especially the more marked and capable among them, were of necessity to be bought and sold, he might tell the hon. Gentleman that a journalist had duties which were not less responsible than those of any Member of that House, and was quite as careful how he discharged them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated the loss to the revenue of removing the newspaper stamp at about 250,000*l.*, but it must be remembered that that quarter of a million was now in a great measure taken from parties who got no return for the money, the stamp being charged in many cases for the postage of a newspaper, which never went through the post at all. One objection to the Bill was, that it proposed no securities against libel, and he thought that objection ought to be removed, as, without some protection, libellers were likely to swarm. It was also urged that the effect of the measure in cheapening the price of newspapers would lower the character of the press of this country. That objection, however, could be met by referring to the case of other countries where papers were published at a low price, and contained a carefully selected epitome of news, without pandering in the least to low tastes. With regard to the objection, that the Bill would create a class of publications which would be addressed only to the lower orders, he confessed that that was one great reason why he gave the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman his support. He was most anxious so see the lower classes of society more particularly addressed than they were under the present system. The last reason given by some journalists for the maintenance of the present law was, that under the new system journals would spring up which would come into collision with the authorities, but he could not see the force of the objection, for if such a collision should occur, the new journals could fight it out with the Government, and the old ones would not suffer. In conclusion, he would entreat the House not to adjourn the question, as it would be very inconvenient to a large number of persons to leave it in its present unsettled state.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I do not accuse my hon. Friend the Member for East Kent of any intention to make a factious Motion, or of being influenced by motives of party opposition, or of endeavouring by means of the Amendment which he has submitted to the House to achieve a party or political triumph, nor should I have had any difficulty in acceding to it if I could have brought myself to look upon this question as exclusively, or even principally, a financial question. When I introduced the measure I was under the impression that I was giving effect to the declared and recorded opinion of the House in the Session of 1854. Let me call the attention of the House to the words of that Resolution—

"That it is the opinion of this House that the Laws in reference to the Periodical Press and Newspaper Stamp are ill defined, and unequally enforced; and it appears to this House that the subject demands the early consideration of Parliament."

Now, it is important to observe the time when this Resolution was agreed to. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) made his second financial statement, proposing an addition of 10,000,000*l.* of taxation for the expenditure of the war on the 8th of May last, and on the 16th of May my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) moved and carried this Resolution. The House, therefore, passed the Resolution with a full knowledge that a great war expenditure was to be met by increased taxation, and passed it within a few days after the statement to that effect had been made, with the impression of the fact fresh upon their minds. If, therefore, the financial objection had pressed upon the House last Session as strongly as it now seems to weigh with hon. Members opposite, it is clear that the Resolution could not then have been carried. But an attempt has been made upon the opposite side to throw doubt on the meaning of the Resolution. Abstract Resolutions upon questions of finance are open to objection, and I regret that my right hon. Friend did not move some specific plan in a Committee of Ways and Means instead of leaving us to dispute as to the precise meaning he intended to convey; but it appears to me that no reasonable doubt can exist as to the meaning of this resolution. As in the case of an oath which is construed secundum animum imponentis, so a Motion must be construed according to the intent and meaning of the person who makes it. My right hon. Friend was Chairman of the Committee which reported that news was not a proper object for taxation, and in introducing his Motion he fully stated his views to the House, which were inimical to the continuance of the newspaper stamp. After hearing his opinions and his arguments the House assented to his Motion. Can there be any doubt that when that Motion was carried it was understood to imply a relaxation of the law? Can any one doubt that it was a virtual condemnation and repeal, as far as a Resolution could repeal it, of the newspaper stamp? The Resolution, by its very terms, implies that the law was to be altered. Will any one in this House have the hardihood to maintain that it could mean that the law should be rendered more stringent and severe? If, then, the law was to be altered, and it was not to be rendered more stringent or severe, what meaning could the resolution have but that the law should be relaxed? and how could it be relaxed in any other manner than by rendering the stamp not compulsory but optional? For the reasons I have stated I believed that in introducing this measure I was giving effect to the distinct and declared opinion of the House in its last Session. If it should please the House to recede from their determination—if they should now change their opinion and depart from that Resolution—let them, by distinctly rejecting the Bill, not by acceding to the dilatory Motion proposed by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Deedes), but by voting for a Motion that it be read a second time in six months, simply rescind the Resolution, and so place the Government in a clear and intelligible position with respect to the administration of the law. If you reject the second reading of the Bill, in what position will the Government stand with respect to those publications, the nature of which has been so fully and ably explained by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General? Do you propose to legalise class publications? Will anybody undertake to define the precise difference between class newspapers and other newspapers? It has been found difficult enough to define a newspaper in its extended sense, and will any one lay down such a definition as would satisfy Judges and jurymen? Will any one with metaphysical minuteness draw a line for practical purposes between class and other newspapers? If that task is to be imposed upon the Government, I trust that some Gentleman who has supported the Amendment will give us the benefit of his valuable advice as to the proper definition to be laid down. Is the Attorney General to prosecute some 150 newspapers which have hitherto received the indulgence of the Government, which have grown up under a permission not sanctioned by the letter of the law, but which has induced proprietors to embark their capital in extensive literary and commercial enterprises? They have formed large connections with classes of customers and of readers through the long-continued toleration of the Government, known to the public, known to this House, and not censured or objected to by the House; and are they suddenly to find themselves the objects, or, as it might be said with truth, the victims, of ex officio prosecutions, and to be at once deprived of the privilege they have so long enjoyed? If that is the course to which the Government is to be driven, I trust the House will distinctly signify its opinion by the rejection of the Bill, and not by the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Kent. I will not attempt to travel over the general topics which have been so ably illustrated and almost exhausted in the eloquent, and not more eloquent than argumentative, speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir B. Lytton). It would be arrogance in me to enter into the various topics to which he referred, and I will only advert to one of the points he so copiously illustrated; I mean that of the great alarm which appears to have seized both the metropolitan and the provincial press from the proposed abolition of the stamp duty. The metropolitan press appears to think that when the penny stamp is removed it will be ruined by the provincial press; the provincial press, on the other hand, believes that it will be ruined by the London press; and both the London and provincial press believe they will be ruined by some possible press which has not yet been called into existence. Now, I confess that I cannot but regard all such fears as fears inspired by imagination rather than by reason and by examination into futurity founded upon facts and experience. Let us only consider what has been the effect of reducing the stamp duty from 4d. to 1d. Surely that reduction must have affected the interests of the great newspapers more than the removal of the last penny can affect them; and yet we know by experience that the newspapers with a large circulation, both in the metropolis and in the provinces, rather derived benefit than suffered injury from that reduction of the stamp duty. They are in possession of the market, they have the command of capital, they have an established connection, they are known to the public as the chief channels for advertisements, and they must unquestionably enter the new field of competition which will be opened to them with much greater advantages than any new competitors can possess. It will doubtless be expected that I should say something with respect to the financial aspect of this question, which has received so much attention during the debate. I am not about to deny that the estimated loss of 200,000*l.* a year is a material circumstance for the consideration of this House. Nevertheless, in the construction of the financial plan which it will be my duty to submit to the House immediately after the Easter recess, allowance will be made for the loss of revenue that will be thus occasioned, and Her Majesty's Government will, upon their responsibility, propose such a scheme of finance as will provide amply for the expenditure of the year, including the loss which may be occasioned by the repeal of the newspaper stamp duties. Whatever risk may exist of such a sacrifice of revenue, the Government, with the full knowledge that that reduction is to be provided for, upon their responsibility, have proposed this measure to the House. The sum of 200,000*l.*, which I have mentioned, is the estimate made by the Post-office authorities, not assuredly upon very certain data, but upon the best which the subject admits of obtaining. That estimate does not include any allowance for an increase in the paper duty. The paper duty now produces about 1,000,000*l.* a year, and certainly, if the anticipations of which we hear, that the country will be inundated with new newspapers, should receive a verification to any perceptible degree, we may calculate upon some considerable increase of the paper duty. I do not myself venture to give any estimate of the increase of the paper duty. I merely state that the estimate of the loss of 200,000*l.*, which I laid before the House, does not include any allowance for the increase in the paper duty. There is another point which has been adverted to by more than one hon. Member as affording the means, in some respect, of supplying the loss occasioned by the abolition of the compulsory stamp—I mean a cheap book post—a charge of postage for printed publications, not being periodical publications, not coming within the terms of the Bill now upon the table, but which would at present be subjected to the letter rates of postage. Having conferred with the Postmaster General on this portion of the subject, I can state that, in case this Bill should receive the sanction of Parliament, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared, by a Treasury Warrant, to introduce a book postage at lower rates than the scale now existing. The lowest rate of the present book postage is 6*d.* for one pound weight. That rate of postage was established by a Treasury warrant. It is proposed to amend that Treasury warrant, so that it may include a lower scale of rates; facilities will thus be given for the transport of books and printed matter at a cheap rate, and it is anticipated that this change may lead to some considerable augmentation of the Post Office revenue. This is an arrangement which can be carried into effect by the warrant of the Lords of the Treasury, for, as it involves a mere variation of the existing rates of book postage, it does not require the sanction of an Act of Parliament. Having thus explained the financial portion of the question, I shall leave this Bill in the hands of the House, only pressing upon them this consideration, that it is most important, not upon financial grounds, but with reference to the recorded Resolution of this House, for the purpose of maintaining the consistency of the House and of its proceedings, and also for the purpose of putting an end to a most anomalous and unconstitutional state of the law, and to perpetual scandals which consequently arise, that the House should pronounce a clear opinion upon this Bill; that they should either read it a second time this evening or reject it; and that they should not accede to the unmeaning, the useless, and the dilatory Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Kent.

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has founded the course he recommends the House to pursue upon a principle which in practice he would find it very difficult to maintain. I understand from him, that he finds it not so much upon those great principles of policy which have been so eloquently advocated by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, (Sir B. Lytton) and with great ability by other members of the House, as upon the principle that the recorded opinion of the House upon this subject is, in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, a fact of such gravity and importance that it is impossible for him, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to resist an intimation so precise and definite. Now, Sir, how can this principle be maintained in practice? Has it always been—I may almost say has it ever been—the principle adopted by Chancellors of the Exchequer, that they should, as a matter of course, assume a vote of this House, with respect to a particular tax, as an indication which cannot be mistaken, and as a sanction of a course which cannot be relinquished by the Government; and that the policy or expediency of repealing a tax, and the proper time for taking such a step—the question before us to-night—are to be omitted from all future discussion? Now, what is the fact? Why, in 1853, only two Sessions ago, the subject of what are called Taxes on Knowledge was before this House, and a Resolution for the abolition of the advertisement duty was carried by a large majority; but the Government did not on that occasion express their opinion that that vote was final on the question, nor did the Government think proper to act upon that vote. Have we not had the malt-tax repealed by a vote of the House of Commons before this, and were we then told by the Minister that, as a matter of course, it was the duty of the Government immediately to propose the repeal of that tax in consequence of the vote which this House had adopted? On the contrary, were we not reminded the other night by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) that a former colleague of his, the late Sir Robert Peel, had to his honour resisted the vote of the House of Commons upon that subject, and that he had successfully called upon the House to rescind it? Why, Sir, I remember a vote of this House for rescinding the sugar duties being carried against a powerful Government, but were the sugar duties abolished by the Minister of the day in consequence of that vote? No; on that occasion he called upon the House to rescind the Resolution at which it had arrived. But what happened in our very recent experience with respect to the vote of this House on the subject of attorneys' certificates. A vote for abolishing the duty was adopted by a large majority—a greater majority than has ever voted for the repeal of the taxes immediately under discussion to-night; but did the Chancellor of the Exchequer then come forward and say that, in consequence of the vote of the House of Commons, he felt it incumbent upon the Government to propose the repeal of the attorneys' certificate duty? Why, Sir, that duty is actually not repealed at this moment. You have had financial reform, you have had the revision of taxation, you have had the whole question of taxation considered in every possible light, and yet you have not got the duty on attorneys' certificates repealed although you had repeated votes on the subject and large majorities in favour of the motion. But, now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in vindication of himself, not for proposing the repeal of these taxes on introducing his financial statement to the House, but in vindication of his proposing the repeal of a tax before the House is favoured with his financial scheme, or knows what substitute he is going to recommend—lays it down as a proposition which cannot be controverted, and as a principle of action which the Government adopts, that the moment the House has consented by its vote to the repeal of a tax, it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to act in conformity with that vote. I certainly connot agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon that point, for I remember very well the arguments that were used by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford with respect to the repeal of the attorneys' certificate duty. That right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) then said, that it was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not only to hear arguments in favour of the particular proposition then before the House, but also to hear arguments in favour of the repeal of any other taxes which the House might think ought to be abolished, in order that he might avail himself of the information he could obtain from such discussions in framing his financial scheme. The right hon. Gentleman argued against being called on to give any opinion on the part of the Government before the introduction of their financial scheme; and the right hon. Gentleman then said—

"If it be acknowledged that it is the privilege of the House of Commons to propose the repeal of one tax after another by a majority, and so dictate to the Chancellor of the Exchequer what shall be the financial policy of which he is to be the organ in this House, what, I want to know, is the use of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?" I say, then, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer's position to-night is founded on that principle, I shall have to say to him, "What is the use of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?" I shall feel it my duty, Sir, to support the hon. Member for East Kent in the proposition which he has made. It is not a proposition which at all enters into the general merits of the question. When we are favoured with the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he feel himself justified in offering a proposition to the House with respect to newspaper stamps, I shall listen to that proposition without prejudice; but I think there is no proposition that can be made at this moment that recommends itself to the House by arguments of more unanswerable reason, than that at this moment, when we are, according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the very verge and threshold of the budget, we should not be called on to repeal a tax when the right hon. Gentleman will not, and possibly cannot, tell us what is the compensation to be afforded to the revenue for the tax we are going to repeal, and what is the substitute which we are to be asked to impose. The right hon. Gentleman has, indeed, stated to the House to-night that the Government have a scheme in which they have perfect confidence that will make up for the loss the revenue will sustain in consequence of the repeal of the newspaper stamp duty. No doubt the Government have full confidence in their project; but has the House of Commons confidence in the project of the Government? It may be doubtful whether we shall have confidence in that project when we are asked to give it; but to ask us to have confidence in what the right hon. Gentleman does not descend to communicate to us, is to exact somewhat too much from the trust of this House, and to take a somewhat more sanguine view of the existence of the Government than the right hon. Gentleman is warranted in doing. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that, if we postpone this proposition, the Government will be involved in difficulties, and he shrinks from attempting the task of defining what is news. Now, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring), that there is not much difficulty in solving a question that appears so great to the Government. So far as I could perceive from a somewhat hasty examination of the 150 journals to which the right hon. Gentleman refers there is but an insignificant fraction of them that will require his attention. I was amused the other day on meeting with a cabalistic definition of news, in a book of childish instruction, that might have afforded some hints even to a Minister of Finance. The word "news" was there described by the initial letters of the four points of the compass. It is the initial letters of the four points of the compass that make the word "news," and he must understand that news is that which comes from the North, East, West and South, and if it comes from only one point of the compass, then it is a class publication, and not news. If he takes that simple hint as his guide, I think he will not find his difficulties in the definition of news so insurmountable as he takes them to be. I do not now mean to enter on the merits of the general question, I address myself only to the amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Deedes), an amendment, in my estimation, so sound, so just, and so suited to the circumstances with which we have to deal, that I feel it my duty to give it my support.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, has stated with great accuracy that cases have occurred—and he stated several—in which this House having come to certain Resolutions in regard to taxation and finance, the Government of the day have not deemed it its duty, or necessary, to adopt the Resolutions to which the House may have come; but I think the right hon. Gentleman has omitted to consider the peculiar character of the Resolution to which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer addressed his remarks. Anybody may easily understand that, if a Resolution to abolish a tax is proposed to this House, and the Government of the day resist it, but that the Resolution is carried in spite of that resistance, the Government holding by their own opinion of the tax, may abstain from taking any steps in consequence of the Resolution so carried in spite of their opposition. But the Resolution to which my right hon. Friend alluded was a Resolution carried without a dissentient voice, a Resolution in which the Government of the day concurred, and to which the Government are as much bound as the persons by whom it was proposed to the House; and it will be seen at once that there is an essential difference between a Resolution so carried, and one that is resisted and carried in spite of the opinions and strong determination of the Government. With regard to the financial part of the question, if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were picking out a tax which he thought in itself objectionable, and simply because he thought some other taxes would be preferable, it would be very reasonable for those who objected to that course to say, "Let us wait till we see whether the tax you are about to propose will be less objectionable than the one you propose to abolish." If it were a question of mere preference in regard to financial operations, I could understand the ground on which Gentlemen opposed to the tax might wish to see whether another arrangement, better suited to the wants and wishes of the country, might not be proposed; but the measure of my right hon. Friend is not founded merely on financial preference. It is grounded on the injurious, and, indeed, intolerable state of the law—a state in which it is impossible the Law can be enforced as it stands, and which we feel requires to be altered. The law must be altered, because it is a scandal that a law should exist that cannot from its nature be enforced. If the law be altered, you must either make it more stringent, more precise, and enable the Officers of the Crown to carry out its provisions and enforce its penalties in any case where it is violated—a course which I think this House will not be prepared to adopt; or, if you will not do that, you must do that which is pointed out by the Resolution of last year, and the Bill of my right hon. Friend and adopt the line of relaxation, and make the law more indulgent. Now for my part, I do not contemplate the proposed change as likely to be attended with those dangers that have been anticipated by some gentlemen in the course of the debate of this evening. I do not in the first place anticipate that this change will be productive of that injury to existing newspapers which they themselves have so industriously endeavoured to persuade us is awaiting them. I am persuaded that those newspapers—commercial speculations, such as described by the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) in that amusing speech with which he has entertained the House this evening—that those great establishments will maintain their ground in spite of any competition that my right hon. Friend's measure may bring against them. I am equally convinced that there is no real danger to the morals or loyalty of the country from those cheap publications that are likely to rise up when this stamp duty is removed. I agree with those who have such confidence in the good sense and good feeling of the lower classes—for it is to them only that these cheap publications will be addressed—as to believe that no danger will follow to them from this change; that those publications from which danger is to be anticipated will not have such a circulation, or such an encouragement as will conduce to their permanent existence. Of course they may be attempted; but they will share the fate of others that have gone before them. If they rise they will soon fall again and share the fate of those which have gone before. On the other hand, I believe there will arise cheap publications for the use of those who are unable to buy dear ones, which will convey instruction, enlarge their understandings, improve their morals, and at the same time tend to make them good and useful members of society. I therefore entertain no apprehension on that score. This being my opinion, I am convinced that the House will best perform its duty to the public by concurring in the Bill proposed by my right hon. Friend. Of this I am sure, that we ought to determine one way or the other, and that the motion—the insidious motion I must call it of the hon. Member who proposes delay—will not mislead any Member of this House. We clearly understand that that for which we are voting is, whether the measure shall be adopted or not. No man will be misled into the error of fancying that, though in favour of the Bill, he is only voting for delay, and not against the Bill. If this is clearly understood, and the votes given "Aye," or "No" upon the measure, then the tactics resorted to by those who do not openly declare themselves will not succeed; and although they say the amendment is only for delay, let it be clearly understood what the truth is. Let every Member know that in giving his vote on this Motion he will practically be giving that vote "Aye" or "No" for the measure. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members may say "No." I do not expect them to concur in the interpretation which I give. They are against the measure. They wish to vote against it, but they feel some difficulty in doing so after having concurred in the Resolution of last Session. They cannot well get out of the position in which they are placed, and therefore seek to escape by a side door, and endeavour to accomplish it by a Motion for delay; but we require that the votes should be given in plain terms, for or against the measure. If the votes be so given I am confident in my expectation, that the House will make good its Resolution of last year, and concur in the second reading of this Bill.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE GREY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that its object was to extend the power of summary conviction possessed by magistrates to cases of petty larceny not exceeding 10*s.* in value.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he had great doubts as to the principle of this Bill, which would transfer the trial of one-half the criminals who now came before the Judges at assizes and quarter sessions to magistrates in petty sessions. If that principle were once acceded to, on what ground could they refuse to go still further, and give to magistrates summary jurisdiction over all cases of simple larceny without exception? A proposal had been made by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. R. Palmer) to enable magistrates to deal in this manner with all larcenies to the value of from 1*s.* to 2*s. 6d.*, and although that plan proceeded, like this Bill, on the principle of fixing a pecuniary limit, it would yet be found practically to apply to a totally different class of criminals. He could not conceive a worse system than the existing one, but he thought that some better scheme than the present Bill might be devised for the more frequent delivery of gaols, without infringing on that great safeguard of our liberties—the trial by jury.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he felt no objection to the second reading of the Bill, for, before Christmas, he had given notice of his intention to introduce a measure founded on the same principle, which would not, however, have gone so far as to include cases where the value stolen was 10*s.*, but would have been confined to those cases which were usually designated by the Judges as trivial and trumpery. The evil of the present system was very great, for a man might be confined before trial for three months for some such trifling offence as stealing a couple of turnips—a longer detention than would be awarded for the crime he had committed. The expense to which counties were put for these trifling cases was proportionally enormous; and he mentioned a case of a man who had stolen two gallons of beans, and though the prisoner pleaded guilty, the costs of the prosecution amounted to 16*l.* 1*s. 8d.*

MR. HILDYARD said, he thought that the Bill would require a good deal of attention in Committee. There was, he considered, one great and palpable defect in it, namely, that the jurisdiction was confined to simple larceny, and did not extend to the case of a young vagabond picking a man's pocket of his handkerchief, because that was stealing from the person.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should support the Bill. He found that in seventeen cases the united value of the articles stolen amounted to 17*s. 2½d.*, and the expenses of prosecution to 150*l.* He wished that in trivial cases, and under peculiar circumstances, some power were given to the tribunals of dealing out justice short of sending a man to prison, by which act a stain was left on his name for life.

Bill read 2°.

H O U S E O F L O R D S,

Tuesday, March 27, 1855.

MINUTE.] PUBLIC BILL.—2<sup>a</sup> Militia (Ireland).

CRIMINAL LAW PROCEDURE—RESOLUTIONS—QUESTION.

LORD HATHERTON, seeing that his noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Brougham) had brought forward some Resolutions declaring the need of a more speedy administration of justice, which Resolutions had been postponed, begged leave to inquire when he would proceed with them? Even the all-absorbing interest of the war ought not to prevent the immediate consideration of his suggestions, to many of which he (Lord Hatherton) attached the greatest value. He (Lord Hatherton) being connected with one of the most populous counties of the kingdom (Staffordshire), had had opportunities, during forty years, of remarking, to his infinite pain, the inefficiency of the present system. Nothing could be more lamentable, nothing more dreadful than some of the evils it caused, and it was impossible that it could be longer maintained. He cordially agreed in the general principle, though not in all the details, of the Resolutions which Lord Brougham had proposed.

LORD BROUHAM regretted to say, that at present, from the absorbing interest of the war, in which we were unavoidably and necessarily, but most unfortunately engaged, it was very difficult to obtain, either in Parliament or out of doors, the attention due to other subjects, of a different kind, but of the greatest importance. Not the least among the evils of that most unhappy conflict in which we were engaged, was that it tended to check the course of improvement in our internal affairs. But he thought it his duty to press these Resolutions on the attention of their Lordships. From letters he had received since they were moved on Friday, he found a great mistake prevailing as to their object. More than one person, magistrates in the country, supposed they related wholly to the want of a public prosecutor. That was only one of the subjects they included. What appeared to him to be most urgently necessary was the more speedy administration of justice to prevent the enormities he had described, when persons against whom there was really no shadow of an accusation were sometimes kept in prison for six or eight months, and perhaps not even then were brought to trial. He had intended to move that the debate be resumed after the holidays; but he now doubted whether a different course would not be more convenient. In 1828, when he made a statement to Parliament of the defects of our system of law, and jurisprudence, the result was the appointment of Commissions, to consider the method of civil procedure, and valuable improvements, including the establishment of the county courts, arose from their suggestions. He doubted now whether he should move the House to call upon the Crown to appoint such a Commission, or whether he should ask their Lordships to appoint a Select Committee. He should himself prefer a Commission, and hoped the result would be improvements of our criminal procedure as extensive and as valuable as those which from the Commissions of 1828, 1829, and 1830, had been made in our civil procedure.

THE ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN—THE ANSWER.

THE QUEEN's Answer to the Address of yesterday, reported by the Lord Chamberlain, as follows:—

"I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address, and for the assurance of your Concurrence in such Measures as may be necessary to enable Me to fulfil the engagements which I have entered into with His Majesty the King of Sardinia."

THE STEAM-SHIP "PERSEVERANCE."

EARL TALBOT put the questions he had given notice of about the Perseverance steamer which upset herself in the dock, from the great top weight of her mast and yards. He would like to know who had ordered her to be so constructed. There were many instances he could cite of gross blundering and waste of money in the building and alteration of ships, which might have been obviated if a scientific board of reference had existed, or committee of dockyard officers, whose opinion could have been taken. He had heard that the Perseverance had now been resold to Messrs. Mare, from whom she was originally bought, at a sacrifice of 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* Was it true, also, that two other ships, of the same build, had been ordered by the Government?

EARL GRANVILLE, in his reply, which was not quite audible, said that the Perse-

terance, of 1967 tons, was purchased in May, 1854, of Messrs. C. and J. Mare, for the price of 38,000*l.*, and since then the Government had purchased the Urgent, for the sum of 41,000*l.*, and the Sovereign, for 53,000*l.* They were now being fitted up as troop ships; and the first two had been launched, and the third was ready for launching. They had none of them been offered for sale, nor did the Government intend to sell them.

MILITIA (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD PANMURE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its object was to regulate the application of the statute 49th Geo. III., c. 120, which required that officers of the militia in Ireland should possess a certain property qualification according to their grades in the service. Any officer acting without his qualification did, under that statute, subject himself to a very heavy penalty; but from various circumstances, which need not be particularly described, there were many officers who had, for some time, most inadvertently been in that situation; and the object of this Bill was simply to provide, that in such cases, the officers should not become amenable to the penalties of the law, if they proved their qualifications within three months after the passing of this Bill.

The EARL OF HARDWICKE would only take that opportunity of observing that it was very important the House should, at some early period, take into consideration the whole subject of the state of our militia. He felt much anxiety, at present, for the good order and satisfactory condition of that force.

After some remarks from Lord PORTMAN,

LORD PANMURE said he should take care, as soon as the Bill became law, to notify to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the instructions of the Government with regard to its provisions.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had had an opportunity of seeing the last circular, and so far as he could judge of it, he entirely approved of the conduct of the Government in sending it forth.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that as the last clause of the Bill seemed to give rather stringent powers of removing officers, he wished the noble Lord would issue a circular to explain exactly how far its provisions were intended to be enforced.

LORD PANMURE was understood to say, that an explanatory circular has been sent down by Government to the lieutenants of the counties, in order to correct a mistaken impression about the militia service, which had apparently excited some temporary dissatisfaction.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>.

Committee negatived, and Bill to be read a third time on Thursday next.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

Tuesday, March 27, 1855.

YARMOUTH ARSENAL—QUESTION.

SIR EDMUND LACON said, he begged to inquire whether any report had been received from the commanding officer of Engineers at Harwich, or from any officer sent down for the purpose, relative to the Arsenal at Yarmouth; if so, whether that report recommends that building to be converted into barracks; and if it be intended to have an artillery force stationed at Yarmouth; further, if it is the intention of the Board of Ordnance to erect new batteries at the entrance to the harbour, or upon any commanding situation in the immediate neighbourhood?

MR. MONSELL said, there had been a report received from the District Commander of the Royal Engineers, saying that the Arsenal was unfit for barracks, but certain representations had been made of an opposite character, and further inquiries would be made. As to the second question, whether it was intended to have an artillery force, he had to inform the hon. Member that it was decided to have some militia artillerymen stationed at Yarmouth, and early arrangements would be made for that purpose. In answer to the third question, he had to state that orders had been given for the construction of a battery at the mouth of the harbour, and three existing batteries had been ordered to be made serviceable. He would take that opportunity of answering a question put to him the other day by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) in reference to entrenching tools. The hon. and learned Gentleman at that time asked him whether there had not been a Commission issued after the camp at Chobham to inquire into the quality of entrenching tools, whether that Commission had not made a report condemning some of the tools, and whether, notwithstanding that Report, the Board of Ordnance had not continued to issue them. He begged to inform the House that there was no Commission, that there was no Report of any sort against entrenching tools after the camp at Chobham, and therefore the information of the hon. and learned Gentleman was not correct.

TERM OF SERVICE IN THE MILITIA—QUESTION.

Viscount CHELSEA said, he wished to put the following question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government—namely, whether, a distinct pledge having been given on the 14th day of May, 1854, by the Duke of Newcastle, then Minister at War, and an understanding arrived at that militiamen enrolled under the provisions of the Act of 1852 should not be called upon against their consent to serve for more than fifty-six days in the year during the period for which they enlisted, the noble Lord is prepared to give an assurance that it is not the intention of the Government to take advantage of the power which, in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, is conferred by the 15 & 16 Vict., c. 50, to subject men, whenever enrolled, to the full obligations imposed by those Acts, but that some method will be devised to enable such militiamen as express themselves unwilling to serve for a greater number of days in each year than they were originally made liable to by the terms of their enlistment to return to their homes?

Viscount PALMERSTON: Undoubtedly the law is as it was explained by the law officers of the Crown, and the Government have a full right to require from the militia complete obedience to that law; but it is quite true, as has been stated, that there was a sort of expectation held out by the noble Duke, the late Minister at the head of the War Department, that that obligation would not be strictly enforced. The noble Lord now at the head of the War Department is about to issue a circular to the whole of the militia regiments, the object of which will be to give to the men so enrolled previous to the passing of the Act of last year the option of being reattested, and of serving for the full time for which they are liable, or of selecting to complete only their fifty-six days in the year.

RECONSTITUTION OF POLAND.

Mr. PHINN said, he owed an apology to the House for venturing, in a time of critical emergency, to submit to their notice a Motion of such universal interest, and involving such important consequences, as the one which he was about to propose. He should, however, make as calm, temperate, and dispassionate a statement as possible, and should refrain from any language which might prevent the Government carrying out its designs in regard to peace, or might awaken in any degree the sensibilities of foreign nations. He had felt considerable difficulty in submitting this question to the House, because in the first instance a very strong opinion appeared to prevail that the idea of attempting to restore Poland to its former rank and independence was a quixotic notion, that it was speculative and theoretical, and that it was a matter fitter for Utopia rather than for the calm consideration of reflective men, and also because there had always been a certain amount of ridicule thrown upon those who had formed strong and decided opinions on the subject. He felt, however, supported in his attempt from recent occurrences and in answer to such objections, he would appeal to the numerous petitions which had been presented upon the subject to that House, to the declarations of able and distinguished Members, among others to those of the hon. Baronet of an illustrious name, who now held an office in Her Majesty's Government, to the notice which it had attracted in foreign countries as well as in our own, and to the declaration made by the First Minister of the Crown the other night, that he considered the position which was occupied by Russia in Poland as a standing menace to Germany. Surely, if Warsaw were a standing menace to Germany, as Sebastopol was to Constantinople, the question was entitled to be regarded as one of great practical consequence. Another objection to the Motion was, that it was a matter which ought to be left entirely in the hands of the Government, and that it was too delicate for discussion in that House. He altogether repudiated such a false delicacy; he believed that no inconvenience could arise from the mature deliberations of the House upon such a subject, and he would remind it that the public mind was in no temper to accept the arbitrary judgment of statesmen as a solution of every important question relating to foreign policy. The time was past when the Government could say, Sic volo, sic jubeo, sicut pro ratione voluntas. He believed it to be of the utmost importance that subjects which were discussed freely in the press and at public meetings should have the advantage of the deliberation of that House, where every question was argued with judgment, and the bane, if any, was certain to find its antidote. He was convinced that the partition of unhappy Poland would never have taken place if the attention of the House of Commons had been directed to the subject, and that that gross infraction of public law and of national rights would never have occurred if a healthy public opinion had found expression in that House. It appeared to him that the object of the present war ought not to be to repel a mere temporary aggression, but that it ought to be conducted with the view of affording securities and guarantees for the future independence of the nations of Europe. The country was engaged in a contest against an enemy who possessed a large and barbarous population, and who moulded them into one vast army, inflamed by fanaticism, for the purpose of aggression. It might appear to some persons a powerless argument, if he were to refer to a document which some believed not to be authentic—he cared not whether this document were authentic or apocryphal, whether it bore its true date or not, whether it were a prophecy or a history. If of its true date, it is a remarkable presage of future policy; if of a later date, an accurate history of Russian aggrandisement. The policy there laid down for the guidance of future generations, was always to keep up an army to aggrandise the country at the expense of Poland, to make war serve the purpose of peace, and peace serve the purpose of war, and, by its alliances with the smaller States of Germany, acquire a footing in that country, and thus, if possible, destroy the unity of action among the various States, forming that great people, who might be called the centre of gravity of Europe. Within fifty years from the death of Peter the Great, the kingdom of Poland was partitioned by an act of lawless aggression of the three great Powers, of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, and, by subsequent partitions, a kingdom which extended from the Oder to the Dniester, and from the Baltic to the Carpathians was appropriated by a scandalous violation of public law, and became an integral part of the kingdoms he had just alluded to. That act of aggression was accomplished by precisely similar means and under similar pretexts as the late aggression upon Turkey. Then a part of Poland was the bait held out to Prussia and Austria, as in the later instance Egypt and Candia were the baits held out to this country. At the Treaty of Vienna, after the earnest resistance of Austria, Prussia, and France, a compromise was effected, the kingdom of Poland was to be reconstituted, and guarantees were given which afterwards were entirely disregarded. It might be said, that even admitting the great evil which had been done, how could it be expected that this country should attempt to remedy it, supported by reluctant allies? He had himself been asked to consider what effect the Motion he brought forward might have upon our alliances; and his answer, that the policy of Austria was identical with that of this country, and that she had already sought to restore the part of Poland which she had appropriated, had been received with great incredulity. Maria Theresa, the Empress Queen, had stated to M. de Breteuil, the French Ambassador at the Court of Vienna—

“ ‘I know, M. l’Ambassadeur,’ says the Empress, ‘that I have brought a great stain on my reign by all that has come of this affair with Poland; but I assure you that I should be pardoned were the extent of my repugnance to it known, and how much circumstances have united to force my principles as well as my resolutions against all extreme views of the unjust ambition of Russia and Prussia. Finding no other means of opposing myself alone to the plan of these two Powers, I believed that, in exercising on my part exorbitant demands and pretensions, they would refuse me and break off the negotiation; but my surprise and grief were extreme on receiving, in reply to these demands, the entire consent of the King of Prussia and the Czar. Never have I been so distressed; and I must do justice to M. de Kaunitz for his great trouble at this time. He had always strongly opposed this cruel arrangement.’ ”

M. de Kaunitz wrote to the Duc de Rohan, the Minister Extraordinary of France—

“ After the efforts which Her Imperial Majesty has made to restrain her neighbours, after having sacrificed enormous sums to restrain an ambitious rival, Her Majesty would have exposed herself by a more prolonged inaction to the total ruin of her finances, to contempt, and the most irreparable disaster. I had no alternative, then, but to take the part my Court determined on, although with real regret and extreme aversion, constrained by the force of circumstances, and free from all personal desire, it contented itself with insuring itself possessions corresponding with those which Prussia has gained. The equilibrium of Europe required that indemnity.”

From these documents it appeared, that within a short time of the partition of Poland, Austria perceived the mistake which she had made. At the second partition she received no territory at all, and at the third a comparatively small portion. During the Vienna Congress in 1814, Prince Metternich wrote :—

" Of all the questions to be discussed at this Congress, the King would undoubtedly consider the affair of Poland as incomparably the most important to the interests of Europe, if there be any chance that this nation so worthy of regard, by its antiquity, its valour, its misfortunes, and the services it has formerly rendered to Europe, might be restored to complete independence. The partition, which destroyed its existence as a nation, was the prelude to—in some sense the cause of—the subsequent commotions to which Europe was exposed."

Now, when he was told that he endangered the Austrian alliance by bringing this subject before the House, he would call upon them to remember the declarations made by the Government of that country. The Austrian plenipotentiaries, speaking in the name of the Emperor, after Russia had determined to keep her hold upon the Duchy of Warsaw, said :—

" The conduct of the Austrian Emperor can have left no doubt in the mind of the allied Powers, that the re-establishment of Poland as an independent State, with a national administration of its own, would have fully accomplished the wishes of His Imperial Majesty; and that he would even have been willing to make the greatest sacrifice to promote the restoration of that ancient and beneficial arrangement. This fact must be sufficient to show that the Emperor is very far from entertaining any jealousy or anxiety as to the interference of the Polish nation with this empire. Austria has never considered free and independent Poland as an inimical or rival Power; and the principles on which his illustrious predecessors acted, and which guided His Imperial Majesty himself until the partition in 1773 and 1797, were abandoned only under the pressure of circumstances which the Sovereigns of Austria had it not in their power to control."

He might add, as a matter of history, that, after the revolt in 1831, a circular, certainly somewhat ambiguous in its language, was addressed to the agents of the Austrian Government at the various Courts of Europe, expressing a sincere desire for an amicable settlement of this great question, in the sense of securing to Poland a complete independence. That was the policy of Austria. What had been the course pursued by England and by France? The policy of England was, no doubt, exceedingly unworthy of so great a nation. The answer made by Lord North to the Russian Minister upon the announcement of the partition was in the following terms :—

" The King is willing to suppose that the three Courts are convinced of the justice of their respective pretensions, although His Majesty is not informed of the reasons of their conduct."

To a most touching appeal from the King of Poland, His Majesty (George III.) replied through his Minister :—

" I have long since seen with extreme pain the evils which surround your Majesty and which have paralysed Poland. I fear that those ills have arrived at the point at which they cannot be redressed except by the hand of the Almighty, and I see no other intervention which can remedy them. I would willingly exercise mine if I could see the moment at which it might be useful."

That was the hypocritical, the ridiculous answer in point of policy which the Ministers of George III. deigned to give to the remonstrances of the Polish nation. But there were great and enlightened statesmen in this country who foresaw the evils which would ensue from the partition of Poland and the dangers which would menace the peace of Europe. Every one was familiar with the picture drawn by Mr. Burke in 1772, of the manner in which this partition would affect Germany and the equilibrium of Europe, and of the unhappy precedent it would afford for attacks upon weaker States. Mr. Fox, Lord Grey, and, he believed, almost every statesman of weight in the councils of the nation, denounced that partition, and our acquiescence in it, as one of the most grievous errors which could be committed. At the Congress of Vienna there was a most remarkable correspondence, exceedingly little known to the Members of that House and to the general body of the people, which was not published until thirty-two years after the transactions to which it alluded, and which surrounded the memory of Lord Castlereagh with a fame and a glory which he had not hitherto gained among his countrymen, and which placed his anxiety for the maintenance of the rights of public law, and the interests of humanity, in a light that it was difficult to appreciate. The passage which he would quote was contained in a confidential correspondence between the Emperor Alexander and Lord Castlereagh. His Lordship said—

" The forced annexation of nearly the entire of so important and populous a territory as the Duchy of Warsaw, containing about 4,000,000 of people, upon a principle of conquest, to the empire of Russia, so largely increased of late by her conquest of Finland, by her acquisitions in Moldavia, and by her recent extension on the side of Persia, her advance from the Niemen into the very heart of Germany, her possession of all the fortresses of the duchy, and thereby totally exposing to her attack the capitals of Austria and Prussia, without any line of defence or frontier ; the invitation to the Poles to rally round the Emperor of Russia's standard for the renovation of their kingdom ; the giving new hopes and animation and the opening new scenes for the activity and cabals of that light and restless people ; the prospect of renewing those tumultuary contests in which the Poles so long embroiled both themselves and their neighbours ; the dread that this measure inspires of laying fresh materials for a new and early war ; the extinction it produces of any reasonable hope of present tranquillity, confidence, and peace—all these and many more considerations present themselves to the general view and justify the alarms that pervade Europe."

Had such a passage been written at the present day it could not have been more applicable and more just. In another part of this correspondence Lord Castlereagh said—

" If moral duty requires that the situation of the Poles should be ameliorated by so decisive a change as the revival of their monarchy, let it be undertaken on the broad and liberal principle of rendering them again really independent as a nation, instead of making two-thirds of them a more formidable military instrument in the hands of a single Power. Such a measure of liberality would be applauded by all Europe and would not be opposed; but, on the contrary, would be cheerfully acquiesced in both by Austria and Prussia. It would be a measure, it is true, of sacrifice, in the ordinary calculation of States, on the part of Russia ; but if His Imperial Majesty is not prepared for such sacrifices to moral duty on the part of his own empire, he has no moral right to make such experiments at the expense of his allies and neighbours."

The result of these discussions was, that the aid of France, at that time humbled by recent events, was invoked to resist the insidious designs of Russia. It was not, perhaps, generally known that Talleyrand, at the Vienna Congress, said :—" Of all the questions to be discussed, the King would undoubtedly consider the affair of Poland as incomparably the most important to the interests of Europe." When it was found that Russia was determined upon securing the whole duchy of Warsaw, a treaty was entered into between the representatives of France, Austria, and England to repress the designs of Russia ; but that treaty was not acted upon in consequence of the return of Napoleon from Elba. The final result was, that Poland, guaranteed by the most solemn treaties, had been, on the most fraudulent pretences, entirely suppressed. At this moment, when we were invoking the aid of all the nations of Europe to assert the supremacy of public law, he certainly thought it was desirable that the Government should recollect what little attention had been paid to the Treaty of Vienna on the part of

Russia. The policy of France on the subject had been invariable. Napoleon restored a very considerable territory to Poland from the spoils of Prussia and Austria, and erected it into a grand duchy in 1807, and again in 1812, promising to secure the nationality of Poland as the price of her co-operation against Russia. Subsequently at the Vienna Congress, and again in 1831, France always upheld the independence of the kingdom of Poland. In one of the earliest speeches of Louis Philippe to the Chamber of Deputies, the King stated that he had endeavoured by an offer of his mediation to assure to Poland "that nationality which resisted all times and changes;" and the Chamber, in their reply stated, that they rejoiced to hear the assurance "that the nationality of Poland shall not perish." When the destinies of Poland were trembling in the balance, Louis Philippe sent here as an Ambassador Count Walewski, himself of Polish origin, who appealed to the noble Lord now at the head of Her Majesty's Government, and then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. His Lordship, however, refused to interfere at that moment, on the ground that Russia was then a friendly Power, and that the preservation of Polish independence did not come within the scope of British policy. His Lordship added, however, that he viewed with the greatest regret these attempts to repress the nationality of Poland, and would cause representations to be made to the European Courts on the subject. He thought he had now proved, that three great Powers of Europe, two of whom were now united in arms, and had entered into a cordial alliance, consecrated by blood shed on the field of battle, and which he hoped would insure peace to both countries for ages to come—he had now proved that these two Powers, joined by a third, whose good offices at any rate, were professed to be exercised in our behalf, had always been united in the opinion that the maintenance of Poland in some shape as a distinct and separate nationality was essential, not merely to the interests of Germany, but to the maintenance of public law and tranquillity in Europe. But there was another Power which he should have thought would have been more interested in the question than any other—a Power of whose conduct and vacillation he would not say a word, after the eloquent denunciation of that vacillation in another place by a noble Lord, whom he might pronounce, truly, the Nestor of his day, the "old man eloquent" in Parliament. If it were necessary to gain the assistance of any Power for the maintenance of the integrity of Poland, he should have thought that Power would have been the first to join in any co-operation for the attainment of the object. But throughout all the successive attacks which had been made upon the independence of Poland, the conduct of Prussia had been characterised by cowardice and a slavish submission to the will of Russia. When, however, she found that the distance from Warsaw to Berlin was only about 300 miles, that she had hardly a fortress to resist the march of the invader, that upon the side of France there were no slight aspirations, if she were to betray herself and Europe, for her Rhenish provinces, and that upon the north her treacherous conduct had irreparably offended Denmark, on the south her policy in 1850 had thoroughly aroused the scarce dormant jealousies of Austria, and the memory that Silesia had been stolen from her, he thought she would hesitate before committing political suicide, nay, political parricide, and would find it to her interest to support any representations which might be made by Her Majesty's envoy at this present time, at the Court of Vienna. He knew it might be said, "We are aware of the desirability of securing the independence of Poland as a guarantee for the future peace and tranquillity of Europe, but you have now only to deal with the Four Points. We have expressed our readiness to negotiate on the Four Points, but this does not form one of them, and we are now only trying to secure the independence of Turkey and the future equilibrium of power in Europe." That this might be said, he was perfectly well aware; but, as had been remarked by M. de Talleyrand, the centre of political gravity in Europe was neither on the Elbe nor on the Adige, but on the Lower Danube, and to restore that, the reconstitution of Poland was necessary. It might be true that this question did not come within the Four Points, but the Four Points were merely the basis of negotiations, and there was no reason why an alternative proposition could not be propounded. Perhaps Russia might not concede all that was desired to secure the independence of Turkey, and then the position of Europe, as it existed at the treaty of Vienna, might be restored. It would be well to have a kind of menace in the background against Russia, and let that Power know what might happen if she did not consent to uphold the faith of public treaties and the equilibrium of Europe. It was important in reference to a question of this nature to see what had been said by one of the ablest Ministers Russia ever had. Count Pozzo de Borgo, in a secret despatch observed—

"The modern history of Russia has for its objects nearly exclusively the destruction of Poland. It has achieved that destruction to bring itself into contact with the western nations of Europe, and to gain a larger field for the development of its forces, its talents, its ambition, its passions, and its interests."

The present position of Russia with regard to Poland was a menace to England and France, just as much as her maintenance of Sebastopol and her ascendancy over the Black Sea was a menace to the rest of Europe. In any negotiations for peace which might be entered into at Vienna, he trusted that the interests of the Circassian tribes would not be neglected. He thought, however, that the Government would hardly advise Her Majesty to sign a treaty in which the independence of that brave race was not secured. After having encouraged their resistance, supplied them with arms, and enlisted their sympathies in the cause for which this country was fighting, we could never be so base as to abandon them to the ultimate designs of Russia. He knew he had obtruded an unpleasant topic upon the House, and, perhaps, on Her Majesty's Ministers. But he made his appeal particularly to the noble Lord who, at a critical period, had been, by the united voice of every branch of Her Majesty's subjects, placed at the head of public affairs. The people of this country looked upon the noble Lord as—"A daring pilot in extremity.

Pleased with the danger when the waves run high,
He courts the storm."

He knew they would see in the noble Lord a worthy Minister of the Queen, as Burleigh was in the time of Elizabeth—that Minister who, by strongly knitting an alliance between England and France, paralysed the power of the great Emperor of his day, and supported the independence of the provinces of the Low Countries at the risk of the invasion of England and Ireland. They saw, also, in the noble Lord a descendant of that able man who, in framing the triple alliance, curbed the rising ambition of Louis XIV., a worthy pupil of that great man who boasted that he would redress the balance of the old world by creating a new. They looked to the noble Lord for a peace which would not be a vain, empty, and temporary truce, but a solid peace, embracing advantages and securities that would maintain for years to come the tranquillity and independence of Europe. He knew the noble Lord might say, "This is all very right, but we have not the means of saving Poland from destruction and of raising the Poles again into a free and independent kingdom." He, however, believed that the noble Lord was a greater kingmaker than Warwick himself. He had raised up the kingdom of Belgium, had been a party to the upholding of the kingdom of Greece, and by the Quadruple Treaty had maintained the independence of Spain and Portugal. The noble Lord told them that difficulties were but obstacles that were to be overcome, and he believed all the difficulties of this case might be surmounted by the noble Lord. He (Mr. Phinn) did not wish to put the matter as a question of sentiment or sympathy with a great and gallant people, but as a question of European law, involving the interests of England and of the whole of Europe. It was a question which he was perfectly ready to leave in the hands of the noble Lord, feeling confident that the noble Lord would take such measures as the state of negotiation would permit for carrying out the wishes and feelings of the people of this country.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to command that, in the event of negotiations being commenced with a view to peace, Her Majesty's Envoys should use their best exertions for the reconstitution of the Kingdom of Poland within its ancient limits, as a measure just and necessary in itself, in accordance with the ancient policy of this country, and as absolutely essential to the due maintenance of the balance of power in Europe."

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, it had been his lot on former occasions, when the question was brought forward by his noble Friend the late Lord Dudley Stuart, whose memory was linked to an unselfish devotion to the cause, to express his opinions on the question of Poland. But he was anxious, before the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) spoke, to say two or three words on the subject, for he thought his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Phinn) was right in bringing the subject before the attention of the House. Taking the words of the Resolution, they enunciated facts on which all were agreed. The historical summary which his hon. and learned Friend gave to the House was also such as they could all agree upon, and he could not see how his hon. and learned Friend was wrong in suggesting to Her Majesty's Government that this was a question which should obtain serious attention during the negotiations which were now proceeding. Every Member of that House would agree that the partition of Poland had been a great public calamity, that it had given rise to a series of most lamentable events, and that it had endangered the peace and tranquillity of Europe. At the same time, he was bound to say that it was impossible for any man who knew the history of Europe of late years not to see the difficulties which surrounded the question. His hon. and learned Friend might not, perhaps, be aware that there was in the Foreign Office of Paris a despatch in which the French Ambassador related that, having had an interview with George III., after the peace concluded with France in 1783, the King said to him—"Sir, if France and England had been allied there would not have been a first partition of Poland; let us keep friends, and then there will not be a second." He (Mr. Milnes) believed that it was only by a firm maintenance of the French and English alliance that they could entertain any hope of pressing this important subject upon the attention of the Russian Government. It had been said the other night that this was a German question, but where were the allied Powers now negotiating conditions of peace? Why, in the very heart of Germany, and it was in a great measure from the influence of Germany that a favourable result of these negotiations might be anticipated. But Poland had always been regarded with jealousy by the German Powers whose territories were contiguous to those of that great and compact kingdom, and, therefore, Prussia and Austria had been ready to concede to Russia a large portion of Poland, on condition that they should themselves have a considerable share of that country. If, however, the position of Poland with respect to the German States was dangerous before the partition, was it less menacing now? Russian Poland was, at the present time, one enormous fortification. Russian Poland, at the present moment, threatened Germany with exactly the same kind of menace as Sebastopol threatened Turkey. He did not wish the people of England should be deceived on this point, and he thought that in the case both of Poland and Sebastopol they could make no demand requiring the disarmament of the one or the other, unless they were prepared to conduct the present war otherwise than as they had conducted it—unless they could conduct it with military genius and official aptitude. It was idle to talk of Sebastopol on the one hand, or of Poland on the other, unless they could show that they could back up brave words with brave deeds, maintain their armies in the field, and protect their soldiers under the hardships and misfortunes of war. If they could not do these things, the sooner they made peace the better. Still, he firmly believed, the efforts that had been made on the part of Poland, and the deep faith of the Polish emigrants in the restoration of their country, afforded an earnest of the future destiny of that country, and that it would yet play a great part either for weal or for woe.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he certainly could not coincide in the doctrine laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bath, that his proposal was demanded by the policy of the country, or that the reconstitution of Poland was just and necessary in itself. It appeared to him that if we could not take a town within six miles distance of the port at which we had disembarked, without our army being left to perish in the snow, it was useless to talk of entering upon an attempt which had foiled the genius of Napoleon. With regard to the Austrian portion of Poland, perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Phinn) was not aware that those provinces were highly fertile and productive; it was, therefore, not very likely that she would yield them up without a struggle; and he could not believe that it would be deemed very advisable for this country to rush into war on behalf of Poland with Russia, Austria, and Prussia, in arms against us. He was most anxious to say a word or two on the reconstitution of Poland, bearing upon the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The partition of Poland had been called a scandalous violation of public law, and a great public crime; but was the hon. Gentleman prepared to justify his doctrine on that point, as of universal application, and to say that it was to be enforced in every country, in every case, and at every time. Why, let them look at the projects in which England herself had engaged during the last two centuries, before this country ventured to accuse others. There was not a quarter of the globe in which England had not increased her territory by precisely the same process of aggression; and at this very moment maintained her dominions by the repression of oppressed nationalities. At the end of the last century she took the Cape by force, and at that very moment she kept it by force; and her dominion there was maintained over a population which detested her as much as they detested the false humanity which prevented them from protecting themselves against the Kafirs. He presumed, too, that it was not with a very good will that the inhabitants of French Canada had accepted our domination; yet there was a case which had never been designated as great public crime. Our possessions in India, Ceylon, and the Ionian Islands were acquired by military power. In Ceylon and in the Ionian Islands punishments had been inflicted by the authority of English Governors almost as severe as any that Constantine had inflicted in Poland, and it was evident that the population of those islands were oppressed in the strictest sense of the word. Therefore, it appeared to him a very gross piece of hypocrisy to say that England upon all occasions was to come forward in defence of oppressed nationalities when a great portion of her empire was constituted of them. For 400 years Turkey had continued to oppress one of the greatest nations the world had ever seen, and she had maintained her rule without an effort to reconstitute or absorb it; and this war which the country had engaged in would tend to rivet those chains on a nation one of the most oppressed in the world. They were very fond of reproving the Americans for their hypocrisy in proclaiming their love of freedom with the maintenance of slavery. It behoved England to consider whether or not, by proclaiming herself the champion of oppressed nationalities—while in every quarter of the world she had in her own person played the part of the oppressor—she was not alike guilty and hypocritical.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I cannot, Sir, at all concur in the observations which have been made by the noble Lord who has just sat down, and who has compared the progress of the British arms in different parts of the world with that transaction which has obtained the reprobation of all Europe—the different partitions of the independent kingdom of Poland. The conquests which we have made have been made against great and powerful enemies—they have been wars that have been undertaken for our own defence, and in vindication of the liberty and independence of nations. Some of the conquests we made from the enemy we kept; some of them we gave up; but to talk of the nationality of conquered colonies taken either from France or Holland, or from any other power with which we were engaged in war, is really a total misapplication of the term. Again, in regard to India, so far from our conquests there being attended with the oppression of nationalities, I ask any man who knows anything of the interior of India, and the comparative modes of administration of our Government and those of the native princes whose territories have been acquired in the progress of war, whether, so far as the inhabitants of these countries are concerned, it has not been a blessing to them to be relieved from the tyranny of some of those native chiefs under whose oppression they had previously groaned? With regard, however, to the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Phinn), I perfectly agree with the observation with which he commenced his speech, namely, there is no reason—there is no sound policy—there is no good sense—in any man who will endeavour or wish to shut out this House from the fullest discussion of diplomatic and international questions. I am perfectly ready to agree with him that those discussions, when conducted with temper and moderation, and illustrated by that range of knowledge which has distinguished the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, must tend to good instead of being accompanied by public mischief. But with regard to this Motion, it is not my intention to go at length into those topics which my hon. and learned Friend has discussed. I hope that no man will suppose that Her Majesty's Government differ in opinion with him as to the violation of public right, and the violation of moral law, which was committed when those different partitions of Poland took place in past times. I do not differ with him also in opinion as to the policy of the course the Government of Austria at that time pursued. It is perfectly demonstrable that neither with regard to Austria or Prussia was any adequate compensation of interests acquired to counterbalance the blow that was inflicted upon the moral principle by that spoliation in which they allowed themselves to be made parties. But with regard to the practical Motion now before us, the House must see what the tendency and natural consequences of agreeing to such a Motion must be. I hold, in the first place, it is neither desirable nor advisable for this House to dictate to the Executive Government what course it is to pursue in regard to negotiations pending upon matters of deep national interest. It is impossible for the House of Commons to be in possession of all those various considerations upon the bearings of which must depend the expediency of this or that demand—of this or that condition in the negotiations for peace. This balance of considerations must depend upon information which the Executive Government can alone possess; and it is for the Executive Government, when it has advised the Crown to conclude an arrangement or break off an arrangement, to show to this House that there were sufficient grounds either one way or the other—either for conclusions that led to peace or that the arrangements proposed were of a kind which the Government had thought it necessary to reject. But the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend I take to be chiefly made for the purpose of enabling him to express in the detailed form he has expressed them, his sentiments upon the general question of the partition or possible restoration of Poland. But the Motion itself is one which—even if it were in principle desirable and proper that this House should dictate to Government the specific condition upon which they should negotiate for peace—the House should be very slow and careful and cautious to admit; for what are the words which my hon. and learned Friend proposes to put into the mouth of the House? They are to this effect—"That the reconstruction of the kingdom of Poland within its ancient limits is just and necessary, and is absolutely essential to the balance of power in Europe." If the House were to adopt that opinion, and to carry that opinion by an Address to the foot of the throne, that Resolution ought not to stop where it does. My hon. and learned Friend ought to propose that it should go on to say that the House should enable Her Majesty to carry on the war until she had accomplished this object, which the House thus declared to be absolutely necessary and essential for the welfare and interest of Europe. Therefore,

Sir, I think that, on general grounds of expediency and of propriety, as well as with regard to the particular words of the Motion, it is impossible for the House to concur in the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend. It is well known that the Government of this country has, in conjunction with the Government of France, and in connection with the Government of Austria, agreed to enter into negotiations with the Government of Russia, on the arrangement which is generally known under the denomination of the "Four Points," but the restoration of Poland does not enter among those "Four Points." I think the House would not deem it expedient (considering the great difficulties which there may be found to exist in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion of the war even upon the conditions comprised in those "Four Points") to add to those difficulties by declaring it to be absolutely necessary to restore—what? Not merely to detach the kingdom of Poland, or the former Duchy of Warsaw, from that connection with Russia that was established by the treaty of Vienna, but my hon. and learned Friend goes on to say—to re-establish Poland in its ancient limits, and to wrest from Russia provinces which for a great length of years have been incorporated in, and formed an integral part of, the body and frame of the Russian Empire. I doubt very much whether this House would agree to impose such a condition upon Government as being essentially and absolutely necessary. The war in which we are engaged was undertaken for the protection of Turkey against the aggression and invasion of Russia. That was the immediate danger, and the Government thought that the object was of sufficient importance to justify them in calling upon the country to furnish them with the means of endeavouring to assert in that respect the principles of international law. Government thought there was an interest of Great Britain sufficiently important involved in that question which justified them in having recourse to arms. The question of Poland (the importance and interest of which to Germany, and through Germany to Europe, and through European interests to this country, I do not wish to underrate) is a question not of yesterday or the day before—not of this year or that year—but is dated, as my hon. and learned Friend's historical narrative shows, from a former, earlier, and more remote period. That is not the danger that has suddenly or recently grown upon the world, and enters not into the motives that justified and required the present appeal to arms, and therefore, I think, the House will not be disposed to require imperatively of Her Majesty's Government that they should mix up that question with the negotiations which are now pending. Whatever may be the feelings and opinions which Englishmen must necessarily entertain on the general question of Poland, I should be very unwilling in anything I might say on this general question to enter into a discussion that might have the least effect upon the negotiations which are now pending. I trust the House will forgive me, therefore, if I do not follow my hon. and learned Friend through that question, which he has so ably and fully discussed. I confine myself, therefore, simply to saying that it is impossible, in my opinion, for the House to agree to the Resolution he has proposed, because it would lead to objectionable consequences in regard to the continuance of hostilities, by the introduction of an object which it might be out of the power of any means England could supply to obtain. Therefore, to agree to the Address would be highly inexpedient, and at variance with the interests of the country. I do not, therefore, feel myself at liberty to agree to the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend, and I trust that my hon. and learned Friend, having satisfied the feelings of his mind by the speech which we have listened to with great pleasure—admiring, as we do, the ability with which he has placed upon record the sentiments that animate him on this subject—will not put the House to the necessity of a division, the effect of which might be misconstrued. If the House should negative the proposal upon the grounds I have stated as an objection to it, that negative might be misconstrued as implying a difference of opinion with him on the abstract question of justice—a difference which I am persuaded would not be found to exist in the minds of Members of this House.

MR. PHINN said, that after the appeal which the noble Lord had made, he felt that he had no alternative but to withdraw the Motion. But he must protest against the suggestion that he had a great wish to make his speech. He had no desire to obtrude himself on the House, but he considered that there was a strong feeling in the country on the subject he had called their attention to.

ARMY APPOINTMENTS.

MAJOR REED said, he rose in accordance with the notice he had given, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the present mode of conferring appointments in the army. He sincerely wished that this most important subject had been taken in hand by some hon. Member of greater experience and weight in the House than himself; but, since the duty had fallen upon him, he should not shrink from discharging it. The first point he wished to call the attention of the House to was the system of promotion in the army by purchase. This matter had been discussed very recently most ably on both sides of the House, and he believed that system was pernicious to the service and unjust to the private soldier, as well as to the poor but efficient officer, who was not in a position to be able to pay the large sums required to secure his promotion from step to step. The noble Lord the Member for Huddersfield (Viscount Goderich) brought forward this subject very recently in an admirable manner, and he believed that any hon. Gentleman who supposed that the noble Lord wished to introduce any levelling principle was very much mistaken. In vindicating the cause of the private soldier, the noble Lord desired, as he (Major Reed) also wished, to be the champion likewise of the poor and efficient officer. When the noble Lord the other night called attention to the way in which promotion by purchase was obtained, the hon. Under Secretary for War reminded the House that by an Act passed in the reign of George III. it was enacted that a certain regulation sum should be paid for the commission of an officer and for his future advancement step by step. He held in his hand a copy of the rules by which the British army was governed, and begged to call attention to the twentieth rule, which had reference to the purchase of commissions. In that rule regulations were laid down for the sale and purchase of commissions, and it was declared that any officer who violated those rules should be cashiered; and that any agent who assisted in the violation of them should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. Now he would appeal to any hon. Gentleman to say whether it was a fact that that regulation price was adhered to in the purchase of commissions? On this subject the Queen's regulations were broken through, he would not say with the sanction, but certainly with the knowledge of the Horse Guards. If, then, the rules under which the army should be governed could be broken through, and if the infraction were recognised by the Horse Guards, he maintained that the sooner the Queen's regulations were put into the fire the better. He wished to see promotion go by merit, especially in regard to the poor officer, who had made the army his profession, and could not compete in matters of expense with gentlemen who entered the service merely for the purpose of wearing a uniform, and who had long purses to back them up. But at the same time he was not prepared to say that promotion should solely take place from the ranks. He had received a vast deal of correspondence in connection with this subject, but he would not trouble the House with more than one or two cases proving the injury which this system of purchase carried with it. He had no wish to make any personal attack, but it was necessary on a subject of this national importance that men should not be too nice. He would in the first instance refer to the case of the colonelcy of the 13th Light Infantry, to which an officer had been appointed over the majors and captains in the regiment, who had passed through distinguished service. The officer in question was doubtless a most gallant fellow, but he had only been in the service nineteen years. If a stranger to a regiment were put over it, because the senior officers were not competent for the command, there would then be some justification for such a case; but in this case no such justification existed, for the majors and captains were veteran and experienced officers. The 13th Light Infantry had served through all the Afghanistan war, and here was a man of nineteen years' standing appointed to command it, though there were two majors in it of twenty-four and twenty years' service, the senior captain was an officer of twenty-six years' service, and the second and third captains were officers of twenty-four years' service. The senior major had served in the campaign of Afghanistan, he was in twenty-two actions, was engaged in the defence of Jellalabad, had three medals, and was once severely wounded. The second major was in the same campaign, was in Ghuznee, and in six actions, and had one medal. The senior captain was in Afghanistan and in Ghuznee, in nineteen actions, and had three medals, and was twice severely wounded. The next captain was in Afghanistan, Ghuznee, Jellalabad, in fifteen actions, and had three medals. The third captain was on the staff of General Sale, was at Jellalabad, had three medals, was twice wounded, had two horses shot under him, and was in twenty-two actions. The next case to which he should call the attention of the House had reference to the 95th Regiment. In that regiment there was an officer named George Brown—not a very aristocratic name—who, rising from the ranks, received his ensigncy in 1851. He went as adjutant and lieutenant to Scutari, where he fell ill, but rejoined his regiment in the Crimea and was present at the battles of Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman; he commanded fifty-two men, of whom twenty-four were either killed or wounded. The promotion of one of the captains to a majority having created a vacancy, Lord Raglan recommended Lieutenant Brown for promotion; but the vacancy was filled up by a gentleman from the half-pay list. Within eight days the newly-appointed captain retired, and then another officer was gazetted as captain instead of Lieutenant Brown, that officer being junior in service to Lieutenant Brown, who had been in the army for twenty-six years, having entered at fourteen years of age. He had had another communication, calling his attention to the case of Lieutenant Magnay, an officer of the 63rd Regiment. He was the senior lieutenant of the regiment. He had landed with the regiment in the Crimea, and had gone gallantly through the battles of the Alma and Inkerman; and yet, a company becoming vacant early in this year, his friends in this country having been written to from the Horse Guards to know if they intended to purchase the step for him, and, having refused to do any such thing, an officer from the half-pay list was gazetted instead of him, to the great dissatisfaction of the corps. The next case to which he should refer was that of a gentleman who had retired from the army in disgust, and who, in communicating his case to him, did so, as he stated, feeling it his bounden duty to come forward and expose the frightful evils to which the country was subject from the present pernicious system of promotion in the army. This officer was gazetted as an ensign to the 54th Regiment in 1829. In 1830 he joined his regiment in India, and shortly afterwards a vacancy occurred among the lieutenants, but though he was then senior ensign, not having interest at the Horse Guards, he was not allowed to purchase, but another officer, who had, purchased over his head. It was not until the year 1832 that he was allowed to purchase, having thus lost two years and five steps in consequence of this delay. In 1840 the regiment returned to England, when he was appointed adjutant, and in 1841 he became senior lieutenant. In that same year another lieutenant, who was willing to pay the bonus over and above the regulation price—which he was not—purchased over his head. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no; it could not happen.] As the hon. Gentleman seemed to doubt the statement, he would be happy to impart to any one in private the name of the officer. It was seventeen years before he obtained his company without purchase, never having had an opportunity during the whole of that time of purchasing his promotion at the regulation price. He finally retired from the service on the brevet of 1854, in which he was not included. There could be no doubt that the system of purchase was injurious to the service and unfair to the soldier; but what he most complained of was the practice of giving large sums above the regulation price. It was well known that officers were obliged to give considerable sums beyond the regulation price for their steps, otherwise they stopped the promotion in the regiment, and got the cold shoulder given to them, or else the remaining officers were obliged to club together to pay the difference. He would read to the House the opinion of Sir Archibald Alison with regard to the different systems pursued in the French and English armies. Just before describing the battle of Corunna, the historian instituted the following comparison of the condition of the two armies at the time—

"In the French army, the system of promotion by merit, the certainty of advancement in rank which the consumption of life in battle afforded the survivors, at once kept alive that military ardour and insured the inestimable advantage of tried valour and skill in the officers of all grades on which the efficiency of an army in the field must at all times depend."

And he went on to speak of the English army thus—

"In one important point the British army differed totally from the French—the officers, being taken from the higher classes, were separated from the soldiers by an almost impassable line."

Hon. Gentlemen, during a late discussion in that House, had stated that the present system of promotion by purchase was advantageous to the soldier promoted from the ranks, because it allowed him at once to convert into hard cash the reward which was given to him for long years' service; but he believed there was not a very great disposition on the part of the Horse Guards so readily to allow officers to realise. He knew of the case of an officer who had served twenty years in India and different parts abroad, and who, having had a fall from his horse in the discharge of his duty, fell ill and came home on sick leave. Feeling himself getting worse, he applied for leave to sell out, for he had embarked all the capital he possessed in the world to buy his way up, and his wife and family were thus dependent on his life for their subsistence, except so far as the miserable pittance allowed to widows of officers might be called a subsistence. His request, however, was refused, because it was known that his life was in that delicate state that he would soon die and his commission would fall in. This might seem almost incredible, but he was in possession of the officer's name and all the circumstances of the case. He came next to the favouritism displayed in the appointments in the army. Not long ago he had listened with great pleasure to the remarks of the hon. and gallant officer opposite (Colonel North) on the expediency of extending the capabilities of Sandhurst College. It was earnestly to be hoped that the Government would carry that into effect. What advantage was Sandhurst at present to an officer in the army? It was very little in his favour to have been educated at that institution. The officers of the staff ought to possess a thorough knowledge of their profession, and should be competent not only to convey verbal messages, but to see that the orders which the Commander in Chief gave were properly executed. The French system in this respect was very good; and the plan of having staff officers regularly trained and requiring them to undergo a certain degree of service in the cavalry and infantry, and also, if possible, in the engineer and artillery corps, might be advantageously introduced into our army. At present, the mode of promoting to the staff depended very much on the length of an officer's purse or on his affinity to the commander—a system not at all likely to secure efficient men for such appointments. Next, as to the medical staff, there had certainly been a great deficiency of medical skill in the Crimea. The proportion of medical men to the number of troops sent out had been exceedingly inadequate, and the consequence was that the surgeons had been positively worked to death and had perished with the sick and wounded, of a whole shipload of whom only one or two medical men had been left in charge. Now, the Government were appointing raw students, who had just passed their examination, to situations requiring the qualification of experience. A letter that he had seen from an officer at Scutari stated that men had been sent out there and intrusted with the care of gunshot wounds who were not competent to draw a tooth without a superior medical officer being present to see that they did not go wrong. With respect to the Commissariat, condemnation was, unfortunately, superfluous—the whole system pursued by that department had broken down. The present Motion, however, did not call upon the House to affirm that certain appointments in the Crimea were either bad or good, it simply asked for a tribunal before which the entire question as to whether the present mode of promotion was just or unjust, beneficial or injurious to the public service, could be fairly and honestly investigated. Let Her Majesty's Government, and let hon. Gentlemen who possibly might soon have to report to their constituencies, have a care how they dealt with this proposition. This Motion did not merely ask them to acquiesce in the individual opinion of a private Member of that House, it only whispered what was being daily reiterated and re-echoed throughout the country; and unless our whole system of military administration was thoroughly revised and speedily reformed, the voice of the nation would ere long be heard in tones which neither that House nor the Government could safely neglect.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL, in seconding the Motion, said he could appeal with confidence to hon. Members, who might at first be disposed to oppose it, whether they could say, after calm consideration, that the time had not arrived when an alteration in the mode of granting promotion in the army ought to be made? The last subject they had been discussing, namely, relating to Poland—was an impracticable one, but this was a question of an entirely practical character—it involved no party feelings, and it might be dealt with by the Government, if it would only take it up.

with the greatest benefit to the service. We had had a brave army in the East which had melted away from causes which all must deeply lament; and it was possible that in it there were officers who had been raised by means of the system of purchase into positions for which they were not sufficiently qualified by experience. At all events, many colonels and majors were juniors to the captains who served under them; and was it to be supposed that men of inexperience were fit to lead men of great experience? In seconding the Motion, he was actuated by no personal feeling. His object was not to condemn the past but to amend the future, and he hoped the Government would seriously consider whether some practical and beneficial result might not be obtained from an alteration of the present system of purchase. His hon. and gallant Friend (Major Reed) had quoted instances enough to show the injustice of the present system. It was in our power, he thought, to turn the unhappy disasters that had befallen our army to account, and, if they made us consider how we could best improve its executive and administrative system, we should reap no small advantage from our very misfortunes. Why, the very circumstance of the practice of buying and selling in the market commissions in Her Majesty's service, issued under her Royal sign manual, implied a public scandal; and it might be said that the Commander in Chief at the Horse Guards was the auctioneer in the odious traffic. Under this system many officers of influential families, or with a long purse at their command, were advanced more rapidly than meritorious men not so fortunately situated; and who would contend, for a moment, that that was a satisfactory state of things? The feeling which had sprung up in favour of army reform was not based on hostility towards the aristocracy. Men of the highest social position were cordially applauded when they rose by their merit. No one found fault with the promotion of the late Duke of Wellington, because it was felt that, though of high birth, he owed the distinction he acquired to his sword, and carved his way, from the earliest period of his service, by the display of the highest qualifications for command. An hon. and gallant Gentleman on the opposite side said, that an alteration of the present system would be very hard on the officers who paid for their commissions, and that every colonel went into battle with 10,000*l.* about his neck; and that, if he fell, his family would lose this large sum of money as well as their natural protector? The system was one, therefore, that would not bear scrutiny. It could not, however, be changed in a day; the transition from it must be the work of years. Still, the Government might begin at once by declaring that from a certain date no officer should buy in, and, by a certain date, all who had purchased should be bought out. This would, no doubt, entail a considerable expense, but rather than that the existing practice should continue the country would be prepared to bear that expense. How different was our system from that of the ally side by side with whom we were fighting. Nothing could be better than the French system of promotion, which rewarded merit wherever it was to be found; and even the despotic Government of Russia had this advantage over us, that the ruler of that country could promote merit to the exclusion of demerit. Indeed, the very reason why we were now encountering so stout a resistance at Sebastopol was because the Russians, when they found that they had a bad general, immediately removed him. Again, what was the effect of purchase as applied to livings in the Church? Did they obtain better clergymen by allowing livings to be bought and sold? No doubt there were good men in the Church who bought their livings, as there were also gallant officers who purchased their commissions, but the money which they possessed did not make them either good or gallant. So with reference to lawyers and physicians—they were not applied to because they might be in the possession of 100,000*l.*, but on account of their reputation and talent. It had, indeed, been said that they did not get better officers in the Commissariat, where commissions were not purchased, than in the other branches of the service where commissions were purchased; but were not the Commissariat appointments obtained through interest? Why did they not allow purchase in the Artillery and the Engineers? Because there they must have scientific talent, and that very much obliged them to adopt a different system in those two branches of the service to that which they pursued in regiments of the line and in the cavalry. He would tell the Government that this was a question which ought to be taken up, at once, by them. They ought not to allow themselves to be driven to it by the people. The Government should take the lead in gradually correcting these evils, instead of allowing the country to call for, perhaps, more army reform than was necessary. He would ask the Government who found the money to pay the forces? Why, the public; every man according to his means. To them, then, belonged the stations in the army. The Government were but the trustees to dispense this patronage, and if they gave appointments through favour, or affection, they betrayed their trust, and were answerable to the country. He had, before Christmas, moved a proposition relative to the institution of an order of merit, and the then leader of the House had favourably received it; but, on the question being put to the present leader of the House, the noble Lord had returned an answer by no means direct. He (Captain Scobell) saw no difficulty in instituting an order of merit, which would do more to stimulate the soldier than all the promises without performance which, he was sorry to say, he often heard on this side of the House. They had at present no order which could be given to officers in the army below the rank of major. Hon. and gallant Gentlemen opposite complained of the stinginess of the House of Commons, and said that was the reason why their army in the Crimea had been frittered away. But no blame attached to the House of Commons in that respect. The House of Commons granted 6,000,000*l.* for the army; and if, with that sum, the Government were not able to keep a small army in a state of efficiency, how could they do better with 12,000,000*l.* and double the number of men? It was sufficient for England to have the supreme command on one element. She could not expect to command on both. There were undoubtedly many feats of gallantry performed during the war in the Crimea, but there was only one brilliant but ill-judged manœuvre—that of Balaklava—executed under Lord Raglan's command in the Crimea; all the other engagements had been soldiers' battles. He would quote, in confirmation of his views, the opinion of a Gentleman who lately occupied a seat on the Treasury bench, but who, since he left that, had applied a key to his mind. The hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe), addressing his constituents, said, "The cankerworm which caused the failure of this campaign is the vice of public patronage." There was a great deal of selfish patronage in the army, but it was rampant in the navy. An hon. Member, who, although a soldier, filled the office of Secretary to the Admiralty, had compared the Horse Guards to a sink of corruption. He thought the Horse Guards and the Admiralty were one as bad as the other, as both of them treated merit with unfairness, and both of them required reform. The hon. Member for Kidderminster went on to say, "Our statesmen are not identified with the public interests." He hoped the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) would mark that. He knew there were secret influences which were holding him back, but he would not exemplify his usual courage if he shrank from discharging the duty he owed to his country in this matter. The hon. Member for Kidderminster said, "This is a question for the constituencies. They must be content that their Members should cease to distribute Parliamentary patronage." As for himself, he never asked any favour from the Government for himself, or for any of his constituents. He received letters often asking him to do so, but his invariable answer was, that he could not be an independent Member of the House of Commons if he asked the Government for favours. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War had told them that a profit of 60,000*l.* had been made by the sale of commissions, but that was no way to make a profit—there ought to be no huckstering in commissions. He hoped hon. Gentlemen would not treat the present matter as a party question, but would take it up in a way that would be satisfactory to the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the present mode of conferring appointments in the Army (by purchase or otherwise); to report on the same, and recommend a more efficient system for securing promotion to merit and long service."

COLONEL HARROD said, that, as one who had been educated in the junior branch of the college of Sandhurst, and had passed twenty-five years in the service, he would beg to claim the indulgence of the House whilst he addressed himself for a few minutes to that part of the subject which related to the promotion of the non-commissioned officer to the rank of a commissioned officer. Before doing that, however, he would observe with regard to the system of promotion by purchase—and he was sure he should be borne out by every military officer who heard him—that it was that system alone which afforded a chance of promotion in the army. If they abolished the system of purchase, they would have ensigns arriving at the age of thirty or forty years before they got their promotion. This was the complaint made in the only two branches of the service in which the system of purchase was not adopted—namely, the Engineers and Artillery, who very justly stated that the excessive slowness of promotion in their case was such, that no man reached a rank of importance whilst he was at the age best fitted for the discharge of his duties. Moreover, if they abolished the system of promotion by purchase, they at once fell back upon the system so much decried by the hon. and gallant Member who spoke last—the system of patronage. How, then, were commissions to be disposed of? Were they to be given away? Would they establish a system of examination, and confer them upon those who passed it with success? He would presently show to those hon. Members who held that appointments should be made in the army only under a system of examination, how inconsistent that was with their desire that the non-commissioned officer and private should be promoted in the service. With regard to the promotion of non-commissioned officers in the army, he much regretted that upon the occasions on which this subject had hitherto been brought before the House, those who addressed themselves to it had, in his opinion, shown exceeding ignorance of the practical bearing of the subject. He feared the noble Lord (Viscount Goderich), and those who followed him into the lobby on a previous evening, thought that the question might be very conveniently used as political capital, and that their real object was not to promote the interest of the service. ["Hear, hear."] He (Colonel Harcourt) felt himself justified in holding that opinion; for whilst they proposed to pull down the present system, they did not propose to build up anything as a substitute in its place. It appeared to him most extraordinary that that system having raised this country to a state of glory, so far as its military prowess was concerned, such as hardly any other country in the world had attained, the present moment should have been the one selected to cast upon it blame. They should judge a tree by its fruits; and what had been the fruits of the system? Let them recur to the history of our military campaigns. Beginning with Corunna, and passing on to Busaco, Albuera, Salamanca, Vittoria,

Orthes, Toulouse, and Waterloo; in all these actions we were pitted against our then brave foes and now gallant Allies, the French; and in every one of them, and a half dozen, or even a dozen, more he might name, we were invariably victorious. Pursuing that history still further, let them recall to mind the victories we had more recently achieved in India, in China, and at the Cape; and coming down to the present moment, let the House look to Alma, Balaklava, and Inkermann; and then ask itself if the existing system really could be so bad as it was represented by hon. Members opposite to be? It might, perhaps, be sufficient to make these references, in order to show that it was not; but he was anxious, by practical evidence, to refute the argument made use of on the other side of the House as to the injury that was done to the non-commissioned officer by not promoting him, and to establish the fact that such was the social position of the non-commissioned officer, and such the social inconvenience to himself which would ensue from his promotion, that that was not the most desirable mode of rewarding him. It was well known to the House that it was from the agricultural portion of the population that our best recruits were principally taken. They were the sinews of the country, not only in carrying on its agriculture, but for the supply of our military force. Of that there was no doubt; but, he would ask hon. Members, what was the amount of education they received? He would suppose that they received an average education at an average national school; but this was much too favourable a view to take as compared with the actual facts, for he held in his hand a return he had procured that morning from the regiment to which he had the honour to belong, of the number of men who during the last three years had passed under the hands of the schoolmaster sergeant, and by the existing regulations all recruits had to attend school until they had passed the period of preparatory drill; and according to this return, of 879 men who in the three years had passed through the schoolmaster sergeant's hands, 348 were unable to read or write, 120 could read only, and 411, or less than one-half, could both read and write. True, after they joined, they attended the school provided for them by the regiment; but did any hon. Member suppose that they could learn there more than to read and write, to work a sum in arithmetic, and commit to memory the names of the capitals of the principal States in the world and the chief rivers in Europe? Before a non-commissioned officer attained the rank of sergeant the promotion went necessarily by seniority, for he was till then an untried man, but after he became a sergeant it was the practice, and a very proper one, to select the best men for promotion to be drill sergeants and sergeant majors. The other night the noble Lord the Member for Huddersfield (Viscount Goderich), in allusion to the forty-two promotions of sergeants to be ensigns which the late Secretary at War had sent out to the Crimea, observed, in a taunting manner, that he supposed they were all sergeant majors; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert), in the course of his reply, defended himself against the statement, by saying that he could assure the noble Lord that there were only twelve or fourteen out of the whole number who were sergeant majors. Now, he (Colonel Harcourt) was astonished that the promotions were not all sergeant majors; for as the sergeant major was the best man in the regiment; and, as in the Crimea, sergeant majors, drill sergeants, corporals, and privates, had alike proved themselves heroes, and equally brave and devoted to their country, if one commission only were given to a regiment, he would say let it be offered to the sergeant major. He willingly admitted that there might be special cases, such as that of Sergeant Sullivan, where the officer in command of a division might recommend a sergeant to especial notice, and under those circumstances he certainly thought he ought to be promoted; but that should have been in addition to what had been given to the regiment. At the same time he thought that the promotion on the recommendation of the general in command, of a non-commissioned officer who happened to be near his person in the field of battle would be a dangerous practice, because there might be other sergeants who did not come under his observation who might distinguish themselves equally well, but who, because they were not near the general, were not recommended for promotion in consideration of the services they performed. Thus a great deal of injustice might be inflicted; but under the circumstances of the case he confessed he regretted that the Government had not felt themselves authorised to grant promotion to Sergeant Sullivan. His next point was, that in time of peace sergeants could not arrive at the rank of sergeant majors

under the age of from thirty to thirty-five. In illustration of this, he found that the three sergeant majors in the three battalions of Grenadier Guards on the 1st of February, 1854, were of the respective ages of thirty-four, thirty-six, and thirty-nine years; the first having enlisted when he was seventeen the second when twenty, and the third when eighteen. But in juxtaposition with whom was it proposed to place these non-commissioned officers, who he had been obliged to show to the House could not be supposed to possess any great share of education? They might be men of great intelligence, as no doubt they were, or they would not be promoted to the positions they held. Well, at the age of thirty or thirty-five, one of these men was put in juxtaposition with an ensign, who, under the system of purchase, was allowed to join the army at the age of seventeen or eighteen. Suppose the ensign joined at the age of seventeen, and that when he attained his eighteenth year the sergeant major of thirty or thirty-five was promoted, what was the result? That the ensign of eighteen, with one year's experience, was superior in standing to the sergeant major of thirty or thirty-five promoted to an ensigncy with ten or fifteen years' experience? Did they think it would conduce to the happiness of the sergeant major to find himself in juxtaposition with a person so much his junior in the service, but who was much better instructed than himself in everything that was necessary to form an able and efficient officer? Assuming that in reading, writing, and arithmetic they might be equal, the young ensigns would know something of geography, of history, of the classics, of languages, and would possess a variety of information absolutely necessary in the opinion of mankind towards the formation of an officer, and of the whole of which the sergeant major so promoted would doubtless be ignorant. There was another point which had considerable weight on his (Colonel Harcourt's) mind, and it bore especially upon the social position of the soldier. Now, it did not always happen that because the non-commissioned officer was a good and intelligent officer, the wife was, therefore, the "better half." He would not dwell upon this part of the subject, however; but it was an important point with regard to the man's social position; and if his wife could neither read nor write, surely to elevate her to the rank of a gentlewoman would be to confer rather an im-jury than a benefit. A short time since he (Colonel Harcourt) called upon an officer in his old regiment, whom he knew to be a valuable man, and one of whom the regiment had reason to be proud. He had risen from the ranks, and for forty years had been in the situation of quartermaster. He (Colonel Harcourt) said to him, "What do you think of the promotions they have been sending out to the Crimea, of sergeants to be ensigns? Do you think it will be satisfactory to the men?" "No," was the reply; "it will do them great injury, not only on account of the want of education, but because the pay is not sufficient, in the case of a married man, to enable him to support himself, his wife, and children. I know," he continued, "the case of a man who had a brother promoted to an ensigncy in the 71st Regiment, who, finding soon after his promotion that he was unable to maintain himself and family, actually died of a broken heart." In the case of the ensigncy recently sent out to the battalion of Grenadier Guards in the Crimea, whom did the House think it had been given to? To the sergeant major? No. To one of the drill sergeants? No. To the sergeant who had most distinguished himself in action? No. But to one of the junior sergeants in the battalion, because he was a single man, and those above him refused to accept it. The quartermasters are the only officers who, after thirty years' service, cannot retire on the full pay of their rank; they likewise would very much value, and they deserve, some distinction of rank. The quartermaster said, "I was 'Mister' forty years ago, and I am 'Mister' now." He (Colonel Harcourt) thought a brevet rank of lieutenant or captain might be given to these men for long service. They would take pride in it, and it would be an act of justice to them. It might be a very popular cry, "Promote men for meritorious service;" but, unless they could alter the character of that class of the population from which recruits were obtained, it must do them an injury with respect to their social position. Could any man believe that the inducements held out to persons entering the army at present were such that those who could get their livelihood in any other way would subject themselves to all the restrictions and discipline of the army, and pass through a service of sixteen years, upon the mere chance of obtaining an ensigncy, the pay of which would be insufficient to support themselves and their families? He perfectly agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who spoke last as to the beneficial effects of an Order of Merit, to which a certain pension should be attached, for he was not one of those economists who wished to spare the pocket of the nation when, by so doing, he should inflict an injustice upon the army. He thought that an appropriate mode of rewarding merit would be to confer those inferior appointments in the Tower, which were in the gift of Lord Combermere, upon this class of men. No doubt that distinguished and gallant nobleman had followed the example of his predecessor, the Duke of Wellington, in this respect, but he (Colonel Harcourt) could not shut his eyes to the fact that, at present, it was open to him to confer appointments of that description upon his butler. There was another class of appointments with respect to which he spoke with great delicacy, because he had no wish to interfere with the patronage of the Crown, especially under such a Sovereign as we were now blessed with—he meant the appointments in the Yeomen of the Guard and the Gentlemen Pensioners, which were at present given to a class of persons called "esquires" in The Gazette, and who were not suited for such offices. Those were not situations which should be held by such men, and he would infinitely rather that the appointments to them should be made upon the recommendation of the Commander in Chief than upon that of Lord Foley. On a former evening an observation had been made in that House about our soldiers "fighting under the cold shade of the aristocracy." He denied that that was so. Could they forget the brilliant charge headed by Lord Cardigan at Bala-klava? Did they not all remember how a gallant scion of the House of Percy distinguished himself at Inkerman, when fifty or sixty of his men becoming enveloped in a host of Russians, he rushed down the hill over which the enthusiasm of his soldiers had led them too far, and succeeded in rescuing and bringing them back? The owner of another aristocratic name, Colonel Cadogan, on the same occasion acted in a precisely similar manner. In the face of such facts as these, then, was it to be said, "that the soldier was fighting under the cold shade of the aristocracy?" He wondered that the blood of the noble Viscount had not mantled in his cheek with shame when he indulged in such an attack upon his own order. With regard to the Motion before the House, he should certainly oppose it, because he did not consider a Committee a fitting tribunal for inquiring into the questions that would have to be submitted to it ; and he urged upon the Government the propriety of appointing instead of a Commission, consisting partly of general officers and partly of Members of influence and station in that House, to take the whole matter into their consideration, and report to the Government and the House thereon.

MR. ALCOCK said, that, as a general rule, when a death vacancy occurred in the army the senior of every rank was allowed to succeed to promotion without purchase. It might be supposed by those who had read the report of the Naval and Military Commission of 1840, that the same rule was followed in the navy. Such was not the case, however, of promotion, and it was absurd to talk of the system in the navy as being equivalent to that in case of death vacancies in the army. He denounced the Report of the Commission of 1840 as a mockery and delusion, and he declared that if the Government did not alter the system of promotion which obtained in the navy they would deserve to be opposed by every honest man in the country. In the Baltic fleet last year several death vacancies occurred. The first was Commander Anderson, of the Cressy. Sir Charles Napier gave the step to the fourth lieutenant of Admiral Chads' flag ship, a lieutenant of 1849, and placed him over the head of a lieutenant of 1842. When such things could be done, the Report of 1840 was, as he had previously asserted, a mockery and a sham.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, that perhaps the system of purchase, if it had never yet been established, would not now be adopted in the British army ; but it was one thing to abolish an old established system, and it was another thing altogether to create a new one. The system of purchase, which was now called in question, had been part and parcel of the British army almost ever since that army had been established. He did not make that remark for the purpose of maintaining that the system was a good one, but he did it to show that it was inherent in the very existence of the British army as it was constituted at the present moment. He thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Reed) in introducing this question to the House had not altogether shown very clearly in what manner he would substitute a new system in its place.

Colonel Harcourt

He proposed to abolish the system now in existence, and the only system he proposed to put in its place was promotion by merit. [Major REED : The Motion was to refer the subject to a Select Committee.] He was aware of that, but when such a Motion was made it was usual for the proposer to sketch the manner in which he would wish the subject to be dealt with, if he succeeded with his Motion. Now, what was the object which they all had in view ? The object was the efficiency of the service of the State. How was that efficiency to be obtained ? It was to be obtained in two ways. First, by getting young officers quickly put at the head of their regiments ; and, secondly, by taking care that the poor officer should have a fair share of being brought forward in the rank of promotion. He would endeavour to show in what way the system of purchase was beneficial, not only to the State, but also to the army. It was beneficial to the State, inasmuch as the State saved a very considerable sum of money by the system of purchase. Although that was one argument, yet he did not mean to rely upon it. His reason was this—that if it could be shown that the system was a bad one, and demoralising to the army, he thought it the duty of the State to find money for the purpose of making a better system, and of improving the condition of the army. Therefore, although the State did save money by the system of purchase, he should not rely upon that as an argument. But that it brought young officers to the head of their regiments quickly, and encouraged promotion as rapidly as possible, he would shortly show to the House. It was a mere truism to say that the system of purchase naturally brought an officer to the head of his regiment. If they abolished that system, they must have a very largely increased list of retired full pay. The average service at which an officer arrived at the command of a regiment by the system of purchase was twenty-one years, or rather less. Now, what was asked was, if possible, to maintain that average, and, at the same time, to abolish the system of purchase ? Therefore, if the system were abolished, it was evident that the retired full-pay list must be largely increased. He would state what was the number of officers of different ranks on full pay, in the year 1853, in the army, and what on retired full pay ; and he would likewise state the number of officers of Artillery and Engineers on full pay in 1855, and what were on retired full pay. He took the year 1855 for the Artillery and Engineers, because in that year those bodies were increased, and he suspected it was not very likely they would be reduced again. In 1853 there were 248 lieutenant colonels in the army on full pay, and twenty-four lieutenant colonels on retired full pay; while in the Artillery, in 1855, there were only eighty-four lieutenant colonels on full pay, and there were forty-five lieutenant colonels on retired full pay. In the army in 1853 there were 247 majors on full pay and twenty-five on retired full pay. In the Artillery and Engineers there were no majors. In the army in 1853 there were 1,304 captains on full pay, and 114 on retired full pay; while in the Artillery there were, in 1855, 112 captains on full pay, and forty-five on retired full pay. Thus it was shown that in the army there was a large number of officers, with a comparatively small number on retired full pay; while in the Artillery there was a small number of officers, with a large number on retired full pay. Of the Engineers there were, in 1855, thirty-two lieutenant colonels on full pay, and twelve on retired full pay; sixty captains on full pay, and nineteen on retired full pay. The Commission which sat last year on the army and the Ordnance, stated that the charge for the retired full pay in the army for the present year was 44,103*l.*, and was to be increased to 80,000*l.* The charge for the retired full pay list of the Artillery and Engineers, with not more than one-twelfth part of the number of officers on full pay, was to be 48,000*l.*, being within 32,000*l.* of the whole sum appropriated for the same purpose to the army. This would show that, if there were a retired list for the army proportionate to the retired list of the Artillery and the Engineers, the non-effective vote that would be added to the Estimates would most materially increase the expenses of the State. But to revert again to the beneficial working of the system of purchase. It was evident that it must be beneficial to the army, for if you could infuse the energy and activity of youth into the service, by bringing officers in the vigour of life up to the head of their regiments, it was manifest that it must be beneficial to the army. And that it must be beneficial to the rich was equally manifest. But at the same time, he contended that the system of purchase was beneficial to the poor officer. And why? It was very easy to show that the system of purchase cleared the way for the poor man to arrive at the top of the list. Having by that means obtained his position, he received the first death vacancy that occurred in the next higher rank, and was promoted without purchase. Having served twenty years, he was afterwards enabled to sell his commission, which he had obtained without purchase. That officers did arrive quickly at the top of the list by means of the system of purchase might be shown in a few words, for during the year 1854 the average time that it took the poor officers to obtain their commissions and promotions, without purchase, was eleven years. It would appear, therefore, to be no great hardship that officers should gain promotion by purchase if such were the effect as to bring the poor men up so quickly to the top of their list. There was another manner in which the poor officer benefited. He could not afford to purchase, but he eventually got promotion without it; and upon his retirement the money he received for his commission put out at interest, available for his own purposes, and allowed the capital to accumulate for the benefit of his family at his death. If that advantage were taken away, it might be said that there would still be the retired full pay, and that that was an equivalent. But a poor officer, who was married, looked beyond his own life, and wished to leave something to his family. It was said, indeed, that these men came to the service knowing what the service was—that they were aware that purchase was the rule, and, though they might suffer in their feelings at seeing officers getting over their heads, yet they must be aware that, were it not for that system, they would have been double and quadruple the number of years in arriving at the same position which they had already attained. He thought the time selected for bringing this Motion forward was not a very promising one. One would almost think, from the debate a short time ago, and from what he had heard to-night, that purchase was so completely the rule that there was no exception to it. Now, non-purchase formed a very large exception. It was constantly occurring, not only in time of war, but in time of peace. In 1853—a fair year, because it was at a period before the war—there were seventeen lieutenant colonels promoted by purchase, and thirteen without; twenty majors were promoted by purchase, and twenty-two without; and there were 146 captains promoted by purchase, and 120 without. In the year 1854 fourteen lieutenant colonels were promoted by purchase, and forty-four without. The number of officers who obtained their majority was 125, of whom twenty-eight were promoted by purchase, and ninety-seven without; of those who obtained their captaincies, 168 obtained them by purchase, 394 without; and during that year the number of first commissions obtained by purchase was 358, to 437 obtained without. The statistics of the year 1855 also showed that the number of commissions obtained by purchase was less than the number obtained without, and it therefore appeared to be clear that promotion without purchase was not so very uncommon. In the year 1847 he had moved for a return of the number of non-commissioned officers promoted to commissions during the ten years from 1836 to 1846, and it appeared from that return that 376 had received commissions, of whom 245 had been promoted to cornetcies or ensigncies, and 131 had been made quartermasters, so that it appeared that during that interval the average number of non-commissioned officers promoted annually was thirty-four, and could it then be said that promotion from the ranks was a particularly uncommon occurrence? It was, on the contrary, evident that the system of purchase admitted of very large exceptions, and he himself was very glad that such was the case. The number of persons promoted to lieutenant colonelcies from the 1st of January 1840, to March, 1855, was 357, of whom 169 obtained their commissions by purchase, and 188 without; and out of the 169, ninety-three obtained their majorities, and fifty-seven their captaincies without purchase, so that the whole number of officers who had purchased all their steps was only forty-nine. Considering that a Commission had sat last year to investigate the subject of promotion in the army, he thought it highly inadvisable to disturb so much of the settlement of the question proposed by that Commission as related to purchase. That Commission had caused great hardship in the case of many of the older officers of the army, but it had established a new system after lieutenant colonels had increased the retired full pay list, and had strongly recommended the increase of the staff as a means of promotion and recompence. These would give greater opportunities for promotion than existed before, combining the action of promotion and non-purchase with all the advantages of the one, and none of the disadvantages of the other. With regard to the substitution of merit for promotion, he was as much alive to the necessity of calling merit into service as any one. He had, indeed, been long the advocate of a system of efficient examination; for he admitted that as yet that system had been nothing but humbug. The system at Sandhurst, for instance, was most inefficient; so much so, that he knew a man who had lived all his life in France, and who spoke French as well as a Frenchman, to be turned back because of a trifling grammatical mistake. But, at the same time, the question of merit was one of a most difficult nature to deal with. How was merit to be detected in time of peace? It was easy enough to detect it in a time of war, for it proved itself; but in a time of peace was a lieutenant colonel to be sent before a board for examination? Or for the lower examinations, how could it be decided upon an examination of half-a-dozen young men, who might all answer equally well the questions put to them, which was to be promoted on the ground of merit? Then the man promoted because of his apparent fitness might be, as was often the case, the man of all others least fitted for command. Promotion by merit was, however, by no means incompatible with the system of purchase. There was, in fact, no more difficulty in selecting men of merit from among those who might buy their commissions, than from those who might obtain them through the means of examination. He would, therefore, graft the system of merit upon the system of purchase, and by increasing the retired full pay list give room for the promotion of young and active officers to the head of regiments. The hon. and gallant Member who brought forward the question had mentioned the case of George Brown. Of that case he (Colonel Lindsay) knew nothing of his own knowledge; but he thought, assuming it to be the case as stated by the hon. and gallant officer, that this part of the system ought to be relaxed, and that death vacancies occurring on the field should be filled up by the senior officer, if he was qualified for it. If it was so, he thought it ought to be the last case of the kind that should happen. Under all the circumstances, he wished the House to pause before it interfered with the operation of the Commission of last year, or deprived the State, the army, and the poor officer of the advantages conferred upon them by the present system.

COLONEL NORTH said, in reference to the case of Lieutenant George Brown, 95th Regiment, that thirty years ago, when he (Colonel North) joined the army, the father of that deserving young man was colour sergeant in the 11th Regiment. That most respectable man had given his sons the best education in his power, and he (Colonel North) was happy to say they all proved themselves most excellent and worthy men. He rose on the present occasion because he thought the remark of the hon. and gallant Member (Major Reed), in reference to this point, was unjust to Lord Hardinge and to the Horse Guards, when he set down the want of promotion of Lieutenant George Brown to the want of influence of that young man. Lieutenant George Brown, who had distinguished himself greatly at the battle of the Alma, was recommended for promotion by Lord Raglan, but, unfortunately, the recommendation arrived too late. Last week, however, Lieutenant George Brown's father brought him (Colonel North) a letter in which the fact was announced, and in the margin of that letter was a remark which did the greatest honour to Lord Raglan, who, it was untruly said, cared nothing for the sufferings of those under his command. In that letter Lord Raglan expressed the deepest regret that his recommendation had arrived too late to procure the promotion of this officer. Lord Hardinge had also expressed a similar regret; and he (Colonel North) felt confident that Lord Hardinge would take the earliest opportunity of carrying out that recommendation. The noble Lord (Viscount Goderich) who brought forward the question on a former night, spoke of the spirit of the army being depressed by the present system of promotion; but he (Colonel North) put it to the House whether there had ever been an army with a better spirit than that manifested by the British army? A great deal had been said of the French system of promotion; but the French had the conscription, in the first place, which brought young men of all classes into the ranks; and, in the second, the ranks of the French army were largely recruited from the students of the military schools, who might have failed to pass the severe examinations required for officers in the French service, or who, for some other cause, chose to enlist in the ranks. Very few officers in that army rose from the lowest ranks in point of fact.

No doubt some were promoted for bravery and distinguished conduct in the field; but so, likewise, were men in the British army. Where, then, was the wide difference? The noble Viscount had said, also, that the bullet was the great leveller which created good feeling between the officers and men. He (Colonel North) believed that if there was ever good feeling between the officers and men—good feeling and mutual respect—it was in the English army. The greatest kindness was shown to the men by the officers, and the greatest attachment to the officers by the men. It was this feeling, and not the bullet, as was asserted by the noble Lord, that was the great leveller. With regard to the system of promotion by purchase, he (Colonel North) felt astonished at the remark of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans), that provided a man had 6,000*l.*, and was of sufficient age, he was certain to be placed at the head of a regiment. That was most unfair to Lord Hardinge and every Commander in Chief. If a civilian had said it, there would be nothing extraordinary in it; but the hon. and gallant Officer knew very well that there was a half-yearly inspection, and that the Commander in Chief was guided by the confidential report of the general officer made after the inspection of the regiment, and could not pass over an officer who was first for promotion and who was reported as fit for it by that general officer. If a man possessed 6,000*l.*, therefore, and was also fit for command, there was no reason why he should not be promoted by the Commander in Chief; but the fact of having the money would not insure him his promotion, if in other respects he was not fit for it. He (Colonel North) should not have risen but for the mention of the case of Lieutenant George Brown, that most worthy, distinguished, and excellent young officer, who it would give him the greatest pleasure to see gazetted to a company in the 95th Regiment. If, however, the question before the House came to a division he should give it a decided negative, not only from his own intimate conviction of its inutility, but also because of the strong arguments against the principle urged in the speech of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) on a previous occasion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had no recollection of having made such a speech. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Lindsay) had given the House a list of promotions to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, which seemed to show that there was a larger number of officers of that rank than could possibly be employed in the army. The hon. and gallant Member, however, did not mean to say that these promotions took place in a regiment as regimental promotions? [Colonel LINDSAY : Yes, I do.] With regard to recent promotions, it was perfectly well known that many of the staff officers were not under fire, and yet they were raised over the heads of the regimental officers who fought in the late actions. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite had not dealt at all with the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Reed), who sought only a fair inquiry, either by a Commission or by a Committee. They had touched upon the promotion of non-commissioned officers to commissions, and he could perfectly understand their feeling in favour of the present system, as they were men of rank and station, connected with the aristocracy, with plenty of money to purchase every step they wished. But the country was dissatisfied with the system, and he was convinced some change must take place before they could make the army as efficient as it ought to be. Hon. Gentlemen spoke of the courage of men of high rank. No one disputed their courage. They were equal to other men, and other men were equal to them. They were all brave Englishmen together. But when allusion was made to Inkerman, that was generally admitted to be the battle of the private soldier, in which neither generalship nor the lead of officers was concerned. It was a fight of man to man, shoulder to shoulder, and was won by the bravery of our troops, which was never exceeded on any occasion. Reference had been made to the case of sergeant majors, who seldom attained that rank until they were thirty or thirty-five years of age. That was because no promotions took place; but if deserving sergeants were advanced they would have much younger sergeant majors, and the sergeant majors would eventually obtain commissions. The present system was actually a bar to the advancement from the ranks, except some great battles were fought, such as those in the Crimea, and unless the system were changed it would make the army unpopular. He wished to hear some explanation from the hon. and gallant Colonel as to the promotions he had quoted.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he spoke in the first instance of various lieutenant colonels who became lieutenant colonels in 1853, in 1854, and in the first two months of the present year. In 1853 there were seventeen ; in 1854, thirteen ; and in 1855, two, by purchase, and a few less without purchase. All those officers were serving regimentally, except those who had unfortunately been killed. He spoke of a larger number—of 357, but they were promoted during the period from 1840 to the present time ; speaking in round numbers, 160 being raised by purchase, and 190 without purchase ; but the whole were promoted regimentally, in regiments, to the rank of lieutenant colonel, not one by brevet. With respect to the Guards, they paid 4,800*l.* for the rank of lieutenant colonel, as compared with 4,500*l.* for the same rank in the line, and he could assure the hon. Member in the numbers quoted there was not a single instance taken from the Guards.

COLONEL KNOX said, since the subject had been mooted by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) he should for once be obliged to agree with him in respect to the promotion of the staff after the battle of Inkerman. Nothing could be more extraordinary than such a promotion, when it was very well known that not a single officer on the staff was engaged in that action. Nay, he could point out, if it were not invidious, that some of the officers promoted had not even been in action or under fire. He was informed that the return did not include the whole of the promotions. He knew not where it had been compiled, whether at the Horse Guards or elsewhere, but it was certainly not complete. With the exception of Colonel Claremont, who was with the French army, the Prince of Saxe Weimar, and Captain Estcourt, the number of officers who actually fought at Inkerman, and who were promoted, only amounted to twenty-five. If he left out the general officers, he found the number of staff officers promoted amounted to fifty-four. A statement like that, he considered, required no comment. There was one other circumstance which he could not pass over on account of its importance. He hoped in the remarks he was about to make that it might be clearly understood he was actuated by no unfair feeling to any class of officers—he wished to give every one that which was fairly his due. But the circumstances that were connected with the warrant issued after the commission of last year, involved such a monstrous piece of injustice that he felt it his duty to mention it to the House. In that warrant four very junior major generals received promotion for their services—they were made commanders of regiments. Now, with all due deference to the authorities who made this selection, he must say that it displayed great injustice towards many old officers who had served through the Peninsular war, and who had done their duty faithfully and honourably. These officers were put aside in order to give remuneration to the officers he referred to. Now, if it were intended to give officers a reward for distinguished services, he thought the best way would be to give a sum of money, for the question was really one of pounds, shillings, and pence, the pay of a general officer having a regiment being 1,000*l.* a year, and that of a major general only 400*l.* a year. It was this additional pay and promotion that old officers were looking forward to. And if it were determined to show favour to officers who had distinguished themselves in the Crimea, they ought to have been put on the increased pay list, and, when promoted to be general officers, this increased pay to cease. But, at all events, it was manifestly unjust to pass over officers who had served in every clime, and who had behaved in a meritorious manner under every circumstance. Such a course as that adopted was calculated to deprive them of their just rights, and in making these remarks he did not make them with any invidious feeling towards those distinguished officers who were recipients of the boon, but he made them in justice to meritorious officers who had been unfairly passed over. With respect to the Motion, he thought it would effect little practical good. The Motion was worded in such a way as to leave the Committee no option, and further, he must say that this was not the exact moment to press such a Motion; if, however, any step was to be taken, it ought to be taken by a Commission under the authority of the Crown rather than by a Committee of that House. He was not, however, very much enamoured of these Commissions, as the last Commission had not acted quite fairly in his opinion.

MR. LAING said, that, if this Motion had been made this time last year, when the country was under the delusion that it had, if not a large army, at all events an army admirably adapted to the purposes in view, it would have been said, "the system of officering the army works well in practice, why should you disturb it for the sake of any theory?" But recent events in the Crimea, while they had proved the gallantry and courage of our officers and men to be even greater than had been believed last year, had also proved that the army, taken as a whole, as a great machine, was very far deficient in those qualities they had a right to expect. This was, therefore, a reason why inquiry at the present moment was peculiarly desirable. To a certain extent this was a money question, but at the present moment the people were prepared to make whatever pecuniary sacrifices might be necessary to put our army upon an effective footing. For nearly half a century back public opinion, in deference to the Duke of Wellington, was never for one moment brought to bear upon the constitution of our army, but now that events had forced the matter upon public attention, it was found that both the constitution and the officering of our army were repugnant to the principles of common sense, and that a thorough and comprehensive inquiry was needed, not into this or that branch of the subject, but into the whole system of officering the British army. The Motion of the noble Lord (Viscount Goderich) was negatived the other night, but it elicited some remarkable admissions, which established the position that a comprehensive inquiry ought to be made. In the first place, the noble Lord at the head of the Government said that, if the system of promotion by purchase were not now in existence, no man in his senses would think of introducing it into the army. The right hon. Gentleman, the late Secretary at War (Mr. S. Herbert), admitted that, though an educational test for commissions in the army might not be perfect, yet, as a choice of difficulties, it would be a better system than that which now existed. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans), whose opinion was one of the highest authority, he having commanded not brigades merely, but independent armies, in two or three consecutive campaigns, also insisted upon the necessity of a change in our system. The authority of foreign countries was equally strong. He would not refer to France, but to countries which possessed an aristocracy and gentry more like our own, and where the armies were officered from these ranks. In these countries we did not find a system of purchase. In the Austrian army the officers were almost exclusively gentlemen. The Sardinian army had been found, during the war with Austria, in 1848-49, to be defective in its organisation, and the Government set to work to make it more efficient. The Sardinian Government appointed a Commission to examine the military system of all other countries, including our own. Did they thereupon adopt a system of purchase? No; they retained the system of looking to the nobility and gentry for the staple and basis of the officering of the army, and they superadded the promotion from the ranks of a certain limited number of non-commissioned officers. The Government of Sardinia also instituted an educational test of great stringency, as a criterion of fitness for such promotion. If they looked at the question apart from authority, it was found to be opposed to the plain broad principles of common sense. Let the House look to the practical working of the present system in the case of a man who adopted the army as a profession, and who looked to rise to the command of a regiment. Such a man must command a sum of 6,000*l.*, which he must be able to afford to invest in a speculation yielding no commercial return, besides running the risk of losing his whole capital by death and other contingencies, upon the occurrence of which he never got a penny of his money back again. The effect of such a system was to limit the army in a great degree to the wealthy classes of the community—to that class who could afford to spend 5,000*l.* or 6,000*l.* in buying their steps in rank. He knew of his own knowledge two young men, who, being at Sandhurst together, and passing satisfactory examinations, obtained commissions without purchase. One, whom he would call "A," passed a "very distinguished" examination, while "B" passed a "good" examination. "A" got his commission first. They both obtained promotion to a lieutenancy, through a death vacancy in the same order. "A" rose to the top of the list for captains, but he had not got the money to purchase. "B" had the requisite funds, and he got the step and rank of captain. In eight or ten years "B" attained to a high rank in the army, while the other, who had highly distinguished himself, remained a broken-hearted and disappointed man, lost to himself and lost to his profession. That was an instance of how the system worked. In the first place, it had the injurious effect of rendering the officers of the army amateurs instead of practical professional men. The majority of officers were men of wealth, position, and standing in the country, who took up the army as an agreeable profession, in which to spend a few years, and never looked upon their regiments as their home. When in the prime of life they sold out, because they married, came into large property, or had duties to discharge which required their presence elsewhere. He did not deny the extreme gallantry of our officers. If the whole business of warfare consisted in leading men to the charge, they would stand unequalled in the world; but the real business of warfare required something more, namely, a practical knowledge of the details and working of the system, such as feeding, clothing, butting the men, and many other requisites. The experience of the past few months certainly led the country to believe that our army, though admirably officered as regarded gallantry, was deficient in other and most important respects. In other branches of life what were amateurs compared with professional men? What was the amateur jockey compared with the professional jockey? The man who made a profession his sole business, and studied all its details, was the man in whom the public would feel confidence. There was, however, a still more important point in which the present system stood in glaring contradiction to the common sense of the country. In all other professions and employments the one test of efficiency and success was promotion according to merit. In all the business concerns of life promotion by merit was the mainspring of excellence and efficiency, except in the service of the army. If a merchant, possessing a large establishment, were to attempt the purchase system in the appointment of his clerks, how long would it be before his name appeared in the Gazette? If a railway company adopted the same system in the appointment of servants to take charge of the express train, what length of time would elapse before a verdict of manslaughter would be returned against them? The mainspring of all the business affairs of life was a rigid system of promotion by merit, and the chances of a man rising by that means from the lowest to the highest position greatly conduced to the proper and efficient working of the system. In all professions except the army—even in what were called the genteel professions—for instance, the law and the church—promotion went by merit, and men were led to make the greatest exertions by the prospect of distinguishing themselves and of rising to eminent positions. A point of vital importance for consideration in this question was, how they were to get men for the army, and in order to obtain men, it was necessary to render the army popular rather than unpopular. At present, taking the opinion of the majority of the middle and working classes in respect to the army, could it be fairly said that the army was a popular institution among them? They did not come forward to enter Her Majesty's service with that readiness which was desirable; but, on the contrary, when a man found that his son had enlisted into the army, his uppermost feeling was one of sorrow, and almost of humiliation. It was not the case with the navy, nor with any other profession; but with regard to the army, it was felt that the man who had enlisted had thrown himself away, and that the position he had chosen was almost a degradation to him. Certainly that was a feeling which ought not to exist in the country, especially when education had, to a great extent, smoothed down and levelled those sharp distinctions which had formerly existed between different classes of society. In other branches of life instances were continually occurring of men advancing from a humble position to the upper ranks; but it was rarely the case in the army, though the letters which had recently been received from private soldiers in the Crimea evinced a gentlemanly feeling and a highly creditable state of education, and proved that a judicious and more liberal promotion from the ranks would inspire a praiseworthy emulation among the men and be highly advantageous to the service. It might be said that it would be difficult to find a substitute for the present system, but, though that might be a forcible argument to a Motion to abolish the system altogether, it hardly applied to a Motion which was limited merely to inquiry. The time was come when Government ought to take the matter up, and institute a general and comprehensive inquiry into the system of officering our army, when an attempt should be made to eradicate those evils and place our army on a more popular footing, a footing on which the military career might be open to talent, in which money would not be the sole test of capacity, by which the army might be composed of gentlemen, but of poor gentlemen, who would study it, attach themselves to it, and make themselves thorough practical officers. Combined with that they might have an amount of promotion from the ranks sufficient to render the army popular, and to throw open the career of arms to a larger class of the community than at present.

Lord LOVAIN said, he thought the hon. Member who had last spoken had made out no case for the destruction of a system which had produced an army that had beaten every army ever opposed to it in the field. He was not one of those who believed that such a body as the British army, composed of so many persons entertaining different ideas and opinions, could ever be compelled into anything like the unity of action which was induced by such systems as those adopted by mercantile or railway companies. He denied however, that there was any ground for the accusation of the hon. Member (Mr. Laing) that the officers of the British army were incapable of discharging their duty, he thought that accusation was most unwarranted. On the contrary, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and danger, they had performed their duties in a manner which had elicited the general approbation of their country. He (Lord Lovaine) denied that it was the fault of the regimental officers of the British army that their men in the Crimea had not been properly fed and hatted. He knew that many of those officers had laboured with their own hands to feed, to clothe, and to assist their men. Not a word of complaint had been breathed against the regimental officers with regard to the state of affairs in the Crimea, but the mismanagement was attributed to officers who had passed the position in which they could be promoted by seniority, and who had attained a rank in which they could only be promoted by merit, or, in other words, by favour. The hon. Gentleman had said the officers of the English army were not fit to discharge the duty of company officers or commanders of regiments, because they were merely amateurs; but this was a most gratuitous assumption. Why did not British officers remain long in the army? Because they could not hope to attain a rank which would reward them for their services; and if the House abolished the system of purchase they would preclude officers from attaining any considerable rank in the army until they were utterly worn out and incapable of service. It was, however, impossible to please some hon. Gentlemen. On the one side it was said that promotion by purchase was an abominable system ; on the other hand it was maintained that there must be young officers in the ranks ; and it was useless to prove, as had been shown again and again by the hon. and gallant Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay), that unless the purchase system continued the junior rank of officers could not be kept in anything like a safe condition, but must be clogged with men who were unable to discharge their duties. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing) had referred to the constitution of foreign armies ; but he had omitted to mention that in all countries, except England, the armies were raised, as a rule, by the system of conscription. Men from every rank of life were forced into the service in foreign armies, and it followed as a necessary consequence, that the system of promotion in those armies was based upon a very different footing to that which existed in the British army. The hon. Gentleman, however, was probably not aware that the complaints with regard to the system of promotion in foreign armies were quite as general and as loud as in the British service. If the hon. Member visited the French army in the Crimea, and asked the soldiers what was their chance of promotion or decoration, they would reply, "A certain number of our men are promoted by seniority, but for every man promoted on that principle another is promoted by merit or by favour," and he (Lord Lovaine) could assure the hon. Member for Wick that merit and favour were so completely blended that it was extremely difficult to draw a line between them. The officers of the army in the Crimea, to whom blame had been attributed, were those who did not obtain promotion by the system of purchase, for they were officers of the Medical and Commissariat departments. "Oh," it was said, "no wonder the Commissariat has broken down, for the Government make the appointments, and they trust to their own nominees." But, would not the same complaint be made with respect to the army generally if all the promotions were in the hands of the Government ? With regard to the medical department, he must say he thought it had been very severely handled. Doubtless that system had its defects, and the officers had allowed themselves to be tied up by regulations more closely than they ought to have done, but he could not forget the enormous labour and responsibility which had been suddenly thrown upon the department, and, if it had failed, it had certainly failed under circumstances of unparalleled difficulty. They had been told the army was unpopular, but he begged to remind the House that recruits had lately been entering the ranks of the army by hundreds, while the measures to obtain seamen for the naval service had not been so successful. When complaints were made of the inefficiency of the Commissariat, it should be remembered that that department had been almost annihilated by the parsimonious economy of late years, and that when officers were required for the Crimea, only one old man could be found who was at all acquainted with the routine duties of the service, the details of which were necessarily entrusted to new and inexperienced hands. It was unfair to compare the army of England with that of France or of Austria, because for the last eight-and-twenty years our army had not been on a warlike footing, or fighting on a foreign soil, as the armies of those countries had been. There was nothing more easy than to find fault, but it was rather difficult to act without fault, or to point out the proper remedy. The army was now exposed to circumstances of great difficulty, and whatever might be the desire of hon. Members to stand well with their constituents, he doubted whether at this moment, when the country was engaged in war, they ought to entertain a motion like the present. He should certainly vote against it.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he thought that if by chance any stranger should be in the House, he would be struck with the singular course which their debates had that night taken. They opened with a grand proposition to reconstitute the kingdom of Poland, and, in spite of the power of Austria, of Prussia, and of Russia, to re-establish that kingdom on its ancient limits ; but after a few moments the House subsided into a more practical vein, and an hon. and gallant Member got up to address them who described our army as totally disorganised, as unfit for any purpose whatever, and requiring to be re-established de novo—there being in fact no army, in the right sense, at all. Now this certainly contrasted very curiously with the previous debate. The hon. and gallant officer (Major Reed) who brought forward this question, complained of the system of promotion in the army, and stated that all the errors in promotion arose from the system of purchase. If any one inquired rightly, however, he would find that the system of purchase had very little to do with the errors of which the hon. and gallant Member complained. He (Lord Seymour) had no preference for purchase, and if asked how he would constitute an army for the first time he should certainly not declare in favour of that system. But when we were told that we must do away with purchase, and have promotion by merit, he would ask hon. Members what was meant by merit; how were we to get at it; and who was to be the judge of merit? Was it to be the officer in the command of the army? There was lately a promotion of the staff, and we heard immediately that these were the very promotions that should not have been made. But who made them? The commander of the army, who ought to know best the merits of his officers. Then, was it to him the judgment of merit was to be left? Certainly not. Was it to the Government? He should like to see the unfortunate Government that would undertake promotion by merit. Why, every time a man was passed over we should have ten or a dozen Members rising in that House to defend an absent man, and the cause of a meritorious officer, whose merits had been overlooked by the Government, and his whole career in Canada, or some other of the Colonies, would be brought forward in justification of the complaint. Look again at the case of the navy. The promotions in the navy were for a time said to be by merit, and what stopped it? The influence of that House. The House of Commons interfered, and carried it in favour of seniority again. So would it ever be where there was a representative Government. It might have been easy enough for Napoleon, at the head of his army, to select men by merit. It was his interest to have the best men, and he had the eye and discrimination to choose them. But if they looked into his history, they would find that great difficulties beset him in his endeavours to give effect to the system. The jealousies and envyings of the different marshals led to many of his troubles in Spain, if not to the defeat of his power in that country. A most important question was, how were we to get at merit? In time of war it was difficult; but what was meant by merit in time of peace? The hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) said we must have examinations; but by whom was a lieutenant colonel to be examined? How long would such a system last in this country? In the Commissariat there was no preferment till the attainments of a candidate were tested by trial and examination. There was a perfect system of probation and inquiry established, so as to make the selection of officers depend on the recorded merits and services of the past. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had the power of choosing the officers by merit, and he believed the duty was very impartially done; but in time of peace it was extremely difficult to choose on this principle. The noble Lord opposite had spoken of the unsatisfactory state of the Commissariat; but in time of peace how was it possible to distinguish those qualities that were required in war? When the Committee on the Army Estimates was sitting, Lord Raglan, then at the Horse Guards, told them that as for attempting to make a good Commissariat for war in time of peace, it was out of the question—it could not be done; and he believed that what Lord Raglan stated had been borne out by facts. They were told to look at the military system in France; but, if we adopted the French mode, we must also adopt a different system of retirement. We were told that the present system had totally failed, but he did not see that our officers had in any way failed. On the contrary, he thought that they had behaved admirably. It was said that at Inkerman there were no generals. If on the field of battle at Inkerman it was so dark that a man could not see four yards, there was not much room for generalship; but the question was, how did the officers perform their duty? He believed that they discharged their duties well, and that they fought most gallantly. In the Artillery there was no purchase, and that had been complained of as a great evil. They were told, moreover, that there was no branch of the army where officers so old and infirm remained fixed in the service. Yet it was proposed to adopt throughout the whole army that system which had been found to fail in the Artillery. The Duke of Wellington stated before the Commission that when he was Master General of the Ordnance in 1823, he allowed a certain number of officers to sell out, in order to get new blood into the service. To effect the improvement he desired, he was obliged to adopt that portion of the purchase system that consisted in sale, in order to get certain men removed from their places. He thought that before Gentlemen brought forward a subject of this kind they ought to read the evidence that had been published upon it, so as to enable them to deal with the first principles of the question. This was not a subject on which hon. Members should make mere declamatory speeches, but what was wanted was to deal with it as a practical question, and see what really could be done. He must say that he objected somewhat to that speech made a short time ago upon this subject by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. The hon. and gallant Member had commanded a division with great gallantry, and his conduct had met with the approval of every one in the country and in the army; but when he made that speech, he (Lord Seymour) could not help feeling that he was not listening to the general commanding a division, but to the Member for Westminster. The hon. and gallant Member's position as a representative appeared to interfere with the view which, as a military man, he otherwise would have taken. With regard to the Motion before the House, there was something of what might be called an Irish look about it; for it affirmed the very point which it called upon the proposed Committee to inquire into. Whatever might be the result of the inquiry, the Motion directed the Committee to recommend a more efficient system for securing promotion to merit and long service. Now, if the result was to be anticipated, the House might as well be spared the trouble of making another blue book and the labour of the inquiry. It was right that this subject should be brought forward and discussed, but he did not think that any ground had been laid for the appointment of a Committee.

MR. LOWE said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord that this was eminently a practical question, and it was perfectly true that before any Gentleman presumed to address the House on it he ought to make himself acquainted with the documents to which the noble Lord had referred. He (Mr. Lowe) had done so, and therefore he took the liberty, with great humility as a civilian, to offer an opinion in the matter. After much careful examination, it appeared to him that the proposed Committee should be granted. In the first place, it appeared to him that the previous Commissions and Committees had all been held under circumstances very disadvantageous for a fair and impartial examination of the subject, because they were held under the overpowering influence of that illustrious man who then presided over the affairs of the army. It was quite clear to any one who examined the evidence given before the Commissions of which the Duke of Wellington was at the head that all the witnesses spoke as if appalled by the genius of the man before whom they spoke, and to whom they bowed with submission and deference. The witnesses did not take the trouble of addressing the Commission generally, but directed their evidence individually to the noble chairman, as if fully impressed with the necessity and duty of conforming to the opinions of the illustrious Wellington. To every question it was answered, "Your Grace knows this;" "My opinions coincide with your Grace's." That was the style in which most of the eminent military officers gave their evidence. Now that that great man was lost to the country—a great and irreparable loss—let the House see whether it might not obtain some compensation in having such a free inquiry as the overpowering eminence of his name and character previously prevented. There appeared to be ground for inquiry in the fact alone that there existed three several modes of promotion—by seniority, by purchase, and by favour. Those modes could not all be equally good, and therefore it was worth while knowing which was the best; and if it turned out that all three should be simultaneously employed, it seemed worth ascertaining whether they were all now employed in the right way. He maintained that there were peculiar merits and defects in each of those modes of promotion, and that it was now so contrived that they were all employed at the greatest disadvantage, whereby the good derivable from each was minimised and the evil maximised. The great merit of the system of seniority was, that whatever collateral evils it might carry with it, it did justice between man and man, as the circumstance of age was common to all. The defect was that the system, though fair to individuals, was fatal to the service. It created, instead of a list of men fitted to discharge the duties supposed to be annexed to their respective ranks, a mere pension list—a list of men whose title to receive pay was no indication of their capability to perform the duties annexed to their stations. Promotion by seniority had a tendency to make the service inefficient, and to encumber it with old and effete officers, who had outlived the power of discharging the duties for which they received pay. When, therefore, was the proper period at which the system of sen-

ority ought to be applied? Obviously, when men were young, if at all—when even the seniors were not worn out. But that was not the practice. At present the system of seniority was banished from the junior ranks almost entirely, and applied to the senior ranks, all above lieutenant colonels being promoted by seniority. Therefore, the system of seniority was used at the very greatest mechanical disadvantage, where it produced most of the evil it was calculated to effect, instead of being applied where it would do the least. Then, with regard to the system of purchase—that had a good and an evil side also. The good was, that it enabled inefficient persons, or men having no taste for the profession of arms, to get out of it, and relieved the army of them. The system of purchase was not advocated as good in itself, but as being a corrective of the evils of the system of seniority; and the system of purchase, however defective in theory, was held as a relief in respect to the system of seniority, which would otherwise become intolerable. Consequently, the system of purchase should be applied when officers were growing old and effete, but, in practice, it was applied in exactly the reverse manner, when men were young and vigorous; and when they were growing old and exhausted, and would be likely to avail themselves of the system of purchase, then it was abandoned and the system of seniority was adopted. Then, there was the third system of promotion, by favour; in which there were also good and evil. The evil was, that the person who promoted by favour might appoint unworthy people; and the good was, that the system afforded the opportunity of promoting worthy people, whom routine would keep from rising. But the power of the Crown to promote men by favour had been restricted up to a recent period, till they were almost past the age for service, and no selection could avail, therefore he maintained that all the three different modes of promotions had been employed exactly at those times of life and periods of service when they were least likely to do good, and most likely to do mischief. All this was matter, therefore, for inquiry. He preferred to argue the question on abstract grounds rather than with reference to the conduct of the army; for if the question were argued on the latter ground it was likely to be swamped by general laudation, and the answer to all objections would be indiscriminate praise. He recapitulated the merits and demerits of the different modes of promotion, and observed that the system of purchase, though it afforded facilities for getting rid of inefficient men, had this evil with it—that, as it enabled men to leave the army, receiving back every farthing of money which they had paid for their commissions, it taught them to regard the profession not as one to which they must be attached for life, in fact not as a profession at all. Thus, though the British officers were, in intelligence and general education, perhaps superior to the officers of any other army, they were not so well educated in military science. With respect to their courage, that had been shown on a 100 fields, and brilliantly in the course of last year; but the effect of this system of purchase was that when the officers were called on to endure extraordinary hardships and misery, they, having once given proof of their courage in facing the enemy, felt a desire to retire from a profession, a retreat from which was always open, and that accounted for the numerous applications which they had heard had been preferred to Lord Raglan by officers for permission to leave the army in the Crimea under the melancholy circumstances of the recent campaign. Then, again, the notion of a commander in chief, or any other functionary, fixing the price of an article, without regard to and in defiance of the laws of demand and supply, was entirely contrary to every principle of political economy. But for an officer to give more than the fixed price was by the regulations declared a misdemeanor, so that an officer who rose in the service must do so by a series of misdemeanors, punishable by fine and imprisonment. It was said that commissions were never put up to auction; but while that might be strictly true in fact, he appealed to hon. and gallant Members to state whether, when there were three officers in a regiment open to purchase, it was not the practice for one of the three to give the other two a sum of money not to buy? Now, was that a proper mode of dealing with promotion in the army? The noble Lord who preceded him was exceedingly anxious that, where meritorious men could be found, they should be promoted from the ranks; but what was the use of promoting men from the ranks unless you gave them the full benefit of their profession? It was all very well for them to obtain such promotion in time of war, when advancement might be rapid, but in time of peace it was a mere mockery to tell the soldier you were opening a career of honour to him by raising him from the ranks, when the want of money closed his further promotion. If they wanted to make the army a profession like law or medicine, they must hit upon some device, not merely for promoting the soldier from the ranks, but which should also make him feel that his first promotion might lead to indefinite promotion. It would be unnecessary for him to allude to the question of favour, for that was a thing universally condemned. Favour in theory generally meant merit, but he was afraid that in practice merit meant favour. He believed a remedy might be found for the evils complained of under the present system, which, though certainly expensive, would yet be worth all its cost. No cost, indeed, could be too great to enable this country, in the present state of the world, to maintain an army in a high state of efficiency. The introduction of steam had broken down our old defences, and to supply their place we must give to the army an organisation which would place it in a position to compete with the world. During the long time of peace we had sold, as it were, our sword and buckler, and we must buy them back at any price. The free institutions of this country forbade the adoption of the conscription of foreign nations, but we must have a system which would equal it in efficiency, and which would have as powerful effect on the will as that compulsory process. We must have a system, in fact, under which the private soldier, if properly educated and properly conducted, would have open to him, as in foreign armies, the prospect of rising to the highest honours of his profession. For her future defence England would have to trust to an army organised on some system of this kind—an army, moreover, no longer scattered over distant colonies where they were not needed, but concentrated in a compact phalanx at home, ready to meet any enemy who might menace her shores. Not to be a mere dilettante on this question, he had endeavoured to frame some specific plan by which the objects desired by all might be obtained. It appeared to him that up to the rank of captain there was no difficulty whatever, it was there that the pinch began; for, as there were only two majorities to every ten captaincies, eight captains of course were left to be disposed of. Up to the rank of captain he saw no objection to the system of promotion by seniority being adopted, provided that at each step every officer should undergo an examination sufficiently strict to satisfy the examiners, that he merited his promotion. After this rank he would suggest that all should be considered staff appointments, which should be, as now, in the patronage of the Commander in Chief, subject to this condition, that no appointment should be given to any officer who should not have been promoted for extraordinary gallantry, or who should not have passed such an examination as to satisfy the examiners that he was a fit person for such appointment. The board of examiners he would have sitting at stated periods, and any officer should have the privilege of presenting himself before it for examination. He did not mean to say that this system would of necessity create great commanders, but it would at least secure us from having officers placed on the quartermaster's staff who did not know a vertical from a horizontal line, or from having officers sent to act in concert with the French army who did not understand a word of French. It would prevent the possibility of inexperienced young men being placed in positions where the lives of hundreds might depend upon their capacities for duties with which they had never before had the slightest acquaintance, and secure our armies from being commanded by men altogether ignorant of their duties. He of course did not expect that great genius would be secured by that means; but he was firmly convinced the plan would insure talent and efficiency. It might not produce great generals, but it would provide able officers, and he certainly considered that it was worth the cost of trying. The adoption of a system of this description would of course necessitate the abandonment of the system of purchase for the future, and when officers at present in the army, who had purchased, desired to leave the service the country of course would have to buy their commissions from them. This, no doubt, would be a heavy expense, but if no other difficulty stood in the way, any number of millions, he believed, would be well spent by a rich country such as this, in organising an army to which it could implicitly trust for the defence of the immense wealth which it had amassed. It had been urged before, by the Duke of Wellington more particularly, and he had no doubt it would be urged again, that the present was an excellent system, because under it the country got the services of officers gratuitously. True, if we could always be sure of getting good service for nothing the system would be an excellent one, and the bargain a good one for the country, but was it in human nature that it should be so? Would any hon. Member in that House, engaged in mercantile pursuits, be willing to accept the services of a clerk who would work for nothing? The Duke of Wellington, in the memorandum which he laid before the Committee, so often referred to, put the case in this way;—the colonel of a cavalry regiment paid 6,115*l.*, the regulation price, (he really pays much more) for his commission—the interest on which, at 4 per cent, was 247*l.* per annum. His pay was 419*l.*—the difference between this sum and 247*l.* was 172*l.*, which was therefore the actual sum he received for his services. "Look what a good bargain this is for the country," said the illustrious Duke; but he (Mr. Lowe) on the contrary thought it a very bad bargain, and for this reason—the country paid—419*l.* a year to the colonel of cavalry for his services; but this sum was divided into two parts—the man in command, who did all the work, got 172*l.*; and the man who had sold out, who was out of the service altogether, and did no work at all, got 247*l.*, something like two-thirds of the money thus went to the non-effective part of the service, and the rest to the effective; and this was the way in which the greater part of the army was paid. 419*l.* was no great salary for a merchant's clerk, yet this was the sum we gave to a lieutenant-colonel; and indeed this scanty remuneration was subject to heavy deductions, so that, in fact, such an officer served the country gratuitously, and perhaps even at a pecuniary loss to himself. He had only one more remark to make. The noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) said that promotion by merit in this country was impossible—that Napoleon had promoted his officers on that principle, which might indeed be followed in foreign countries, but could not be adopted in England. Let them seriously consider what that statement, if true, amounted to. It amounted to this—that we were to fight with foils against men with sharp swords; that we were to fight by means of officers chosen, at best, by a happy accident, against an enemy who selected his officers by merit, and with the most earnest desire to secure the services of the best men that he could command. It amounted to this—that whereas a despot could have a perfect sympathy with the country he ruled over, the House of Commons, the representative chamber of a free country, and the Government which that chamber appointed, had no such sympathy with this nation; that whereas the Emperor Napoleon, or the Czar Nicholas, felt so keenly for the honour of his country that no considerations of family influence, or friendship, or favouritism were suffered for an instant to weigh with him, but were sacrificed without remorse to the paramount object of getting at the fittest men to lead his armies, the House of Commons of Great Britain, the chosen of the people, who were apt to boast of their intimate connection with their constituents, of a nearer and deeper sympathy with the feelings of the people than could possibly subsist between a despotic sovereign and his subject slaves, had so little sense of honour, so little sentiment of patriotism that, if a Minister, for the public good, for the welfare of the country, and perhaps for its very preservation, dared to break through the ties of family and the influences of personal friendship, they would place an insuperable obstacle in his way, and say that it should not be done—that England might perish, but commands in its army must continue to be jobbed or distributed by favouritism. This was not to be believed until the experiment had been tried and had failed. Until this had been done, nobody had a right to say that Representative Government was unable to cope with despotism in this respect. To what were we to trust for the preservation of the country from year to year, unless we resorted to the principle on which every man in this country conducted his private affairs, and which was adopted by those absolute Governments which we looked down upon? If we could not do that, then the question came to this, was England any longer to exist as an independent State, or should the House of Commons be swept away? And if driven to such a fearful alternative, he for one would be prepared to say—"Let England be independent, and let the House of Commons perish."

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought that the speech to which they had just listened showed that an hon. Member, as intelligent as the hon. Member for Kidderminster, yet unaccustomed to military details, might read blue books, and yet afterwards display considerable ignorance of the subject to which they referred. He had listened very attentively to the hon. Gentleman, but he was really unable to discover what his views were upon the subject. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had very freely and didactically criticised different modes of promotion in the army, and condemned every one of them in succession, but he had not vouchsafed any explanation of his own views of how promotion should be conducted. The Committees of that House which had sat on questions relating to the army had not, as was alleged, been so much overruled by the influence of the late Duke of Wellington as by a spirit of false and fatal economy; and from the speeches that had been delivered that night it might reasonably be doubted whether the appointment of a Committee on promotion would do much for the future efficiency of the service. The regular practice in the army was, that if an officer was ready to pay the regulation price no man could be promoted over his head; and, therefore, the instance of hardship that had been adduced against the present system in the course of that discussion resolved themselves into mere accusations against the noble Lord at the head of the army in his administration of that system. No officer would defend the principle of purchase in the abstract, nor, if we were for the first time forming an army, introduce it into the system; but before it could be entirely done away with, the House must first make up their minds to vote large sums of money, in order to buy up existing interests, and also to pay the army as it ought to be paid, and it was not likely they would be disposed to do either the one or the other when the question came before them. No man could say he was sincere in his wish to abolish the system of purchase who was not prepared to vote at least twenty millions to remunerate vested interests. Why, at the present moment the Government were actually selling commissions on their own account, and yet nobody denounced it, because the proceeds brought a balance to the Exchequer, and tended to reduce the half-pay list. Well, now that was just the feeling which stood in the way of abolishing promotion by purchase; but still the fact was, the system was not to blame for our disasters in the Crimea, because, in spite of its many objections, it had produced good officers. They might talk as they pleased of applying commercial principles to the army, but it was a feeling of honour and a laudable thirst for glory which inspired the British soldier to advance to the cannon's mouth, and no mere sordid calculation whether he could thereby secure 400*l.* a year. What the army really complained of was, that officers were selected for the staff who were not qualified for it, and then promoted without possessing any peculiar merit. A return recently obtained showed that out of fifty-one promotions of captains forty-two were given to the staff. This was a substantial grievance which ought to be redressed. Our failures were not due to the existing system, but rather to the maladministration of the heads of the civil departments of the army, whose offices should be intrusted to competent military men, and then the system might be expected to work satisfactorily. If that change were made, he should be sorry to see the system of the French army substituted for our own. No other army in the world but the British would have endured so much suffering in the manner which our officers and men had done. The Government sent an army into the field without a Commissariat, or any of the other indispensable adjuncts, as if it would only have to go through a promenade militaire, and, when failure naturally resulted from such mismanagement, they turned round and made absurd and unjust complaints against the regimental officers. He was not opposed to reform in the army, but he did not believe, whatever hon. Members might say to the contrary, that the House, or even the country, would be willing, if put to the test, to vote 5,000,000*l.*, or some other large sum, which would be absolutely necessary, in order to effect an equitable abolition of the system of selling commissions.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, if every one of the seven sleepers, whose history we have read could have happened to wake up, after their many years' slumber, and, being ignorant of what is passing in Europe, had come suddenly into this House to be present at this debate, judging from the speeches we have heard, they would have gone away with the melancholy conviction that this country had sustained some great military disaster, and that we were on the point of being conquered by some great military power, and that this House, with Roman or even with Spartan fortitude, were deliberating in the midst of impending disasters, upon the best means to be adopted for saving the state from threatened destruction. But what, Sir, is the real state of things? Has our army sustained defeats in the field? Have our officers shown themselves unequal to the duties which they have had to perform? Have we, as represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) found the people of this country unwilling to enlist themselves under the banner of their Sovereign to vindicate the honour of the country and to maintain the contest in which we are engaged? Looking at our army, we find that it has achieved as great success as at any former period of our history. Instead of finding the people of this country hang back and shrink from the engagement of the military service, there never was a time at which so many brave men have offered themselves to be enrolled in the ranks of our army. As far, therefore, as any change is demanded for the purpose of encouraging the people of this country to enlist, I say that no change is required, because the enlistment is going on with the utmost rapidity, and with the greatest possible success. But then it is said that the system which now exists is fatal to the army by depriving it of a proper supply of regimental officers, for it is in regimental organisation, be it observed, that this system of purchase and sale exists. Now, Sir, I undertake to say that there never was in the history of the world a set of men who so nobly and efficiently perform their duty as our regimental officers. What is the test of the good conduct of officers? Why it is, in the first place, to obtain the goodwill of their men—it is not only to share with their men in the dangers of the fight, but to endure with them all the privations and sufferings to which the service may expose them. Now, I ask, have our officers ever shrunk from their duty in the field of battle? Have they not led their men to victory in conquests in which more honour and glory have been reaped than almost ever fell to the fortune of arms on any former occasion? I say that the manner in which the men followed their officers, and the manner in which the officers led the men, proves that there existed between them a community and brotherhood of feeling which is the result of reciprocal confidence in each other, and which shows that the officers are worthy of the men, as the men are worthy of those who are placed at their head. Well then, have the officers shrunk from those sufferings and privations, which never were exceeded, and which probably have been seldom, if ever, equalled? Why, we know very well that the soldiers of the army in the Crimea, when asked about their own sufferings, have said, "Well, it is true we are suffering much, but our officers are sharing the same suffering with us—they are not so accustomed to hardships as we are, and while they are suffering without complaint, it is not for us to be murmuring at what we undergo." So far as the motion of the hon. and gallant gentleman (Major Reed) is founded upon the experience of what the army is, I think that the grounds on which he had attempted to place it, entirely fail. I admit, as I have done on a former occasion, that if we were planning an army for the first time, it is not likely that we should propose to establish it upon a system of purchase and of sale. But there it is; and even those who have endeavoured to point out the evils which they attribute to the system, have shrunk, when they came to the point, from suggesting the only way in which it could be got rid of. The hon. and gallant gentleman who has brought forward the subject seemed to me to steer studiously clear of making any suggestion as to what method should be adopted to amend what he conceives to be a vicious and inefficient system. But we all know that there is only one way of getting rid of it; and that is in the manner which has been suggested by others, namely, that the country should buy up the commissions which have been bought and paid for by the officers of the army. If the evils of the present system were so great and so pregnant in their consequences as to make it worth while to the country to incur that large expense, it might be done. But let not hon. Gentlemen go away with any erroneous impression that such a system can be put an end to without a great pecuniary sacrifice. Although the system is open to objection in point of principle, yet it is admitted by all, that practically it is not without some advantages. The system of promotion by seniority leads to a great accumulation, in the higher ranks of the service, of men who from age and infirmity are incapable of performing the duties which belong to their position. That is admitted to be a very great fault in those branches of our service in which seniority alone exists, and in which purchase and sale do not exist—in the Artillery and Engineers, for instance. Now, in the service in which there is no purchase and sale to remove those who are desirous of retiring, the only way in which accumulations can be prevented is by placing upon the retired list of pensioners to the State those officers who reach a certain age, and who it must be assumed from their age are no longer fit for active duty. That system was adopted in France. I believe that, in the French army, officers sixty-five years of age are placed on the retired list, and I remember hearing it said that when the regulation was proposed to Louis Philippe he observed that he would adopt it for the army, but he hoped that his Ministers would not advise him to pass a Royal Ordinance making that rule applicable to Kings. That system no doubt would, to some degree, exempt the principle of seniority from the disadvantage of loading the upper ranks in the army with a great number of men advanced in life; but, on the other hand, it would entail a considerable expense on the country, and would frequently deprive it of the service of men quite able to perform active and efficient duties. One great advantage which is represented as likely to accrue from the abolition of purchase and sale is, that men would be certain that promotion would go by merit. Now, in the navy there is no purchase and sale. In the navy, therefore, we might expect to hear that the system of promotion was free from any possibility of cavil and objection. But the moment the navy is mentioned, up get naval officers on both sides of the House and complain that promotions all go by favour, or affection, or interest—by every mode, in short, except by a due appreciation of the merits of the respective candidates. That, then, is the state to which the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman would tend to bring the army. The fact is, that when you say that promotion should go by merit, nothing in the world is easier than to make such an assertion; but nothing in the world is more difficult than to carry such a system into practice. If you would establish a rule that promotion should go by stature—that no man should be promoted who did not stand six feet high—that promotion should go by physical qualities discernible by the eye—it would be easy in that case to establish a rule, and to ensure its most rigid execution. But what is merit? Merit is opinion—merit is the opinion which one man forms of another. Well, but the man with whom it may rest to exercise a judgment forms his opinion of the merits of the different candidates from the appointments which may be vacant; but his opinion is sure to be disputed by a great many disinterested judges, and certain to be denied by all the friends of the persons who are unsuccessful candidates on the occasion. Therefore, the idea that by any human system merit can ensure the selection of persons for appointments, civil or military, who shall be universally acknowledged to be appointed for merit alone, is a Utopia which it is perfectly vain for anybody to hope to see established in this or any country whatever. It is a great mistake to suppose that in the armies of the Continent no murmurs relative to promotion arise, and that no fault is found—that in the French army, the Austrian army, the Russian army, the Prussian army, every man is satisfied that every appointment is filled by the most deserving, and that there exist no complaints on the part of the unsuccessful candidates. If hon. Members labour under that impression, I can assure them that they are mistaken, and that there are as many complaints that favouritism and not merit leads to promotion as we hear in this House when these subjects are brought under discussion. I am much disposed to agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kidderminster, who, reviewing the three systems by which promotion might take place—namely, purchase, seniority, and merit—seemed to condemn each and all. He seemed to make out that they were all vicious; and although he did not supply the thought, his argument tended to show that you ought to abolish all. What is to be substituted in their stead I do not know, unless he imagines that a combination of the three would by some chemical process neutralise the vicious propensities of each, and bring forth a neutral salt freed from the acid which appertains to each of these methods in a separate form, I believe the fact to be, that there is no such practical evil in our regimental system as to render it absolutely necessary for the country to make great sacrifices to get rid of it—that it could not be got rid of without great sacrifices—and all that I think desirable is, that we should lay the foundation for the more general instruction of our regimental officers in those staff duties which are not to be learned simply as a matter of form, but the knowledge of which is essentially necessary for the good conduct of operations in the field. When I deny that there has been any inefficiency on the part of the regimental officers, if I am asked to what I attribute those sufferings which have, in some degree, been endured by our army in the Crimea, I would rather not give my opinion on that point, but remind the House that there is a Committee now employed in investigating those very circumstances, and I must say I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Reed) would do better to wait for the report of that Committee, which, no doubt, will probe the matter to the bottom, and which will tell you, when they have finished their inquiries, the cause of those unfortunate mischances which have occasioned so much suffering—unnecessary suffering, in my opinion—to those gallant men who are now employed in the Crimea. I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman has not laid any sufficient ground to induce the House to adopt the course which he recommends. But I have a further objection to his course of proceeding. I think it is not in harmony with the proper principles of our constitution. After all is said and done, without meaning in the least degree to question the power of this House to take into its consideration any matters of public interest, I beg them to recollect that the command of the army is, by the constitution of the country, vested in the Crown, and not in the House of Commons. Now, Sir, the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman seems to be founded on the assumption that the command of the army is vested in the House of Commons, and that a Committee of this House is a proper tribunal to consider matters purely regarding the practical administration of that army. I think we are very apt to lose sight in some degree of our proper and useful functions. I do not think there would be any advantage in appointing a Committee to take into consideration those questions connected with the interior economy of our army. I think that such inquiries ought to be made by a Commission emanating from the Crown and reporting to the Crown, which report might afterwards be communicated to the House of Commons for any purposes for which the House might require it. But I think this House is not the authority which ought properly to institute any inquiries of this kind. That being the opinion which I entertain on this subject, I certainly cannot consent to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The discussion which has taken place may be useful in pointing out to the Government certain matters for consideration. I can assure the House that Her Majesty's Government will be always glad to hear suggestions, and will anxiously desire to profit by them, as far as they can do so consistently with the public advantage. But with that reservation I must certainly give my opposition to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

MR. RICH said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who brought forward the Motion included in it a recommendation that the Committee should recommend a more efficient system of patronage. He was inclined to vote for the first part of the Motion, but he would suggest to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that it would be better to omit the latter. At the same time he must observe that he had listened in vain for any reason for the maintenance of the present system. If the system of purchase were applied to the Church, it would be called simony; if to the civil Government, it would be termed corruption; and if to the bench, venality. Why, then, should they apply it to the army? An hon. Gentleman had spoken of the difficulty of discovering merit. If that were a good argument, why not extend it to all the services of the State? He denied that the present system gave them young generals. At the commencement of the war the average age of the lieutenant-colonels was forty-seven years and a half.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, that, although he did not pretend to know much of military matters, still he knew that the expenses of an infantry or cavalry mess were such as to make it a great hardship, in the present state of things, for any sergeant from the ranks to be promoted to the position of a commissioned officer. This, he thought, that at least it formed a fitting subject for inquiry by a Select Committee, and the House ought not, therefore, to refuse the Motion. At the present time there was before the country the great and glaring fact of the want of an efficient system of promotion in the army, and the hon. and gallant Member who had proposed the appointment of a Committee to inquire into that subject was well deserving the support and sympathy of the House.

MAJOR REED said, all the opposition to the Motion had been hung on the late Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Huddersfield (Viscount Goderich), against promotion by purchase. That was not his (Major Reed's) Motion. He only said that the system of promotion by purchase was unfair to the soldier. Some hon. Gentlemen said he had offered no alternative. He could only say that he was not presumptuous enough to stand there, as one of the youngest Members of the House, and with his small military experience, to say that such a system was bad, and that they ought to adopt some other system. All he said was, let the House appoint a Committee, and let the Committee have before them men of experience, and let them report to the House. He regretted that he had not had the honour of being supported by Her Majesty's Government; but there was one satisfaction, it was a thing he could survive. He should be happy to give way to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich), and would withdraw the latter part of the Resolution, directing the Committee to recommend a more efficient system.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Motion made, and Question put,

CHINA TRADE.

MR. HORSFALL said, that in bringing forward the Motion of which he had given notice, he had no desire to ask for any papers the production of which would be detrimental to the public service; nor did he wish to say one word against the present Government or against the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department, to whose ability and attention he bore ready testimony. The question of our trade with China, however, was one of the greatest importance not only to the merchants of Liverpool and Manchester, as well as the metropolis, but to the whole consuming population of this country; and it was particularly so at a time when the necessities of the State had induced the Government to arrest the operations of the Act for the reduction of the duty upon tea. He must ask the House to go back with him to the year 1851, when certain disturbances occurred in China, and our Consul at Shanghai took upon himself to interfere in the collection of the Customs' revenue. At that time the merchants, both in China and England, remonstrated with the noble Lord the then Foreign Minister, who immediately acted with his accustomed promptitude, and issued orders to the effect that the British Consul should no longer do that for the Emperor of China which the Emperor's own servants would not do for him, and, in fact, that consular interference in the collection of Customs should not be permitted to continue. Those instructions would be found in the following letter:—

"Foreign Office, June 18th, 1851.

"Sir—I am directed by Viscount Palmerston to acquaint you in reply to your letter of this day's date, that Sir George Bonham was instructed by the Mail of last month to state to the Chinese High Commissioner, that as the Chinese authorities will not do their duty in preventing the Emperor of China from being defrauded of his just dues, the British Government can no longer order her Majesty's Consuls to do that for the Emperor of China, which the Emperor's own servants do not deem it necessary to do for him; and that consequently all interference on the part of the British Consular Authorities for the protection of the Chinese Revenue, will for the future be withheld. Sir George Bonham was further instructed to make such arrangements as might appear to him to be sufficient for carrying out the intentions of Her Majesty's Government in this respect.—I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

(Signed) "H. U. ADDINGTON."

It was, consequently, natural to suppose that instructions so clear and precise would be effectual; but, in September, 1853, grievances again broke out, and Mr. Alcock again resorted to the plan of collecting revenue for the Chinese authorities; Sir George Bonham, our Superintendent at Hong Kong, disapproved of consular interference, and referred the matter to the Home Government. On the 3rd of February the Chinese collector of revenue returned to Shanghai, with a distinct understanding that all nations were to be placed on the same footing, and it was settled that the duty should be paid upon the express condition that everybody should be treated alike. But this was not acted upon by the Chinese authorities, for, while the British merchants were giving bonds as securities for the payment of duties, the merchants of other nations were not required to do so. The British merchants protested against this, and claimed to be put upon the same footing as others were. While the American Consul declared Shanghai to be a free port, the British Consul exacted a bond from the British merchants as a security for the amount of the duty. Sir George Bonham disapproved of this also, and the matter was again referred home. On the 13th of April, Sir John Bowring arrived in China. His first act was to establish Consular Courts to decide upon the very questions which he knew had been referred home by Sir George Bonham for the decision of the British Government. The British merchants immediately protested against this proceeding. Sir John Bowring did not attempt to conceal that he knew that this matter had been referred home, for, in his reply to the protest of the British merchants, he admitted it, at the same time stating that he conceived the responsibility of allowing the Consular Courts to be accessible to the Chinese authorities for the recovery of duties rested wholly upon himself. Here then arose a difference of opinion between Her Majesty's Government at home and Her Majesty's representative at Shanghai. The noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department considered that the decision rested with the Home Government, and Sir John Bowring considered that it rested with him. The question at issue therefore was, whether the British Government would submit to Sir John Bowring's opinion, or whether he should be required to submit to the decision of Her Majesty's Government? On the 6th of June, 1854, Mr. Hammond wrote to the Liverpool Association, to the effect—

"Foreign Office, 6th June, 1854.

"To the Chairman of the Liverpool East India and China Association.

"Sir,—I am directed by the Earl of Clarendon to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter of 28th ultimo, and I am to state to you in reply, for the information of the Liverpool East India and China Association, that as Sir George Bonham is expected to arrive in England in the course of the present month, His Lordship thinks it desirable to postpone any decision, in regard to the question of the securities taken for Duties at Shanghai during the time that the Chinese Custom-house was in abeyance, until he shall have had an opportunity of personally communicating with Sir George Bonham.

"Her Majesty's Government will come to a decision on the subject as soon as Sir George Bonham returns to this country; and Lord Clarendon conceives that the arrangement which will be finally arrived at by the adoption of this course, even though it may occasion some slight delay in forwarding instructions to Sir John Bowring, will probably be more satisfactory than one made without the benefit of previous consultation with Sir George Bonham.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

"E. HAMMOND."

"Foreign Office, July 4, 1854.

"Sir,—With reference to the correspondence which has passed between you and this office respecting the securities taken by Her Majesty's

Consuls at Shanghai for duties which, in consequence of the state of affairs at that port, the Chinese authorities were themselves unable to collect, I am directed by the Earl of Clarendon to acquaint you that, after communication with Sir George Bonham and upon a full consideration of the question in all its bearings, Her Majesty's Government have decided that those securities shall be cancelled and returned to the parties by whom they were given, and instructions to that effect will be sent by the next mail to Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary and Chief Superintendent of British Trade in India.—I am, &c.,

"E. HAMMOND."

Now, presuming that instructions had been sent out in accordance with Lord Clarendon's promise which he had no right to doubt; what he wished to know on behalf of the British merchants in China, and of the merchants in this country interested in the China trade, was, why the bonds taken between the 9th of February and the 12th of July last had not been cancelled by Sir John Bowring in obedience to those instructions? He could conceive no answer to that question, except that Sir John Bowring was now exercising his own discretion in opposition to the discretion and instructions of Her Majesty's Government. All he desired was, that the British merchants should be placed on the same footing in this matter as the American merchants, so that the trade of this country with China might suffer no disadvantage. What the mercantile community required and what he thought it had a right to ask was, the cancellation of all bonds taken both before and after the 9th February; the nonintervention of British officials in the collection of the Chinese revenue, and the strict fulfilment of the treaty, that British subjects should be placed upon the same commercial footing as the subjects of other countries.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of all Instructions having reference to Trade, sent out by Her Majesty's Government to Her Majesty's Superintendent of Trade in China, subsequent to the 1st day of February 1854; also, of the Correspondence subsequent to that date, between Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Superintendent of Trade, having reference to British Trade in China, up to the present time."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the House might have collected from the statement of the hon. Gentleman that this was a question of a very complicated nature, involving a great variety of communications and transactions, in which the Chinese and other Governments, as well as Her Majesty's Government, were concerned. The correspondence was still going on, and, as he had already stated, in answer to the question put to him by the late hon. Member for Liverpool, (Mr. Liddell) Sir John Bowring had been called on to make a full Report in regard to those bonds, and in regard to the circumstances under which they were to be cancelled. Until that Report should be received, it was impossible for the Government to determine exactly what course they should pursue, and no advantage could be derived from an inquiry. Whenever that Report should be received, he was quite sure that his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office would give his careful attention to the matter, bearing in mind the duty which he owed to the British commercial interests and the just claims of the merchants engaged in the Chinese trade. Under these circumstances he trusted the hon. Gentleman would acquiesce in, at all events, postponing his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY.

On the bringing up the Report of the Committee of Supply.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he must complain of the manner in which the Civil Service Estimates had been hurried through on the previous evening. It had been his purpose to direct attention to a certain portion of those Estimates, but happening to have left his place for a short time, in order to hold a conversation with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, he found on his return that they had been disposed of. Now, he considered it a matter of reproach to the House that Estimates involving the outlay of a sum of nearly 4,000,000*l.* of money should have been so summarily disposed of, without the subject undergoing any test of discussion, and without due notice having been given that it was the intention of the Government to have forced them through at so late an hour of the night.

MR. WILSON said, he must defend the conduct of the Treasury bench, for the exigencies of the public service required that the estimates should be passed as rapidly as possible. After the 31st of March no authority would be possessed by the Treasury to defray the salaries of the civil servants of the Crown; and it became, therefore, of the last importance that not a moment should be lost in passing these Estimates—the more especially if the House hoped to adjourn on Friday next.

MR. MICHELL said, he thought the hon. Member (Mr. Macartney) perfectly warranted in complaining. He had himself intended calling attention to the way in which the subordinate clerks in the Custom House were treated, but such was the hurried manner in which these four votes were passed, that no one could inform him what was doing in the House at the time.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that the average salaries of the class of clerks especially referred to in the Report of Sir Charles Trevelyan did not amount to more than 150*l.* or, according to another account, 141*l.* a year, and, when you deducted the income tax and superannuation allowance, their salaries were reduced to between 120*l.* and 130*l.* a year. The Report to which he alluded stated that these persons performed inadequately the duties intrusted to them, but he wished it had also pointed out the exceeding inadequacy of their salaries. He thought the civil servants had been and were unjustly treated, and the Government ought to give the subject their best consideration.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was quite ready to admit that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wilson) had a difficulty to encounter in this matter. Still he would ask what was the value of the privilege which had been conceded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) when Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which enabled the House of Commons to criticise Estimates involving nearly 4,000,000*l.* of money, if they were to be thus disposed of. Last year these very Estimates were passed a few minutes before six o'clock on a Wednesday, all discussion therefore upon that occasion also was precluded, nor could any course be more calculated to bring the House of Commons into contempt than that which had been pursued on the subject of these Estimates; and let them then remember there were persons out of doors who watched their proceedings narrowly. Although he admitted the hon. Gentleman to be in some difficulty on the other point, if the public exigencies were so great, Government ought to have made timely provision. This year he believed the Estimate on account of the inland revenue exceeded that of last year, and he was extremely anxious therefore to have obtained some explanation on the matter.

All he could say now was that he trusted the House would secure itself for the future against a similar surprise.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was in the House at the time the Votes were taken, and it was by no means empty. Notice had been given, and any Member who wished to make observations upon the Votes would have done better to remain in his place. He advised the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Michell), if, on any future occasion, he could not understand or make out by his own ears what was going on, to ask the chairman what was the question.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he, also must complain that the Votes for the Irish Post Office had been taken out of their turn, because these Votes would lead to discussion.

Resolutions agreed to.

- The House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. VANCE in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that the measure affected not only merchants and persons connected with commerce, but professional men, country gentlemen, and all who in any way might become parties to a bill of exchange. He believed he should be able to show that the present measure would interfere with the general circulation of bills of exchange, which were the lifeblood of commerce; and also that it was calculated to prevent the fair division of the estates of insolvent debtors and interfere with the jurisdiction of the Irish courts; and that while on the one hand the provisions of the Bill might be used by the fraudulent debtor for the most dishonest purposes, they might on the other be resorted to as a measure of oppression against the willing and honest man. The Bill enacted that a registration office should be established for dishonoured bills of exchange, and that on notice of dishonour being served upon the persons who were parties to them immediate execution might, with leave of the judge, be issued against their effects. Now, by recent law reforms, judgment could be got in an undefended action upon a simple contract debt, in eight days; but in order to prevent undue preference, execution upon such judgment was stayed eight days more—making in the whole sixteen days—so that in the meantime a fiat in bankruptcy could be sued out, with a view to the fair division of the estate among the general body of the creditors. If however, the present Bill were passed, the holders of bills of exchange would have great advantages over other creditors, and there would be no kind of security against fraudulent preference. It had never been contended that a bill of exchange was anything more than a simple contract, and it was so stated by Mr. Chitty, in his work on Bills of Exchange, who defined it to be a simple contract, affected by the Statute of Limitations, and stated that it was used among merchants to avoid the necessity of transmitting money. Nothing more plainly proved, that this was the view the law took, than the fact that foreign bills of exchange may be accepted by a separate document, and not on the face of the bill itself. The 25th clause of this bill interfered with the jurisdiction of the Irish courts. It enabled a creditor who happened to hold a bill of exchange to which any person in Ireland was a party, whether as drawer, acceptor or endorser, to serve such party with a notice issued from a court in this county, and eventually to sue out execution against him. Hitherto the Irish traders had been very properly sued in Ireland, and this was the first time that the barrier between the two countries, with respect to legal arrangements, had been attempted to be broken down. Another clause of the bill inflicted great hardship on Irish debtors, by rendering it necessary for persons living at a distance to give security for costs or lodge the entire amount of the debt in the court, which in many cases might be attended with great inconvenience. A great deal had been said about frivolous defences being made to actions on bills of exchange. He assured the House that after having been for many years engaged in commercial transactions, and having had a great number of bills passed through his hands, he had never known a case, in which the bill of exchange was the result of a fair mercantile transaction, where a frivolous defence had been made; though it was likely enough that in the case of Jew bill-discounters, who gave nothing like full value for the bills, any sort of defence might be set up. He had analysed the petitions in favour of this Bill, and found nearly all of them were from Scotland, where a somewhat similar system of law had prevailed for many years; and he must say he saw no grounds for endeavouring to import Scotch law into this country;—they had avowedly a bad bankruptcy law, which the Lord Advocate had given notice of a Bill to amend and assimilate to the English practice. This measure was the production, he believed, of a noble Lord in the other House, who had not been at all fortunate in his commercial reforms, as instanced in the complete failure of the bankruptcy law introduced by him; and, considering that the present would be unproductive of every kind of benefit, he should oppose it to the fullest extent of his power.

MR. MUNTZ said, that he should have great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the hon. Member for Dublin. This was the same Bill that had been postponed last year for very obvious reasons; and no alteration had been made in the measure since that time; he had taken great pains in inquiring from all persons connected with commercial operations what their opinions were as to its character and effect; and the universal reply he had received was, that there was not the slightest necessity for the measure, the law as it stood at present being amply sufficient for all purposes of justice, and that a great deal more evil would be done to society by this measure than by letting the law remain as it is. Could anybody doubt that if the present measure passed, great injustice would be done to the endorser of bills? He would admit that the acceptor and drawer of a bill were bound to take care that it was duly provided for, but the position of an endorser was different. A man engaged in large transactions might endorse bills to the extent of 50,000*l.* or upwards, all of a bona fide character, which in consequence of a great pressure or panic might be returned on his hands in a few days, and, although perfectly solvent at the time, he might, if the holders were allowed to turn round on him, in eight days be as effectually ruined as if he did not possess a farthing; for, when a man was forced into the Bankruptcy Court, however great his assets might be, and however large the surplus, the estate was so frittered away, that on a division of the assets they were sure to be insufficient to meet all the claims. Why should the holder of a bill of exchange have this preference? What was it but an acknowledgment of a debt that was not yet due? It was said that there were frivolous and vexatious defences to bills; so there might be, but were there no frivolous and vexatious defences to actions of another character? If they wished to meet that evil, the better way would be to deal with it in a separate form. At present, claimants upon bills possessed two great advantages—first the easy proof of the debt, and, secondly, that it bore interest; and he agreed with his hon. Friend that to pass this measure would be to give the greatest facilities to the fraudulent debtor in preventing the fair division of his estate among his creditors. This was a measure which arose from excessive legislation by the legal profession. No persons, he believed, knew so little of the commerce of the country and of the principles by which it was regulated as those who were engaged in the legal profession. Though their vocation might be to recover debts, the Lord protect the nation against attempts at commercial legislation by them! He had pointed out to the noble Lord who originated this measure the effect it would produce on endorsers, and the reply he received was, that it worked well in Scotland; but he agreed with his hon. Friend on the opposite side that they did not want Scotch law. There were many bad as well as good Scotch laws, and he doubted whether, in the present case, the people of Scotland, in order to obtain a little more security for bills, did not sacrifice ten times the amount by the consequent restriction of commercial operations. If they must have an importation from Scotland he would recommend hon. Members to turn their attention to the Scotch banking system, which he admitted would, if introduced into this country, palliate many difficulties.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day Six Months."

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that this measure was not the conception of a legal mind, but had originated solely with persons connected with commerce; and the two hon. Members who had just addressed the House laboured under a misconception in supposing that commercial men throughout the country were opposed to this measure, for the fact was that, with the exception of Birmingham, there was not a single commercial town of importance in the country which had not petitioned the House in its favour. He held in his hand a list of those towns, which, with the permission of the House, he would read for the information of hon. Members. In that list were Liverpool, Leeds, Leicester, Bristol, Carlisle, Nottingham, Worcester, Glasgow, Bath, London, Huddersfield, Bradford, Cork, Belfast, Southampton, Edinburgh, Dundee, Manchester, Devonport, and Gateshead; altogether there were twenty-eight petitions from those places, and it must be remembered that those petitions were not only from merchants and tradesmen, but from the representatives of commercial men, the Chambers of Commerce. In the petition presented last year by the noble Lord the Member for London in favour of the measure were the names of the most respectable firms in the metropolis, and he was at a loss therefore to know what hon. Members could mean by stating that the commercial men of the country were opposed to the measure. He would not detain the House by demonstrating the soundness of the principle upon which the Bill was founded, but would merely remark that they were principles which had guided our law reformers during many years past. It was singular how much the writings of one man, Mr. Bentham, who had been described as the first philosophic writer of the last century, had contributed to the introduction of those reforms. At the time he wrote, what a wild jungle was the field of English law, how overgrown with weeds, how encumbered with nuisances, of every description, and how much had since been done in consequence of the adoption of his views. Two general principles were laid down by him—namely, that the foundation of all rules of law should be their tendency to promote the ends of justice; and that, in order to enable suitors to terminate their legal difficulties in the most speedy and economical manner, every facility ought to be granted to enable them to come before the judge at the earliest possible period of the suit before expenses were incurred or the passions of the parties inflamed. Applying these principles to the present Bill, he would inquire what was the existing state of the law? It was obvious that all the cases that came before the courts of law were divisible into two great classes—the first class comprehended those in which some legal difficulty was to be settled or principle established; and the second, where suitors were seeking to enforce a remedy against a consenting party to a contract, who was unwilling to perform it. It was obvious that these two classes of cases required very different modes of proceeding; in the first class of cases every opportunity should be given to bring forward the facts, and apply the legal arguments to them, which was necessarily a slow process; but, in the second, when no dispute of law or fact occurred, the claim ought to be presented before the judge at the earliest possible period. Now, how did the law stand with regard to bills of exchange? In the case of a bill of exchange where there was no difficulty about proof, but payment of which was only withheld because it was inconvenient to the debtor, what did the law allow him to do? It allowed him, in the first place, to appear to the action and put in all sorts of false and fraudulent pleas. The only effect of such proceedings was to gain time, for when the cases came on for hearing, judgment passed for the plaintiff in one second. The Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench said that he had had as many as sixteen of such cases to dispose of in one morning. The average cost of these undefended actions was 12*l.*; and if the defendant were insolvent, these costs were entirely thrown upon the plaintiff. It was clear that some remedy ought to be devised for such a state of things. The best arguments against the Bill proceeded from the Incorporated Law Society last year, but so strong was the case in favour of the Bill, that they had this year abandoned their opposition, and had brought forward another Bill, the preamble of which contained the main principle upon which the present law was founded. Last year the opposition to the Bill proceeded from some commercial men in the House, but nothing could be more weak than the arguments then used. It was said to be hard upon the debtor to be called upon to pay at so early a period after the debt was contracted, but that would be an unsound principle for the House to recognise, for it was of the first consequence that remedies to enforce contracts should be available in the earliest, simplest, and most speedy possible manner. His own experience in the administration of the law in a Court where he had the power to grant terms to defendants had convinced him that leniency to the debtor was unwise and unsound, even in the interest of the debtor himself. It was not in the nature of business men to be too hard upon their debtors. On the contrary, it was the interest of men engaged in business affairs to deal with each other on liberal terms, and the man who had the character of selling up his debtors too harshly would soon be known and avoided. Another argument against the Bill was used by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), who characterised this Bill as a job, and who, with his fine stature, stentorian voice, and the oaken cudgel which he usually carried when he addressed the House, used his argumentum baculinum with so much power and vigour that his feeble denial that there was any ground for such an assertion was of little avail. But as this was a small assembly, and as it was now early in the day, and as we were not in the piping month of August, as when this Bill was discussed last year, he would venture to say, in opposition to his hon. Friend, that he could not trace the least suspicion of a job in any of the clauses of this Bill. He would say for himself, that he was as much averse to a job as any Member of that House, and having once had judicial patronage of his own, his assertion might be tested by experience. There was in the Bill of last year a clause providing a salary for the officers to be appointed under the measure. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) pointed out the undesirableness of payment by fees; and accordingly he (Sir Erskine Perry) had withdrawn that clause, and had inserted another, which was the only one for which he was responsible. By that clause, following the legislation of the last few years, he had taken the patronage from the judges, to whom it had at first been proposed to give it, and had placed it in the hands of the Ministers of the Crown who might be called upon at any time in Parliament to account for any improper exercise of that patronage. On the other hand, the judges of the land had functions of so solemn a nature to perform, that they ought never to be placed in a position in which their names might be called in question in that House. The Bill of last Session passed through its earlier stage by a majority of nearly two to one, but it was postponed until so late a period of the Session that in deference to the impatience of the House, it was determined to withdraw the Bill. This Session the Bill had again gone through the ordeal of the House of Lords, and the interval had enabled the commercial interests in the provinces to bear their testimony to its value. Very strong testimony in favour of the Bill was also borne by the Commission now sitting for assimilating the Law of England and Scotland to one commercial form. That Commission approved most warmly of the principle of the measure. He thought the other Bill before the House a good one; but this, which had come down from the House of Lords, he regarded as the best. The principle of the two measures was exactly the same, namely, to do away with fictitious and fraudulent defences, and to do speedy justice to the holders of dishonoured bills. He should not at all object that the two Bills should be referred to a Select Committee, and he should be glad to hear that this proposal had been made by the Government.

MR. GURNEY said he did not think a sufficient case had been made out for the proposed change of the law. So far as his own experience went he had never known an instance in which the loss upon bills of exchange had been increased in consequence of the delay entailed by the present state of the law. There were certain cases in which the remedy was worse than the disease, and this was one. The disease was the inconvenience of a few creditors; the remedy would be the ruin of a multitude of debtors. He differed from the hon. Gentleman in thinking that every alteration in the law that enabled creditors to obtain speedier remedy against the debtor, was, for that reason, an improvement upon the law. The debtor ought to have a fair and reasonable time given him to recover from temporary and accidental embarrassment; and, if he should fail, then the law ought to provide that his property should be equally divided among all his creditors. But it seemed to him that the present bill was utterly deficient in both these respects. The bill gave to the creditor who held an overdue bill of exchange an enormous priority of advantage as against the creditors on open accounts—a priority that was not based either in justice or expediency. But it was assumed in this bill that the creditor upon a bill of exchange, being a formal document, ought to have priority, and that the debtor admitted on the face of the bill that he was indebted to a certain amount, and that he engaged to pay it on a certain day. But the same thing might be said if a man wrote a check which was dishonoured by his banker, and it would be difficult to show why the holder of an unpaid check ought not to have the same remedy as the holder of the bill of exchange. The holder of a bond, too, would be in many cases placed in an inferior position to that of the holder of a bill of exchange—for no reason that he could see. That was not consistent. Again it was impossible not to see that the Bill would afford the greatest possible facilities for fraudulent preferences. A man might say to one of his creditors, "I am in difficulties—draw a bill on me at a week," and the creditor who had received the hint would get his debt in full at the expense of the rest. He believed that it was the duty of that House, in providing justice for creditors, not to overlook all considerations of mercy to the debtor. He did not plead for the insolvent debtor, for, if a man were insolvent the sooner he stopped payment the better; and still less did he plead for the fraudulent debtor, for it was a blot upon our jurisprudence that the fraudulent debtor was so seldom convicted and so lightly punished: but he did wish to say a word on behalf of the honest, industrious, and frugal tradesman, who might be unable, from an accidental slackness in his month's receipts, to meet his acceptances for goods purchased, and which he calculated upon meeting from the month's sale of goods. Such bills were given among all classes of tradesmen, and one class, the small retail shopkeepers in agricultural villages, generally made purchases by the acceptance of small bills of exchange. They had no margin of spare capital like larger traders, they depended upon the receipts in their shops, and if they failed to take the usual amount of cash they failed to meet their acceptance. It was said that the creditor and the debtor ought to be left to settle these matters between them; but these bills are not always in the hands of the drawer, for if he were in any strait he would have passed them into the hands of third parties. The drawer of a bill might often have an interest in keeping an acceptor upon his legs, but the accidental holder of a bill would have no such interest under the present bill, although he might have now, because the present state of the law operated as an inducement to leniency. But if this bill passed, it would offer a premium upon harshness; for, however kindly disposed the creditor might be, he would be compelled to avail himself of the powers given to him by the present bill, for fear that, if he did not, some other holder of a bill would step in and cut him out. The bill then would be a great hardship to persons engaged in trade; and it would also have a prejudicial operation upon the character of the bills of exchange in circulation in this country. A prudent man, with small means, would be very unwilling to sign a document which would render him liable to such serious results in case of any accidental negligence in taking it up, upon its arriving at maturity; and the bill would thus diminish the number of a class of bills which he thought ought not to be diminished—namely, those drawn on small country traders for goods bona fide supplied, and representing a class of credit from which it was undesirable this class of traders should be debarred. He considered, in short, that the effect of the bill would be materially to diminish the number of good bills and at the same time to increase the number of bad bills in the country. He should be the last to undervalue the expression of opinion of the large commercial bodies which had petitioned in favour of this bill, but they were mostly Chambers of Commerce and committees of the merchants and large and wealthier traders, and the smaller classes of tradesmen were very inadequately represented in these bodies. It was said that the measure had worked well in Scotland; but it had been in operation in that country for a great many years, and they all knew that time had a wonderful power in softening the harsher features of any measure. It might, therefore, work well in Scotland, and yet prove very injurious if introduced into England. The London merchants having dealings with Scotland had presented a petition, stating that persons selling goods in Scotland experienced great advantage in the collection of their debts from the state of the Scottish law, and that the law of Scotland was found in all respects to work extremely well. But the transactions of a country insensibly moulded themselves in the course of time to the state of the law, and too much stress must not be laid upon such a representation; and, moreover, the House ought to look at the other side of the picture—in other words, if the man who was turning the screw said he liked it, they ought to ask the man whose thumb was under the screw how he enjoyed the operation? For these reasons he must confess that he should be extremely glad to see these bills rejected, because, if they passed into law, the result, he believed, would be that, in the endeavour to check an imaginary inconvenience, a real and substantial injury would be inflicted.

MR. NAPIER said, he must differ from the conclusions of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and, as to the arguments used by him, he did not think that any reform had ever been carried without having a similar line of argument applied to it. He thought the House ought not lightly to reject a measure which had been found to work so well in Scotland—a country not likely to be led away by any crude or romantic notions on the subject of commerce; and when it was found that in a country like Scotland, after an experience of many years, a system similar to the one now proposed had proved most valuable and useful, he could not see why it should not be introduced into this country. A similar system existed in all the commercial countries of Europe, and it appeared to him that it ought to be the constant effort of the Legislature, first to assimilate the commercial law of the whole kingdom, and then to harmonise it with that of the whole commercial world. He did not think that the House ought, unless some weightier reason were given than had yet been advanced, to reject the present Bill. In his opinion, it would not be productive of the hardships which had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Lynn, for when men knew the provisions of the law they would comply with them and discharge their obligations, or else they would not enter so lightly into them. With regard to frivolous and fictitious defences, he had been startled to hear the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Vance) say that he had never heard of any. Why, it was almost always the case in trials concerning bills of exchange, and Lord Campbell in another place had stated that he had known many cases in which the money of the creditor had been wasted away in litigation by a fraudulent debtor. It was said, that the proposed change would give a preference to the holders of bills of exchange over other creditors; but, if it were so, a debt on a bill of exchange was different to an ordinary debt; a bill of exchange was an acknowledgment of a debt. A person who accepted a bill of exchange ought to be prepared at the proper time to discharge the obligation into which he had entered, and no law regarding such transactions was a wise one unless it was in harmony with moral obligations, and courts of justice ought not to be occupied with cases in which there was no bona fide defence. The hon. Member for Dublin had stated that a noble and learned Lord to whom reference had been made—he meant Lord Brougham—had not been very successful as a commercial reformer; but he could only say that scarcely any reform which had since been carried was not anticipated in the celebrated speech made by that noble and learned Lord in 1828. The noble Lord had even anticipated the present Bill, for he said—

"Whenever a strong presumption of right appears on the part of the plaintiff, the burden of disputing his claim should be thrown on the defendant. This I would extend to such cases as bills of exchange, bonds, mortgages, and other such securities. In those cases I think the plaintiff should be allowed to have his judgment upon due notice given, unless good cause be in the first instance shown to the contrary, and security given to prosecute a suit for setting the instrument aside."—[2 Hansard, xviii. 179.]

As regarded small traders, and the injury which it was said would be inflicted on them, by the present Bill, that was entirely a matter for the creditors, and, even under the existing system, he did not think that a creditor on a bill of exchange would be willing to forego the power which was given him. As regarded collusion and fraud, he would be glad to see a mixed Commission of legal and commercial men appointed to inquire into that subject. It had been said that the petitions in favour of this Bill had been presented from Chambers of Commerce and persons engaged in large mercantile transactions, but surely they were the persons likely to be the best judges on the subject. So advantageous had a similar system, established by 12 Geo. III., c. 72, been in Scotland, that, in the 23 Geo. III., c. 18, it was stated—

"And whereas it hath been found by experience, that so much of the said Act made in the twelfth year of the reign of His present Majesty as relates to bills and promissory notes, hath been of great advantage to the trade and commerce of that part of Great Britain called Scotland; be it therefore enacted, that so much and such part of the said Act shall be, and the same is hereby made, perpetual."

Well, then, if the system had worked so beneficially in Scotland, he could not see why it should not do so in England and Ireland; and that opinion was confirmed by Lord Campbell, who had thus expressed himself on the subject—

Mr. Gurney

"There could be no doubt that it was of immense importance that the commercial law of the three portions of the United Kingdom should be assimilated, and such an assimilation would introduce reforms which might lead to the most important commercial advantages. He was, perhaps, as competent to speak on this point as any of their Lordships, as he had the honour of presiding in Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, where a great many causes were tried; and he assured the House that in very many the money of the creditor was wasted by the fraudulent debtor in litigation. Frequently, the acceptor of a bill of exchange, who, having had value received, and having failed to pay at the end of the period had an action brought against him, set up a number of fraudulent and unfounded defences, and when the day of trial came no real justification was attempted. At one single sitting of the Court, within the last four weeks, there were no less than sixteen actions on bills of exchange, in which the defendants did not attempt to set up the shadow of a shade of defence. He saw no reason, therefore, why they should not do as they did in Scotland, and in every other commercial country, and, indeed, in the time of Edward I., in this country."—[3 Hansard, xxxv. 1867.]

With regard to a clause altering the jurisdiction in Ireland, that he thought ought to receive consideration in committee; but he thought that if the House would assent to the present Bill it would be found most useful and beneficial.

MR. MITCHELL said, he thought that the assertion of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that no petitions from mercantile men had been presented in favour of the principle of the present Bill was, to say the least, hazardous, and he had been much surprised at the arguments which he had employed. The hon. Member and the hon. Member for Lynn (Mr. Gurney) went upon the same principle; and as the hon. Member for Birmingham was in favour of inconvertible bank notes, so the hon. Member for Lynn was in favour of inconvertible bills of exchange. The whole argument of the case rested upon the principle, that when people had accepted bills of exchange they should be called upon to discharge the obligation into which they had entered. In his opinion, a bill of exchange was a most serious engagement, and he utterly repudiated the notion that open accounts and bills of exchange were to be placed upon the same footing, for the difference between them was of the broadest nature. It had been said that there ought to be a difference between bills of exchange and warrants of attorney, because, in the case of the latter, the attorney would explain the transaction; but ought that House to encourage persons to accept bills of exchange without knowing their nature? With regard to endorsee, it was equally their business to consider their liability. In the case which had been referred to, of bills of exchange drawn against bills of lading, he could not see that the proposed change would be productive of hardship, because it was the duty of persons accepting such bills to reckon what they would have to pay when they arrived at maturity, without being dependent upon the arrival of the ship. The question was, whether a bill of exchange was not a solemn engagement differing from a system of running accounts, and he had no hesitation in saying that the law had always held it to be so, as also did nine-tenths of the commercial men of this country; and, as to the objection of the hon. Member for Lynn as to fraudulent preferences, he was surprised the hon. Gentleman did not see that there was nothing in it. The mere fact of accepting a bill at a week's date, and then stopping payment, would be a clear case of fraud. As to hardships inflicted by the present Bill, he believed that in ninety-nine cases out of a 100, where a person was not able to meet his acceptance, but could show the holder of it that he could meet it if he had time, the bill would be renewed; but, if the man were really insolvent, then, the sooner it transpired the better. He earnestly hoped that the House would not be led away by even the high authority of the hon. Member for Birmingham, but that it would sanction a principle which would tend to purify the commercial atmosphere, and to prevent persons entering into engagements which they were unable to meet.

MR. MUNTZ found it necessary to say that his observations had been misunderstood. What he had said was, that all the men of commercial standing, whom he had consulted, were perfectly satisfied with the existing state of the law, and had no desire to see it altered.

MR. SPOONER thought that no answer had been given, or could possibly be given, to the most able speech of the hon. Member for Lynn (Mr. Gurney). The hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Mitchell) had, indeed, endeavoured to show that the opponents of this Bill were not desirous of compelling persons to observe engagements into which they had entered. Now what he objected to was, that this measure gave to the holders of negotiable securities a power of oppressing their unfortunate debtors. He believed that the Bill would have a very harsh operation upon small traders, and a man who had good book debts might be driven into the bankruptcy court for not being able to fulfil an obligation into which he had entered under the belief that he would be able to meet it at a particular day. No doubt, those engaged in large commercial transactions approved of the Bill ; but as it was for the advantage of the country that a system of small trade should be encouraged, he would put it to the House, was it consistent with that view that small tradesmen should be dealt with according to the harsh and severe principle dictated by this Bill ? They might rest assured the Bill would have the effect of preventing prudent and cautious men from entering into those engagements at all. Much had been said of the petitions presented in favour of the Bill. Now, he happened to know that, as regarded the petition signed by the merchants of the City of London, it was so signed by many upon the representation that the Bill was to prevent fictitious defences being set up against the payment of bills of exchange ; and by others, on the supposition that it was directed against accommodation bills ; and he could state that many persons who had done so had changed their opinions. When the merchants, manufacturers, and small tradesmen of Birmingham had discovered what the probable effect of the Bill would be upon the retail trade of the country, they immediately resolved to petition against it. And as regarded the petition from Leeds, it merely went to this, that the petitioners prayed some steps would be taken to prevent the setting up of fictitious defences. The Bill was unnecessary, and because it was so, as had been justly observed, it was a job, inasmuch as an office was created under it which was not required. Not a single petition had been presented in favour of such a measure before the noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham) brought forward his Bill, and he did not believe that any necessity had been felt for it. He could not see the slightest reason why they should give to the holders of bills of exchange advantages withheld from simple contract debts or obligations of any other description. During the long vacation, no doubt there was some delay in procuring judgment, on account of the difficulty of obtaining a Judge's order ; but if gentlemen of the legal profession felt this evil so strongly, an obvious mode of settling the matter was to see if the long vacation could not be curtailed. He objected to the Bill because it was not wanted—because it gave to the arbitrary creditor a power of injuring the unfortunate debtor ; because it did not merely confine its operations to the case of the fraudulent debtor, but applied equally to that of the unfortunate debtor ; and because it would inflict much mischief upon small traders all over the country under pretence of curing an imaginary rather than an actual evil.

MR. BAINES said, he must be allowed to advert to a petition presented by him little more than a month ago in favour of this Bill from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, which was composed of persons who thoroughly understood the trade of this country, whether relating to large or to small operations. This petition had been entirely misdescribed by the hon. Member (Mr. Spooner.) The petitioners stated that they "earnestly desired the assimilation of the commercial laws of the three portions of the united kingdom, and they consider that, by passing Lord Brougham's Bill, Parliament would take an important step towards such assimilation. It would greatly simplify and economize the administration of the law in England ; it is founded upon just and sound principles ; it is in accordance with the experience of other commercial countries ; it meets the views of the mercantile communities in general ; and it has had the sanction of the highest legal authorities, and of both Houses of Parliament." With regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Keating), it was in itself a valuable measure, although he preferred the one now under discussion ; but he thought the object in view would be best obtained by referring both of these Bills to a Select Committee, who would perhaps be able to give them a better Bill than either of those now before the House.

MR. GLYN said, he did not entirely approve of the Bill before the House ; but so many were the practical evils attending the present system of bill circulation in this country, that some remedy was absolutely necessary. He agreed, the proper course would be to send both the Bills to a Select Committee, in order that they might endeavour to get rid of the existing anomaly in our commercial code on this subject, and assimilate it to the law of Scotland and of other countries. At present the mode in which acceptances were given and taken was a positive evil. A single house in London on the 4th of March last had no less than 700 bills noted for dishonour ; and on the same day it was calculated that no less than 5,000 bills in the city were noted. It was evident that these bills were given, not with the bonâ fide intention of discharging them, but on the anti-commercial and most pernicious system of renewal. An evil of this magnitude demanded the serious attention of the Legislature; some measure should be adopted to increase the validity of these instruments. When a man incurred the solemn obligation of accepting a bill, the Legislature ought to see that he was in a position to fulfil his obligations. Seeing how bills of exchange circulated throughout this country on the faith of the indorser, the Legislature was bound to see that bills were not carelessly or recklessly indorsed. They could not have a greater security against this than was given by the Bill before the House. So far from deteriorating bills of exchange, he was convinced it would raise their character. He knew that some of the largest houses in London connected with the inland trade were promoting this measure, and yet there was no class of men throughout the country who were to a greater extent simple contract creditors—a proof that no danger existed of that class of creditors being injured by the measure proposed. The only objection to the Bill which appeared to him to have any weight, was that relating to fraudulent preferences; but as he found a provision against that in Mr. Keating's Bill, he hoped that both Bills would be allowed to go to a Select Committee.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he had listened attentively to the whole of this discussion, and he confessed that he was more perplexed and embarrassed than ever he had been in his life by the variety of opinions he had heard on the subject. There were two questions involved in the Bill, which, in the discussion of its principles, ought to be kept apart. The first question was whether it was advisable that the holders of negotiable securities should have given to them more expeditious remedies than other creditors of realising the amount of those securities; and in the second place it was necessary to consider whether the machinery provided by the Bill was exactly the kind that was required for that purpose. He did not mean to undervalue the weight of the petitions that had been presented in favour of this Bill, but he should be glad to ascertain the character of the persons who had presented these petitions; he should like to know if they were persons who were more in the habit of taking bills of exchange than of giving them; because he could understand that persons whose business led them to receive bills of exchange to a large amount might be in favour of an expeditious and summary remedy for the recovery of the amount of these securities. He thought, however, the House was bound to pay some attention to the case of honest debtors, as also to the case of creditors who were not the holders of negotiable securities. The question was whether any preference should be given to the holders of those securities. At the present moment he could see no reason why the holders of these securities—merely because the persons bound by them were under the obligation to pay them on a particular day—should be entitled to a greater advantage over simple contract creditors than the holders of money bonds or of mortgages, in which there was a covenant to pay the money on a particular day, or at any time whatever. He did not feel that it would be desirable to give to the holders of negotiable securities the expeditious and summary remedy provided by this Bill. It might be said that by this measure they would prevent the setting up of fraudulent defences, but he conceived that they would not prevent such defences being set up by merely expediting the proceedings against the parties. No doubt they could by means of a summary remedy, prevent parties from setting up any defence at all; but such a proceeding as that was not advisable. Now, the principle of the Bill at present before the House was to provide that summary remedy which had been so much dwelt upon, but a most expeditious remedy was at present supplied by the Common Law Procedure Act, and the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Keating) proposed to make that act the basis of his measure. In many respects the Scotch law possessed advantages over that of England, but he thought that no reason why the Scotch law should be transplanted into a foreign soil when he found that the evils complained of might be guarded against equally well by our own English native law. He thought we ought rather to make every improvement that was required in our own English law, rather than substitute for it the law of any foreign country. He quite agreed with the hon. Member who last addressed the House, and his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, that it would be extremely desirable that those two measures should be submitted to the consideration of a Select Committee, in order that a measure might be matured which would prevent the frauds unquestionably often committed in this class of commercial transactions. He was disposed, therefore, to consent to the second reading of the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Keating) as well as of that now before them, in the hope that the originators and promoters of the measure would consent to that course.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Bill which came down from the House of Lords had his entire approbation. He believed that the application of the Scotch law to England would be productive of the greatest possible good, and with respect to those hon. Gentlemen who thought that the nationality of England would be thereby affected, he begged to remind them that the law of Scotland was the law of the whole of the civilised commercial world. The bill of exchange was the currency of merchants, and instead of seeing any ground for maintaining the doctrine of the other side, his wonder was that England should have grown up to such a position of commercial wealth whilst the law of bills of exchange remained in its present barbarous state. These bills of exchange circulated as money from hand to hand, they were assignable and discounted, and then, at a certain point, that which had before circulated as money represented it no longer. What was contended by the other side was, that when a small trader promised to pay a bill of exchange he was not bound to keep his promise, because other people, through whose hands the bill passed, did not keep theirs. When it came to this point that a man was not able to meet his debt without having recourse to a fictitious defence, it was far better that he should go into the Gazette at once.

MR. KEATING was happy to think that he was relieved from the necessity of advocating the principle on which both Bills rested, as it was admitted on all hands the present law upon bills of exchange in England was a scandal to the administration of justice. He thought, however, that the introduction of the Scottish law was unnecessary, as tending only to encumber and clog the wheels of justice. So far from attaining the object desired in a more rapid and less expensive way, he thought it would only go to accomplish in a more expensive way an object which might be effected by the slightest possible alteration of the present English law. He was decidedly in favour of referring both bills to a Select Committee, where their details might be thoroughly considered, and the best measure be sent before the House. Bills of exchange circulated like sovereigns from hand to hand, and it was too bad that parties should be prevented from realising the amount of the security by any fictitious proceeding of the law.

MR. MURROUGH observed that there existed at the present moment a number of convertible bills of exchange which were recoverable by the agency of the Court of Chancery. But there was another class of bills of exchange which were drawn by the small traders, and which were never intended to pass as money till the goods they represented were sold. Now if these bills remained in the hand of the original holders this bill might not produce much evil; but as it was well known that numbers of these bills got into the hands of warehousemen in London, and on their failure passed into the hands of others who pressed on the small traders, he thought the House should be cautious before they agreed to the measure. He suspected that the bill was promoted for the benefit of persons behind the scenes.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham that this was a question more for the consideration of the commercial community than for lawyers, though perhaps the experience of hon. and learned Gentlemen might enable them to throw some light upon it. It was notorious that actions on bills of exchange gave rise to defences of so fictitious and fraudulent a character as to be a disgrace to courts of justice; as regarded the creditor they were unjust, and as regarded the debtor, degrading and demoralising. The question then was whether or not the existing state of the law ought to be amended? He thought there could be no doubt that they ought to do so, unless very great embarrassment and injury to commerce would result from it. Was it not palpable that it was an advantage to a man holding a bill of exchange to be able to recover by a cheap, summary, and expeditious remedy? Why did the creditor exact a bill of exchange but for the purpose of ensuring payment? He admitted that the question was one of commercial policy, and it had been said by an hon. Gentleman of great authority in commercial matters, that the effect of the proposed change would be to prevent bills of exchange being given in small transactions, and thereby limit credit, which ought to be made as extensive as possible. But, on the other hand, they had heard many conflicting opinions on that point; and he thought there would be a good deal of advantage in making men cautious in giving credit to parties whose means did not enable them to take large facilities. Unless the House were prepared to allow the present state of things to continue, and the administration of justice to be scandalized by fictitious defences, it was certainly time to deal one way or other with the subject. Some hon. Members had said that they ought to deal leniently with the debtor, and that he ought not to be rendered liable to his creditor in this summary and oppressive manner; but if it were right under certain circumstances to extend an indulgence to a debtor, such cases ought to be provided for by a competent tribunal. It was highly improper to convert the honest debtor into a dishonest and fraudulent man by encouraging him to go into a court of justice and set up a defence that would be disgraceful to him. With regard to the system of registration, he thought that it operated harshly and injuriously, besides its cumbersome and expensive process. He admitted it was possible that some inconvenience might arise from the bills as they now stood, and that summary jurisdiction might give rise to fraudulent preferences. This was a point on which he thought the investigation of a Select Committee might be highly beneficial. If the inconveniences threatened should appear insurmountable, he did not say that it might not even be necessary to have recourse to the rejection of the measure; for it was incumbent on them to proceed cautiously and carefully, without involving the commercial world in any of the dangers of which some hon. Members had spoken. If, then, the House were prepared to say that in regard to bills of exchange there ought to be an amendment of the law, the question to consider was, which of the bills proposed to the House ought to be adopted? He contended that both involved the same principle, and had for their object the prevention of a debtor's having recourse to a fictitious and fraudulent defence in an action upon a bill of exchange. They should not be guided solely by the desire to make the law uniform in both divisions of the empire; but, believing that a careful revision of the provisions of the two measures might enable them to obviate these inconveniences, he should certainly support the second reading of this Bill, as well as of the other which was brought forward by the hon. Member for Reading.

MR. M'MAHON called attention to a clause in the bill (the 12th) which would, in his opinion, involve an infringement of international law. The bill proposed to call upon a merchant residing in a foreign country to show cause against an execution issued against him on a bill of exchange, and he thought this was the first time such a principle had been introduced into the law of England.

MR. KEOUGH said he was desirous of correcting an error into which the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) had fallen, as to what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin. The right hon. Gentleman did not agree to the adoption of the principle of the bill in England, and object to it in Ireland, but he had understood him to say that the bill would require to be amended in Committee, in order to give similar powers to the Irish courts to those which were to be given in the English courts.

MR. HANKEY said, that no doubt great inconvenience had been experienced under the present system; and if the Scotch system were adopted he thought commercial transactions would be rendered more secure and payments be more promptly made. He considered it most discreditable on the part of any persons to accept bills which they had not the means of meeting at maturity, and he differed altogether from the hon. Member for Lynn, (Mr. Gurney) whose desire he understood was to place persons without capital in as good a position as persons possessing capital.

MR. W. BROWN said, he approved generally of the enactments proposed in the two bills; but did not think them quite equitable as respected English and foreign bills of exchange, which would be placed in very different positions. To this point the attention of the Committee might also be advantageously directed.

MR. MULLINGS said, that the bill provided for the registration of all bills of exchange and promissory notes. The House was aware that judgments and bills of sale were now registered; but they might not be aware that, through the agency of the protection of trade societies, lists of all persons who had given bills of sale, or against whom judgments had been registered, were circulated weekly throughout the country. He had learned that a society existed in London, the officers of which searched the register of judgments and bills of sale week by week, and sent out lists to all subscribers of £1. per annum. This system was most injurious to the interests of the public generally ; and he wished to call the attention of the Attorney General to this subject, and he hoped if the bill was referred to a Select Committee, that a clause would be inserted in order to prohibit the publication and circulation of information of this kind with regard to persons whose credit might not be at all affected, although they were parties to bills of exchange or promissory notes. An action had recently been tried at York, in which a merchant proceeded for libel against the solicitor of a Trade Protection Society who had published information of this description, and Mr. Justice Cresswell, before whom the case was tried, said he thought the system was likely to be attended with consequences most prejudicial to public credit. He (Mr. Mullings) would support the proposition of referring both Bills to a Select Committee, and he trusted that the Committee would take measures to prevent such unwarrantable and mischievous proceedings.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said that he looked upon this as altogether a commercial question, although hon. Members of the legal profession seemed unwilling to touch upon the commercial part of the subject. His opinion, based upon considerable experience in commercial affairs was, that if the bill passed in its present form it would have a most injurious effect upon the inland trade of the country. The introduction of bills of exchange for the settlement of inland accounts was of comparatively recent date ; and, although no doubt evils had arisen from the system, yet, if this measure should be adopted, that species of transactions would be almost entirely abandoned, and great derangement must be occasioned in the mode of conducting the inland trade.

MR. SANDARS observed that, as a very ample discussion had taken place upon this subject, he hoped his hon. friend the Member for Dublin (Mr. Vance) would, in deference to what appeared to be the general wish of the House, consent that this bill, and that which stood next to it upon the paper, should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. VANCE, in explanation, said that what he had stated was, that in the course of a long experience he had never had to encounter a frivolous defence to a bill of exchange, and that that was the experience of several other Members of the House. He should certainly take the sense of the House upon the question.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that although not present during the whole of the discussion, he had felt it his duty to vote in support of the second reading of the bill, not because he approved of the measure itself, or could say that he entirely acquiesced even with its principle, but because he understood it had been suggested that this and the bill standing next on the paper should be referred to a Select Committee. Now, he really did feel that the law stood so much in need of amendment, that he was ready to concur in any means which would lead to a full consideration of the subject; and he should, therefore, cheerfully support the second reading of the other bill as he had supported the second of this, on the understanding that they should both be referred to a Select Committee.

Main Question put and agreed to:—

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed to a Select Committee.

BILL OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SPOONER, speaking on behalf of those who had voted in the minority on the previous division, said that he joined most cordially in the attempt to put down fictitious defences, and desired to justify no man who, whether inadvertently, through misfortune, or with intent, resorted to those fictitious defences. What he objected to was the mode in which it was proposed to accomplish this object, and which he held was in itself exceedingly mischievous.

MR. MUNTZ said, this bill was superior to the other in every respect, but of course, like that, it would be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. CHEETHAM said, the bill was framed upon the objectionable principle of giving an undue preference to one creditor over another; and so long as that principle was retained, no Select Committee would be able to make the measure acceptable.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> and committed to a Select Committee.

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FREWEN said; that in moving the second reading of this Bill, he wished to explain how the law now stood with regard to the holding of pluralities by clergymen of the Established Church. An Act was passed in 1850 for putting an end to the practice of holding benefices in plurality; but just before it passed a clause was inserted, the effect of which was to extend certain powers which were given under a former Act, and to enable any number of benefices to be consolidated and held as one, though they might not be held in plurality. This state of the law involved the inconsistency that, whilst the clergyman could not be presented to two livings, the two might be united and held in consolidation as one. How the system operated was rendered sufficiently apparent by the returns which had been laid upon the table of the House. The cases enumerated in the first of these returns were two livings in Cambridgeshire, which had been consolidated into one, and in each of which there was ample provision for the payment of a clergyman. The population of the two parishes together amounted to 939 souls, and their joint income was 715*l.* The next was the case of two parishes in Shropshire, the population of which was not so large, but the income was nearly 700*l.* a year. It was quite clear that the object in uniting these parishes together was to make up a considerable income for some friend or relative; and for this purpose, instead of the revenues of the Church being appropriated to the objects for which they were originally intended—namely, the payment of a clergyman to perform his duties and reside within the parish—the two parishes were united and consolidated into one. The third case of the sort was in the county of Suffolk, and the fourth in the county he had the honour to represent—Sussex. In the return for 1853, there were very many cases of the same description, and in one instance two parishes were consolidated that were not less than three miles apart from each other. Such a state of things as this, he was sure the House would agree with him, was most objectionable and demanded the application of a remedy. He did not, however, propose to act with any undue stringency in applying that remedy; and whatever suggestions hon. Members might think proper to make, he should be happy to consider in Committee on the Bill. According to the existing law, no limit was fixed to the value of the livings consolidated, and one object of his Bill was to remedy this defect. This he did by the first clause. The second clause referred to the non-residence of certain masters of colleges and public schools, who under the present state of the law could claim exemption from the general obligations upon clergymen in this respect; and it was directed to provide a remedy against the evils thence arising. In the county of Sussex there was one parish with a considerable population, and an income of 1200*l.* a year; in this situation and in Cambridgeshire, another parish with an income of 1150*l.* a year; but in neither case had the bishop of the diocese the power to enforce the residence of the incumbent. This, too, was an objectionable state of things, and he proposed that whilst the incumbents in possession should not be interfered with during their lives, in all future appointments their residence should be enforced. Further, there were at present a great number of parishes where the churches had unfortunately been allowed to become dilapidated and fall to ruin, and though the income was sufficient to pay the clergyman, there was no place of worship, and the clergymen never went near the parish to perform his duties. In the north of England he was acquainted with a parish having a population of 2000 thus situated, and a similar case of a parish in Wales having a population of 1200. Now, he held that some legislation was absolutely required upon this subject, with a view to secure the erection of a church in parishes so circumstanced; and he proposed by the third clause, therefore, that from the period the living next became vacant the income should, if it were thought advisable by the bishop of the diocese, be allowed to accumulate in order to provide a building fund, and that until the church was built the bishop might license a room for the performance of Divine worship in the parish. It was to accomplish these several objects that he proposed the Bill, and he trusted the House would consent to its being now read a second time.

Motion made and Question proposed “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. COWPER opposed the second reading of the Bill. He did not think that it was very desirable to legislate on questions of this kind in detail. He thought, too, that the changes contemplated by the Bill were unnecessary, and were open to many objections, and did not even carry out systematically the intentions of the proposer himself. He thought that the regulations which it contained with respect to the regulations for the consolidation of benefices were not framed with sufficient clearness and accuracy to render them easily workable, and the limited application of the Bill to benefices under a certain amount would lead to uncertainty as to the state of the law. The second clause, which referred to the non-residence of masters of colleges and schools, he had no objection to; and with regard to the latter clause of the Bill, he must say that he did not think it desirable to confiscate the revenues of parishes which had no church but had a clergyman, in order to provide a sacred edifice. It would evidently occupy some period before a church could be erected from the accumulation of the income which now went to the incumbent, and he did not think it would be desirable to deprive the parishioners of the advantage of the ministrations of a clergyman for this length of time, particularly as a room might be licensed for the celebration of divine worship, if there was no church. If it were thought necessary to make such a provision, he thought some better means of getting funds might be provided than that of confiscating the income of the clergyman. Looking at the Bill as a whole, he did not think there was any pressing necessity for it, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press it to a division. He would move that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, that the Bill proposed to deal with three very important questions—the union of benefices, the residence of clergymen, and the building of churches, in a very small compass. He thought the limit of distance, in the first clause, by which it was provided that the churches should be within a mile and a half of each other, was a good provision, and ought to be accepted by the House; but he did not think it advisable to make any change as to the value of the livings. He highly approved of the second clause, and thought its provisions ought to be extended to canons and prebendaries. As to the third clause, it was not open to the objection of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper), as it provided for the supply of the funds in a very legitimate way, and it was not to extend to any parish where a room was licensed for public worship. He would not offer any obstacle to the Bill going into Committee.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the third clause appeared to be to the same effect as a Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Sussex some years ago, and which, after much discussion, the House rejected. It seemed to him as though the hon. Member, finding one evil existing in a parish, proposed to remedy it by the creation of another. Because there happened to be no parish church in a parish—a circumstance which all would deplore—the hon. Gentleman proposed, in fact, that, until the bishop was satisfied that the income of the benefice had accumulated sufficiently to erect a church, there should be no clergyman. That, in his (Mr. Bouverie's) opinion, was not by any means the proper way to remedy the evil. Neither was he willing to give to the bishop the power contained in the third clause, in reference to the presentation of clergymen to benefices by the patrons. As to the clause respecting the union of benefices, it was mere nibbling with the great and important question of pluralities—a question which ought to be dealt with as a whole, and not in one particular minor point, as proposed by the Bill. He trusted the House would reject the Motion for reading the Bill a second time.

MR. SPOONER said, there were clearly grounds for sending the Bill to a Committee. If the returns before the House were examined, it would be found that there were many cases in which the persons who paid for the means of spiritual edification had no clergyman resident near them and no church. He admitted that the third clause was not perfect, inasmuch as it left to the bishop the option of presenting or not; but that might be altered when the Bill went into Committee; it might be made compulsory upon the bishop in the case of parishes where there was no church to license a room for the performance of divine worship until sufficient funds had accumulated for the erection of a church. He should vote for the second reading.

MR. HENLEY concurred with the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) as to the inconvenience of frequent legislation upon matters of this kind, particularly as in the present instance the hon. Mover of the Bill himself seemed, judging by the first clause, to undergo a constant change of mind upon the question of value. The third clause, he admitted, was an important one, because nobody could desire, where there was a benefice with a certain amount of revenue and no church, that such a state of things should continue. But what would the proposal of the hon. Member do, so far as providing a remedy was concerned? Why, it would have no effect at all during the lives of the existing incumbents, and would only come into operation upon the voidance of the cures. Consequently, whilst the lives of fifty or sixty incumbents of benefices so situated endured there would be no remedy whatever for the evil. Churches were generally built by means of the contributions of persons who took an interest in such matters, with the assistance of certain societies; but if this Bill were to become law, and it were known that upon the death of incumbent A, B, C, who was rather feeble, and not likely to live more than two or three years, a fund would at once begin to accumulate, he apprehended that great difficulty would be experienced in getting people to subscribe for the erection of a church in that locality. For, naturally enough, they would say, "In a few years you will have a fund sufficient for building a church, and we can find plenty of other places where our money will be more useful." Some analogy might be drawn between the case and the appointment of new bishops. The new bishop directed his energy to promote the interests of his diocese, and so would the parishes in this case. He thought it likely that a new church would be built more quickly by having an energetic man in the cure, however small, besides having the inestimable advantage of increased parochial ministration. As regarded the second clause, there might be some abuses in the case of those having the cure of souls; but upon the whole he thought they were very few. Upon the whole, therefore, if the Bill went to a division, he should feel inclined to vote against it.

MR. FREWEN replied. He had brought forward the measure entirely for the public good, and he was not responsible for the Bill of last year. There was a strong feeling in the country that these things should be reformed, and therefore he would take the sense of the House on the subject.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

VACATING OF SEATS IN PARLIAMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WRIGHTSON moved the second reading of this Bill, explaining that its object was to prevent the necessity of any person vacating his seat in Parliament, and presenting himself again to his constituents for re-election, on removing from one office of profit under the Crown immediately to another office of profit.

Motion made, and Question proposed—"That the Bill be now read a Second Time."

MR. W. WILLIAMS conceived that the Bill would interfere very materially with those constitutional rights of electors which had been exercised for two centuries. He saw no reason for the proposed change, and should oppose the Bill.

MR. BANKS was inclined to agree with the last speaker in respect to the constitutional part of the question. He thought, too, that the present was not precisely the time when such a proposition was likely to meet with most favour, for, with respect to many places, hon. Members did not know whether they were vacant or not, and one of the means of obtaining that knowledge was by the Motion for new writs. He certainly wished that every Member, on the occasion of his receiving a new appointment, should go back to his constituents. The trouble to himself would be very small if the electors approved of his conduct; and, as to the expense, the House had endeavoured to make that as little as possible, though, whether the Act passed last year for that purpose had operated as intended, a recent return presented to Parliament with respect to one of the metropolitan boroughs was calculated to create doubts.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the sole object of the Bill was to promote the public convenience, and it only enforced a provision which had been suggested on several occasions before without any objection being urged against it. As to the knowledge which the hon. and learned Member desired to have with respect to the appointments to new offices, that information was usually contained in the Gazette.

MR. BENTINCK thought the experience of the last two mouths, during which there had been such a shifting of the Members of Government from one department to another as was neither conducive to the character of public men, nor to that of the Government, afforded sufficient argument against the Bill.

MR. HADFIELD opposed the Bill. If they began to fritter away the constitutional principle little by little, they would by and by get rid of it altogether. He moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. BARROW seconded the Amendment. The question was not whether a Minister should be allowed to go from one office to another in the same Administration, but whether he should be permitted to accept a new office, with an entirely different set of men for his colleagues, without being obliged to go back to his constituents, and giving them an opportunity of deciding whether or not they would re-elect him as their representative.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. HENLEY had heard no good reason in favour of the Bill. No doubt some inconvenience might arise to a Member of a Government in consequence of finding a difficulty in being re-elected; but that was a reason why the present constitutional rights of the electors should be retained.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER thought it was not desirable that a person holding an office of profit under the Government should vacate his seat merely on being transferred to another office under the same Government; but when a Member left one Government to serve under another, he conceived that the constituency were then constitutionally entitled to pronounce an opinion on his conduct.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument went too far for his purpose, and, as far as the approval of constituents was concerned in respect to the change of office by their representative, he (Sir G. Grey) did not see the force of the distinction attempted to be drawn. There was no doubt that there might arise great inconvenience if a Minister changing from one department to another, and being at the head of the department, should be absent from his place in Parliament for a week or a fortnight during his re-election for a county.

M. STUART WORTLEY pointed out to the opponents of the Bill that the existing law did not oblige a Minister, who continued to hold office, though in a new Administration, to go back to his constituents, provided he retained the same office. It struck him that the present state of things, which the Bill proposed to alter, created great inconvenience, for, as almost every Member of Government since the passing of the Reform Bill was obliged to represent a popular constituency, it practically too much embarrassed the prerogative of the Crown in the choice of its servants and proved an impediment to putting the right men in the right places.

M. BECKETT DENISON should vote for the Bill, because he thought it would prove advantageous to the Crown in respect to the choice of its Ministers, and in the case of large counties, such as Yorkshire, he believed that re-elections, on account of the change of one office for another, would be deemed extremely inconvenient.

The House divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 73: Majority 4.

CONVENTION WITH SARDINIA BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, this Bill had not yet been printed; but it simply empowered the Government to raise the funds necessary for giving effect to the Convention with Sardinia. The clauses were not likely to give rise to any discussion; but if any hon. Member wished to address the House upon the subject, he would have an opportunity of doing so on going into Committee. Under these circumstances he hoped the House would agree to the second reading now.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 29, 1855.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2<sup>a</sup> Intramural Burials (Ireland).
3<sup>a</sup> Despatch of Business (Court of Chancery).

INTRAMURAL BURIALS (IRELAND) BILL.

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER moved that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months. His opposition to the Bill was occasioned by the circumstance that while it gave powers to the Government, by an order in Council, for the closing of existing burial grounds, it did not impose the slightest obligation to provide other burial grounds for the parishes and places the grounds of which were so closed. As the church could not recognise burials, except in consecrated ground, it might hence arise that the people of Ireland might be prevented from burying their dead according to the law of the church.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON called attention to the evils which had attended the English measure, and to the scenes of indecency which were daily taking place in parishes at the east end of London, in consequence of burial grounds having been closed before new ones had been provided. When he last called attention to this subject, an noble Friend of his (the Earl of Aberdeen) promised that something should be done to remove the evil, yet at the present moment bodies were taken in all kinds of conveyances to unconsecrated ground, buried a great number in the same grave, and divine service, as it was called, read over them by the gravedigger, who slipped on a surplice for the purpose. It was impossible to describe the scenes of abominable indecency which daily occurred in consequence of this defect of the law, which permitting the closing of one burial ground before another had been provided to supply its place. It was the bounden duty of the Government to correct so great a social and moral evil, by making some provision for the decent burial of the dead ; and as there was an absolute necessity for some remedy, he should, after Easter, call their Lordships' attention to the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say, that some inconvenience had indeed followed the operation of the law in certain parts of the metropolis, but that the local authorities were now bestirring themselves to provide a remedy. By the English act, a board elected by the rate payers had power to provide a new burial ground ; in Ireland it would be impracticable to apply the same provisions, without the risk of occasioning unseemly disputes.

LORD MONTEAGLE thought it better to suspend the operation of this Bill, which would only remedy one evil by creating another.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW, thinking some measure of this kind was required in Ireland, did not wish to oppose the present Bill. He suggested that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) should take the second reading now, with the distinct understanding that he would postpone the further stages of the Bill until after Easter, and that if he could not insert provisions to meet the objections which had been urged against it, he would not persevere with it.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he had not the slightest wish to press his motion, provided he obtained from the Lord President an assurance that some provisions should be made to meet the objection which he had made.

EARL GRANVILLE expressed his willingness to adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Wicklow), and to postpone the further stages of the Bill until after Easter.

EARL GREY thought that the subject alluded to by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) ought not to be allowed to rest where it did. Last year the House was horrified at the statement which was then laid before it by the right rev. Prelate, as to the working of the Metropolitan Interment Act. He (Earl Grey) ventured at the time to recommend that he should not be satisfied with the assurance of the Government that something should be done, but that he should adopt a course which he hoped the right rev. Prelate would now take, namely, to move for a Select Committee, which should inquire into the question and ascertain whose fault it was that these abuses had been allowed to exist. Having ascertained that, Parliament would be in a proper situation to insist upon the application of some remedy. As the provision of new burial grounds would require the raising of funds, either by rates or otherwise, it would be necessary that a measure should be introduced into the other House of Parliament ; and he hoped that the Government would consider whether the best course would not be to bring a new Bill into the other House, which should be passed by that House before their Lordships should be asked to consent to it.

Lord REDESDALE said, that this Bill provided for the summary closing of burial grounds, and ought to contain an equally summary provision for the opening of new ones. If not, the disgusting scenes now presented in the east of London would be repeated, perhaps exceeded in Ireland. He believed that in some parishes in the metropolis carts might be seen conveying the coffins of paupers to the graves, into which they were thrown with almost as little ceremony as if they were the remains of animals.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER having withdrawn his amendment,

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2° accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

MILITIA (IRELAND) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW objected to the measure being passed with so little delay between its stages. The object of the Bill was to give three months' time to the officers of the Irish militia in which to lodge their qualifications, in default of which they became liable to certain penalties. It was rather hard to introduce this Bill at the present moment. If its provisions had been introduced into the Bill of last year no complaint could have been made, but the officers had since incurred the expense of uniforms, &c., and there were captains who were qualified at the time they received their commissions, but who had since lost their qualifications, and would now be unable to lodge them in compliance with the Act.

Lord PANMURE said, that he had moved the third reading that night because he was not aware that there were any objections to the passing of the measure. As, however, there seemed to be some, he had no objection to postpone that step until after Easter.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, a few days ago I moved for returns relative to the militia, which met the approval of the Minister of War, and were ordered by the House to be printed. These returns referred to the number of men who had volunteered from the different regiments of militia into the regiments of the line and the artillery, and the Royal marines. The noble Lord had recently issued a circular, of which I approve; and I certainly think the noble Lord the Minister of War has done all that under the circumstances could be done, disagreeable and difficult as those circumstances are, in giving the additional bounty to the militia, although they were enlisted under the Act of 1852. Those persons entered the militia before the 12th of May, last year, and are now, under the operation of the Act, legally compelled to remain permanently with the embodied militia; but, until the noble Lord and the House shall see the result of the proposition which the noble Lord has made, there must still be considerable anxiety upon the subject, and even that which we have before us is sufficient to excite great alarm. We have before us the fact that, the establishment of the militia being 136,000 effective men, the number of effective men is now only 44,000, and I am afraid that, under the operation of the difficulties which have now arisen, the number of those effective men will be very materially reduced. I certainly am of opinion that it is to keeping up the militia nearly to its full complement that we must in a great measure look for filling the ranks of the regiments of the regular army during the war. I find that during the period from 1803 to 1813, while 116,000 men were obtained by ordinary recruiting for the regular army, 100,000 men were at the same time obtained from the militia; and while the establishment of the militia then amounted to 93,000 men, the number of effectives in the last year of the war was 63,000. Under the operation of the law, therefore, as it then existed, you drew from your militia a number of men nearly equal to the number you otherwise obtained for the regular army, and, at the same time, during five or six years at the conclusion of the war the effective force of the militia suffered no diminution, notwithstanding these constant draughts into the line. I apprehend it is to a similar source we must look at present; but, disregarding all the experience we might derive from the past, we are now attempting to establish and maintain a militia, not only without having recourse to the ballot, but without substituting any coercive measure whatever in the districts from which that militia is to be obtained. I apprehend it is perfectly impossible for us to continue in that course. But while I again—I fear for the third or fourth time—earnestly press this matter upon your Lordships' attention, there is another matter to which I particularly desire to draw the immediate attention of the noble Lord the Minister of War—it is this—while we have so much difficulty in obtaining men for the regular army and keeping it up to its establishment, it is surely of the highest necessity that we should be able to avail ourselves in the field of the effective services of every man who carries a bayonet. I believe that if the noble Lord will make inquiry he will find that at the present moment, in the Crimea, the number of good soldiers who have become non-effectives in consequence of being employed as servants, batmen, clerks in offices, and under the commissariat, is so very large as most materially to diminish the efficiency of the regiments in the field. I am afraid to state the proportion which the persons so abstracted from the real strength of the regiments bears to the total effective strength of those regiments. I know the fact, but I am sure I should not obtain credence if I were to state the numbers to your Lordships; but I earnestly desire the noble Lord to give his immediate attention to the subject. Be it understood that the best men, not the worst, are taken for these services, and the consequence is that the raw recruits, the raw lads, are employed in preference to the best and strongest men in the performance of duties of the most arduous kind. It is not in the Crimea that this difficulty can be met. The army is not in a populous country, the inhabitants of which can assist the commissariat in providing provisions, or can be employed in the different offices; that country is not like India, in which every fighting man is left for fighting purposes alone; because, in the Crimea, persons are taken from the effectives of the army to perform civil duties which it is absolutely essential should be performed. These duties must be performed; and unless persons qualified to perform them are sent from this country, or are found elsewhere, it is impossible for the General Commanding in Chief to restore to the ranks the good soldiers who have been taken from it. I can assure the noble Lord and the House that this is a difficulty—I may almost say a danger—of the most pressing urgency. There is another point to which I must request to draw the noble Lord's attention. When the noble Lord stated the appointment of Lieutenant Colonel M'Murdo to the command of the land transport corps, I entirely approved of the appointment of the individual and the formation of the corps, which I thought was a very great practical improvement; but I gave the noble Lord this advice: I told him that unless he confided to the officer who had the direction of that corps the power to feed his own animals, the corps would become inefficient and the animals would be starved. I said, besides, that it was necessary that that officer should have at his disposal vessels by which he might transport food for the animals to the Crimea. I beg to repeat that suggestion most earnestly; for I feel even more satisfied now than when I first made it, about two months ago, that if the feeding of these animals is left to the ordinary commissariat they will be starved by the same mismanagement as that by which the other animals have hitherto been starved. Observe, my Lords, what will be the consequence. It is idle for any man to expect that, proceeding as the army now proceeds, it can ever succeed in taking Sebastopol; no reasonable man can entertain that expectation. It is only by making the army moveable, by enabling it to enter the field and beat the enemy in the field, and drive him from the neighbourhood of the fortress, that ultimate success can be obtained. But, unless you establish a system by which not only these animals may be supplied and kept in good order, and the persons attending them kept in good discipline, but by which the animals may also be fed, you deprive yourselves altogether of the only hope you have of the successful termination of the war. As the matter now stands, every arrangement of the commissariat is directly the reverse of that which should be established with a view to the efficiency of the service. All the persons at the head of it are civilians, all the subordinates are soldiers; the exact reverse is the true principle upon which you ought to proceed—all the superior officers ought to be military officers, and all the subordinates ought to be taken from any source rather than from the army in the field.

LORD PANMURE: I think that the noble Earl is under some misconception with regard to the number of the militia, for when I stated that the number of effective men belonging to it in England was 44,000, I did not include the effectives of the Scotch and Irish militia. I do not know that I quite agree with the noble Earl in thinking that the militia is entirely to be looked upon as a nursery for the line, although, no doubt, it was so to a very great extent during the last war. The noble Earl must recollect that there are very good grounds for accounting for the present discrepancy between the number of effectives in the militia and the force at which it ought to stand. At this moment we are acting on a totally different principle from that which guided us during the last war; we are endeavouring to accomplish by voluntary means that which could formerly only be accomplished by compulsory means; we are now relying upon the patriotism of the country to supply of its own accord that which the country was compelled to supply during the last war. I should be very sorry if this experiment failed; I should be very much disappointed as to the feeling which ought to exist in this country if it should be unsuccessful. I am not in a condition at this moment to say that it may not fail; but I earnestly hope that the people of this country will think better of the course the Government are pursuing, and that the ranks of the militia will, by voluntary enlistment, be kept in that condition which we have a right to expect. With reference to the noble Earl's remarks respecting the regular army, I am afraid he is not sufficiently acquainted with the history and versed in the details of that branch of the service to know that there has been a contest almost ever since the regular army has been constituted as to keeping up the force of effectives at the number at which it has been borne on the Votes of the House of Commons. There are various reasons to account for reductions in the number of effectives; and, do what you will, even in time of peace, as I have found from my own experience in the War Office, it is almost impossible to maintain the effective strength of the army at the numbers voted by Parliament. With regard to what the noble Earl has said as to the number of effective men in the field, having been greatly reduced by men having been taken for other engagements, to some extent the noble Earl is perfectly right; but I believe that the attention of my noble Friend Lord Raglan must have been turned to this, for, on comparing the last statement, of the 16th of March, with the previous one of the 13th of March, I find that a great reduction has taken place of not fewer than one-half of those who were employed in the camp in the occupations described, who have been transferred to the fighting ranks of the army. I have had some practical experience as to this, and know that the strongest and best men of the regiments are not taken for officers' servants, tailors, shoemakers, and other employments of the camp, but they are generally those men who are least likely to be useful in the field. No doubt they must have gone through the regular discipline to qualify them for the service; but I should be very sorry if the strongest and best men in the regiments were taken for such employments. If we were to follow out the plan which the noble Earl is desirous of seeing carried out, of supplying bâtmens, pioneers, and others, from civilians and the inhabitants of the country, the army would find itself in the state of the Indian army, and, instead of being merely regiments in the field to the amount of 1,000 men, we should have also some 2,000 camp followers attendant upon them; and how, with our Commissariat, could we supply such numbers? I think, if we had to purvey for 3,000 men instead of 1,000, we should experience far greater difficulties than we do at present. Under these circumstances, I think the best mode of proceeding is to carefully watch the evils that might arise from employing the best men in these situations—still to allow the camp duties to be performed by your enlisted men, allowing them such aid by procuring the assistance of the inhabitants of the country as may from time to time be deemed necessary. With reference to the land transport corps, the advice which the noble Earl gave on a former occasion has not failed to attract my notice; it may appear very proper that the land transport corps should be charged with the maintenance of its own animals, but, then, you would have to attach to this corps, not only a body of people to look after the animals, but also a Commissariat of its own; and when you came to add to this the vessels to carry forage to the land transport corps, I think the noble Earl will see that we should be taking from the Commissariat its own proper duties, and should again be falling into that error from which most of our difficulties have arisen, namely, that of dividing the duties of one department between two corps, and not getting them properly performed by either. I therefore think that all responsibility for the transport of cattle, and for the providing of supplies for all the animals of the army, and for all the men, had better be left, as at present, to the Commissariat.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: There can be no doubt from what the noble Lord has stated that a great abuse has existed, if between the 13th and the 16th of March the number of regulars in civil occupations in the army has been reduced one-half. My information happens to be of the 12th of March, and I therefore spoke of facts which I thought necessary to bring under the observation of the noble Lord. With respect to dividing the duties of the Commissariat, there seems to me to be a great difference between providing forage for animals and food for human beings, and there could be no difficulty in separating the one from the other. I am not desirous of being a prophet of ill, but I do prophesy, with the most absolute certainty, that my prediction will be fulfilled, if we leave the Commissariat in the Crimea in the hands in which it now is, the animals will be starved and the army will be unable to move.

EARL GREY: I think my noble Friend (Lord Panmure) has come to a right conclusion on the last point to which he referred, and that it would be an error to have one office providing for the horses of the land transport corps, and to have another for providing forage and food for the horses and men of the regular army. Such a system would give rise to the difficulties of former times, and we should have officers raising prices by bidding against each other in the same market. It is quite another thing as to whether the Commissariat should be left in the same hands as at present. On this I can offer no opinion; but of this I am certain, that, providing the Commissariat is placed in good hands, the same hands had better provide the supply of forage both for the horses of the land transport corps and for those of the regular army.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I did not propose to separate the supply of forage for the animals of the land transport corps from that of the cavalry and artillery, but desired that the whole should be supplied by one office—that the food for the animals should be found by one body, and the food for the men by another.

EARL GREY: If the land transport corps were to have to supply forage for all the horses, I think that even such an arrangement would lead to complications and difficulties. But there is another point on which I wish to say a few words. I heard the statement of the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) with regard to the militia with great apprehension, and I am persuaded that if your Lordship rely on that statement, you will be led to very erroneous conclusions. I have the means, which few of your Lordships can possess, of forming an opinion on this subject; for when I held the office of Secretary at War, circumstances rendered it necessary that I should look closely into the history and operations of the militia during the last war. In doing this, I had the assistance of a gentleman unfortunately now no more, the late Mr. Raper (one of the best public servants the nation ever had). He was thoroughly acquainted with this subject, and from the detailed information which he laid before me, the results at which I arrived were totally different from the statements made by the noble Earl. The noble Earl has said that the militia was the great means of keeping up the army during the late war, and quoted the numbers drawn from the militia into the regular army. That fact, if taken by itself, proves nothing, for at that time the bounties were so arranged that a man had the advantage of at least 2*l.* or 3*l.*, if my recollection does not deceive me, by going into the army by the road of the militia, instead of entering the regular army at once. This being the case, the men naturally entered the army through the militia. But with reference to the late war, I would particularly call your attention to the fact, that instead of the compulsory raising of men for the militia having been found useful, it was the very reverse. It was clearly shown to me, by returns of the whole number of men raised for the army and militia together, month by month, that the recruiting for the regular army fell off the moment it became known that you were going to raise men for the militia by the ballot. Instead, therefore, of the militia having been an effective mode of recruiting the regular army, I came to an opposite conclusion to that arrived at by the noble Earl, and was satisfied that it had been injurious to it, and that if the ancient law of England had been maintained, by which volunteering from the militia was prohibited, and if, instead of allowing such volunteering, the bounty for directly entering the army had been increased, more men would by that means have been raised than were obtained from the militia. That is the conclusion to which Mr. Raper came, and in which I agreed after having carefully considered the subject. The Government of that day must, I presume, have been satisfied that the ballot was not upon the whole useful, for, if I am not mistaken, during the last years of the war, when the demand for men was greatest, they discontinued it. But even while the ballot remained in use, the number of men really raised by it for the military service of the country was exceedingly small. It was found that the percentage of balloted men who ever joined the militia regiments was miserably small. The men who served in the militia were almost entirely substitutes, who were obtained by bounties paid by the persons liable to the ballot, who generally belonged to clubs formed for this purpose. Thus, as was stated by a noble Earl, whom I do not see in his place (the Earl of Derby), in explaining his own Militia Bill in the year 1852, the militia during the last war was really raised by bounty, and the only operation of the ballot was to provide the money from which that bounty was paid, not by fair and equal taxation, but by that most unfair of all taxes, an infamous poll tax, which pressed severely on the poorest classes of the community. This was the result of the system of balloting in the late war, and I hope and trust that we shall hear of no proposal for now recurring to a practice so unjust and also so extravagant. As to the strength of the regular army not being able to be maintained unless the militia is brought up to its full complement, I ask whether it is possible that 136,000 men—which I understand to be the proposed number—can be permanently embodied in the militia without interfering with the recruiting for the regular army? The moment your militia is embodied you want the services of precisely the same class of men—namely, those not bound by family or other ties—that you require for the line; and your militia force virtually becomes neither more nor less than another regular army. It is as expensive as troops of the line while it is out on service; but there is this important difference between the two, that you cannot order the militia to go abroad. It appears to me, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government would act on a wiser plan if, instead of resorting to violent measures in order to raise the militia to its full strength, they turned their attention more to the recruiting of the regular army—the true professional service.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE thought it was an important question for Parliament and the country to consider whether, under the present system of voluntary enlistment, with hardly any bounty, it was possible, even by straining that system to the utmost, to maintain in the field an army of the magnitude which the exigencies of the war demanded. He, for one, was of opinion that it was not possible. Again, as regarded the navy, we had already raised 44,000 seamen, 10,000 boys, and 15,000 marines, and should we be able under the existing system to maintain the present number of ships afloat, and to place still more of them on active service, if it should be necessary for us to do so? These questions had a very important bearing upon the security of our foreign alliances. Foreign nations had the highest opinion of our troops, and the utmost confidence that when in the field their gallantry would secure the victory; but, if our army was again to be wasted as it already had been, and we should be unable to renew its strength with properly disciplined soldiers, then those nations might say that that dependence could not be placed on our power to sustain the brunt of the struggle which the adoption of a different system from our existing one might justify. These were serious considerations, which ought to be pondered over in the public mind; for, if the war was to go on and be prosecuted with vigour, the country must make up its mind to maintain its army and navy in an efficient state.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading discharged; and Bill to be read 3rd on Thursday the 19th of April next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 29, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWEORN.—For Wilton, Edmund Antrobus, esq.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Free Schools; Places of Religious Worship Registration; Church Rates Abolition; Parliamentary Representation (Scotland).

THE BERNAL COLLECTION—QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to ask the hon. Secretary of the Treasury whether any, and what, sums of money have been expended on behalf of the nation by the officers of the Society of Arts and Sciences in Marlborough House, and the trustees of the British Museum, in the purchase of articles of virtù at the sale of the property of the late Mr. Bernal; and, if so, by whose authority such purchases have been made, without the sanction of Parliament being first obtained.

MR. WILSON said, it was first suggested to the Government that they should purchase the whole of the collection. That suggestion was considered by the Government, and it was decided that the sum of 12,000*l.* should be given to the department of Art and Science for the purpose of purchasing those portions of the collection which they considered necessary to make perfect their present collection, and that 4,000*l.* should be given to the British Museum for the same purpose. The authority on which this was done was an authority vested in the Treasury by that House. 100,000*l.* was granted annually by the House, and the Government had a discretion to expend that sum in the course of the year, furnishing to Parliament at the close of the year a statement of the expenditure. This, and a great variety of other expenditure at the discretion of Government had been incurred under that authority.

MR. MACARTNEY: Under what head of the Estimates does that 100,000*l.* appear?

MR. WILSON: There is a special Estimate by itself in the Civil Contingencies.

CHRISTIAN CONVERTS IN TURKEY—QUESTION.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he begged to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether there still existed in Turkey a law which condemns to death a Mussulman convert to Christianity; and, if so, whether this Government, or our allies the French, have or intend exercising their influence to abolish so unjust a punishment?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. Member will see, if he refers to the papers which were laid upon the table in May, 1844, called "Correspondence relative to executions in Turkey for apostasy from Islamism," that Sir Stratford Canning, on the 23rd of March of that year, writes a despatch in which he states that he has obtained an assurance from the Sultan, and a formal document from the Turkish Government, providing that no such executions should take place in future. In giving an account of the audience which he had with the Sultan upon the subject, he says—

"What passed at this audience is the more important from its formal character; and the Sultan, to give a greater value to it, after I had retired from his presence, called back the dragoman and desired him to assure me that what he had stated in public proceeded from his sincere convictions, and was, in fact, his real and sincere sentiment."

The official document to which Sir Stratford Canning referred stated that, in relinquishing the practice of executions for apostasy, it was the special intention of His Highness the Sultan that the cordial relations with the high Powers should be preserved, and the Sublime Porte engaged to take effectual measures to prevent from henceforward the execution of any persons for apostasy.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT: Does not that apply to Christians becoming Mussulmans and then apostatising, and not to the case which I have put?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I understand it to apply to the whole case.

STAMP DUTIES ON MATRICULATIONS—
QUESTION.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was the intention of the Government to propose during the present Session any measure for abolishing the stamp duties on matriculations and degrees in the Universities of Cambridge and Dublin, and thereby to place students in those Universities in the same position, as regards stamp duties, with students in the Universities of Oxford, Durham, London, the Queen's University in Ireland, and the several Scotch Universities.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was quite true, as the hon. Gentleman had stated, that in the Oxford University Act the stamp was abandoned by the Government, there being an equivalent given by the University by the payment of the salaried professors whose incomes had been previously provided for out of an annual vote. Trinity College, Dublin, was not in a condition to give a similar equivalent, inasmuch as there was no grant to Trinity College. The equivalent, however, offered was one that would give a public benefit, although it was not one from which the public would derive revenue. The subject was under consideration, and if Government thought themselves justified in making the arrangement which had been adverted to, they would recur to the subject in the course of the present Session.

THE WILTSHIRE MILITIA—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he desired to ask an explanation of an answer given the other evening by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. F. Peel) the Under Secretary at War, as to the alleged refusal of Lord Methuen, the colonel of the Wiltshire Militia, to embark his men on board a certain transport ship which had been provided by the Government. The hon. Gentleman had most unaccountably stated that the reason of the refusal of the noble Lord was that the ship was not a steamer but a sailing vessel. He desired to know if the hon. Gentleman meant to convey to the House that this was really the only reason why the noble Lord had objected to embark his men? If so, then he desired the hon. Gentleman to be so good as to explain the sense in which he used the word "object." [Order, order.] If it were intended to prevent his putting such questions as might elicit an explanation of this extraordinary statement on the part of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of War, he (Colonel North) would most assuredly move the adjournment of the House in order to enable himself to speak upon the subject strictly within its technical rules, for the statement of the hon. Gentleman had caused the greatest concern throughout the officers of the army and militia, as this was the first time in the history of the army that any officer had objected to go on board a Government ship simply because it was not a steamer. It must be known that the only reason which could possibly justify a commanding officer in refusing to allow his men to embark on board a vessel must be a conviction that she was in such a state as to render their conveyance in her unsafe. For the sake, then, not merely of the character of Lord Methuen—who would have embarked in a collier if necessary—but for the sake of the discipline and credit of the army at large, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would explain the sense in which he had stated that Lord Methuen had objected to allow his men to embark on board the transport because she was a sailing ship.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has forgotten to move the adjournment of the House.

Viscount Palmerston

COLONEL NORTH then moved that "the House do now adjourn."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : I put it to the House whether this kind of proceeding is not exceedingly irregular ? First, I object to the practice of putting speeches in the form of questions ; and then the hon. and gallant Gentleman, by way of curing that irregularity, fell into another ; for I appeal to Mr. Speaker whether, on moving the adjournment, a Member ought not to confine himself to the reasons for the adjournment. Now, Sir, as to the questions put by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I believe the real fact to have been this : that there was no want of zeal on the part of Lord Methuen, nor any indisposition to do the best that could be done for the service ; but it appeared, on an examination of the ship, that she had not the accommodation for all the persons who were to embark on board, and which would be fitting for such a voyage.

MR. DISRAELI : The House, Sir, ought to recollect that the irregularity of which the noble Lord has complained originated in a correct answer not having been given by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary at War to a question of an important character, which was, why the commanding officer of a body of militia had declined to allow his men to embark on board a Government transport. The answer of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary at War, on the part of the Government, was, I must say, eminently unsatisfactory. And not only was it unsatisfactory, but it was calculated to lead to serious misconceptions in the public mind as to the state of discipline in the army. This was a matter which it was clear must be brought before the House ; and I should have imagined that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary at War, would have availed himself of this opportunity to explain his extraordinary statement.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that Lord Methuen had heard that the Lancashire regiment of Militia had been sent out in a steamer, and had naturally asked for what reason the Wiltshire regiment of Militia was to be sent in a sailing ship.

CONVENTION WITH SARDINIA BILL.

Order for Committee read ; House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. FRENCH said, he wished to call attention to the irregular departure from usual practice which had been resorted to on this occasion by the hon. Secretary of the Treasury, who had late yesterday evening, without any notice, got this Bill placed first, in contravention of the rule that on Thursday Motions should have priority of orders.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to inquire whether any security had been taken that the Sardinian troops should be armed with the new Minié rifle ? because, if they were to be armed with the old musket, they would not be of much use.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if there should be a sufficient number of the new muskets ready, of course it would be for the interest of this country, as well as for that of the troops, that they should be armed with that weapon.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should like to know why the rate of interest was only 3 per cent which had been charged for this loan ? Five per cent would have borne a much fairer relation to the existing value of money all over the world. Besides, he should like to know how the money was to be raised ? If they had to go into the market to borrow this 2,000,000*l.*, they would find that they could not procure it at 3 per cent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the loan was not like one contracted in the open market, and as the time over which the transaction would extend was likely to be a very long one, it had been thought by Her Majesty's Government that 3 per cent would be a reasonable rate of interest. With respect to the manner in which the money would be raised, the hon. Gentleman would see that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could not answer his question without anticipating the statement which it would be his duty to make to the House immediately after Easter.

MR. BELLEW said, it was clear that the loan was proposed to be made at a rate of interest at which Sardinia could not herself have borrowed the money in the open market. If Her Majesty's Government were going themselves to borrow the money, and if they should find themselves obliged to pay more for it than 3 per cent, then it would not be a loan to Sardinia at all, but a subsidy—a subsidy, at all events, to the extent of the difference between the interest which this country paid and received. He thought it would have been much better to let Sardinia go into the market for herself, even if it should have been necessary for this country to guarantee the loan.

CAPTAIN KNOX said, he wished to know whether the Sardinian contingent was to be maintained at its original strength of 15,000 men? He asked this question because, if the auxiliary force had to be fed by our Commissariat, it would be likely to suffer a good deal, and its numbers would soon want replenishing.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied, that the force was to be kept up at 15,000 men; and he certainly hoped that they would not be starved for want of Commissariat supplies.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 2.

Clause 3. (Accounts to be laid upon the table within twenty-eight days after the meeting of Parliament.)

MR. MULLINGS said, he begged to point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Parliament might meet in the autumn, and be prorogued within twenty-eight days. In that case, the accounts for the year would not be laid before the House at all.

MR. WILSON said, that in conformity with former precedents, the accounts, in such a case as the hon. Gentleman had put, would be furnished within twenty-eight days after the adjourned meeting of the House.

MR. MULLINGS said, he was not quite satisfied with the reply of the hon. Secretary for the Treasury.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would propose to amend the clause, by adding the words, "after the 1st day of January."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

THE ATTACK ON ODESSA.

MR. SCOTT said, he would now beg to move the Address of which he had given notice. It was not his intention to occupy the time of the House with many remarks, but he thought that as they had now arrived at the anniversary of the declaration of war, it was not too early to ask for some explanation regarding the first enterprise which had been undertaken, and he also thought that Her Majesty's Government should feel indebted to him for bringing forward this subject, because it afforded them the opportunity of showing their foresight and sagacity if the war had been well conducted, whereas, if it had been mismanaged, it would afford the country an opportunity of correcting the errors which had been committed. There were some few things connected with the war which were already known. It was known that originally the war was to be defrayed out of revenue, but that it had become a charge upon capital; we know that instead of being paid out of six months' income tax, it was now costing the country about 800,000*l.* a week, or 110,000*l.* per day. Last March a small expedition to Malta was thought sufficient, but now it was known that a very large force had gone out of the country, of which a small portion only would return. It was known now that the war had already cost 40,000,000*l.*, and that night the House had agreed to add 2,000,000*l.* to that sum, in the shape of a loan to Sardinia; and it was known, besides, that that vast drain of treasures had also been accompanied by an awful drain of human life. It was known that last summer the Cabinet had decided that there were only three courses open for carrying on the war in the East—either that the troops should return to Constantinople, that they should cross the Danube, or that they should attack Sebastopol, the speedy capture of which was expected. The last course was adopted, but Sebastopol not only had not fallen, but, whereas at first the only channel open to it for supplies was by way of Perekop, now he believed there were three channels open. Was there not a fourth alternative, beyond the three courses proposed by Lord John Russell—namely, to occupy Odessa? The occupation of Odessa by our naval and military forces would have aided the Turks materially by effecting a diversion in their favour in the spring, as it would have protected us in the autumn, by preventing the despatch of those Russian reinforcements which had been arrayed against us in the bloody field of Inkerman. Odessa was at the period to which he alluded, merely a commercial town, with a population of nearly 90,000, and a port capable of containing from 250 to 300 ships. Before the war commenced the late Emperor, perceiving the importance of defending so important a position, ordered it to be fortified, disregarding the objections of Prince Dolgorouki and other influential persons, who urged that the batteries then proposed to be erected were calculated to provoke an attack on the town. On the 6th of April last year the boats of the steam frigate Furious went in with a flag of truce and were fired upon; and upon the 22nd the combined fleets, having received no explanation of this affair, proceeded to bombard the batteries and fortifications. The result was well known. They demolished the fortifications—sunk twelve ships of war in the port—took possession of thirteen transports, and released twenty-four British ships. The magazine containing the military and naval stores was blown up, while neutral and private property was respected. This showed what it was in the power of the allied fleets to do. They left unaccomplished, however, what it was in the power of such a fleet to have done, and afforded the Russians an opportunity of seeing where their fortifications were vulnerable, and of supplying the deficiency. That, however, was immaterial, as compared with the moral effect of this unsatisfactory proceeding. The late Emperor, writing to General Osten-Sacken on the 8th of May, congratulated him upon having "gloriously repelled" the fleets of France and England after they had for twelve hours bombarded the batteries in vain, and declared that the city had been saved from destruction. Now, there was no occasion to have destroyed the city. The fortifications might have been demolished, and the place might have been occupied and rendered untenable for the enemy, to whom this position was of the utmost importance. The importance of the place was shown by an edict of the governor, in which, alluding to the possibility of another attack, he declared that, in that case the inhabitants would be expected to retire from Odessa, "after having reduced the city to ashes;" so as to afford no asylum to the allies. If, as was manifest, the Russian Government attached such great importance to that place, the British Parliament had a right to ask the British Government why the attempt had not been made to occupy it before the defences were completed. He knew that many objections might be raised to the course he had taken in bringing the question forward; but, admitting that the privilege of asking for papers involves great responsibility, and is not to be used on light or insufficient occasions, when he considered the vast sacrifice of human life which had followed, when he looked at the bloodshed and the expenditure of the past, and at the prospect for the future, he believed he was justified in making his Motion. He thought that a heavy responsibility would rest on those Ministers who would refuse information. There are many, and I confess that I am among the number, of those who think that much of the responsibility of this war rests on those who concealed from us the real state of affairs, the Government having all the information as to the real designs of the Emperor, both from St. Petersburg and from Constantinople, before the war broke out, deluded Parliament and the nation by declaring that "Russia had no designs on Turkey," and that "we could not possibly be involved in war;" and thus, unprepared, we had drifted into war, and had taken a desperate leap in the dark. Some Gentlemen might think that the question was too soon, others that it was too remote. But what took place a year ago, and what was a fait accompli, could not be fairly open to this objection. It might be said that the present was not the same Government as were responsible for the acts of last year; but while the present Government contained the same Members, and was in fact identical with the last, he thought he was justified in considering it the same Government. Another objection might be raised by those who would say—"would you have demolished the place, destroyed the city, and sacked the town?" But that, as he had previously stated, would not have been necessary. Then the parsimony of the House might be pleaded to make out that the Government was not responsible for our defective enterprises; but that was good cause for seeing that the House was not placed in such a position in future. It might too, and probably would, be objected, that the production of the correspondence would injure the public service. But that objection might be, and indeed had been, carried on too far. Another, and, perhaps, the most important objection to inquiry was, that in a question of this nature our allies would be implicated in an awkward manner. It may be quite true that Admiral Dundas was not the superior officer in the Allied fleet; it may also be true that the fleet of our Allies was subordinate to the other arm of force. I admit the full force of an objection resting on this circumstance, if the attack on Odessa were a chance which, not being seized or fully effected on the 22nd of April, never could be resumed; but it was an event for which ample opportunities offered themselves from April to September, it was an event which the Russians expected would recur, and during the whole summer of 1854 there was time for the Cabinet of St. James to come to some decision on the subject, and, in fact, they must both have deliberated and decided on the project, and have communicated with the Cabinet of the Tuilleries, and have written their instructions to the

Admirals. If the argument of detriment to the public service is to be used with caution, that of embarrassing us with our powerful neighbour requires still more. We all remember the awful warnings of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) on the Sebastopol Committee; we remember the whisperings that the French Emperor would dissolve the connection, or that Parliament must be dissolved, to get rid of a Committee so obnoxious to Louis Napoleon. He is not the Prince quietly to sit under the blame of our mismanagement; if reflections be cast, he will see that they do not fall on him. You cannot use this stalking-horse as a cheval de bataille, and, looking to the past inactivity of our fleet in the Black Sea, he was not prepared to admit the validity of such an objection. It is said to be unusual to produce the instructions to commanders; such events as those of last year happily are unusual. He entirely denied that the Motion was without precedent. In the year 1807, as in the year 1854, an expedition from this country passed the Dardanelles. In that year Sir John Duckworth appeared before Constantinople with seven ships of the line and four frigates. His delay alone rendered his expedition fruitless, and he returned without having accomplished the object of the expedition, and in the following year, though the war continued, no less than four Motions were brought forward in Parliament in reference to the subject, and, instead of resisting inquiry, the Government consented to lay upon the table all papers bearing upon the case between the Home Government, the Ambassador, and Lord Collingwood, and between Lord Collingwood and Sir John Duckworth. The object of the present Motion was merely to ascertain whether the conduct of Admiral Dundas or of the Government was open to censure. He had never entertained the idea of calling in question the personal courage of Admiral Dundas, but he desired to know what amount of discretion the Admiral had exercised, and what powers had been vested in him? Palmam qui merit ferat. If he deserved censure or praise he should have it. Admiral Dundas had been placed at the head of one of the finest fleets that ever left this country. He had had under his command no less than forty ships of war, with an armament of 1,300 guns and manned by 14,000 sailors; and what had been the result of the operations of that fleet? Shortly after it entered the Black Sea, one vessel, the Tiger, ran ashore and was lost, and soon afterwards, in defiance of the near presence of the allied fleets, twelve Russian vessels appeared upon the coast of Circassia, and safely carried off 5,000 of the picked troops of Russia, together with batteries, stores, and provisions? We know that the Vladimir steam-frigate came out of Sebastopol, and, in spite of the combined fleets, after scouring the Black Sea and sinking several Turkish vessels, returned safely into harbour. We know that the fleet blockaded neither the Black Sea nor that of Azoff, as if there were no time during four summer months to learn which was according to the law of nations, the blockade of Odessa and the blockade of the Straits of Kertch, or that of the Bosphorus, which had been proposed. As our fleet had not been engaged in any useful operations before July, and as cholera had not then broken out, he wished to know, for the sake of Admiral Dundas himself, why no advantageous expedition had been undertaken before the services of the fleet were required in conveying the troops to the Crimea. Why did these magnificent preparations end only in disappointment and expense?—

"Parturiunt montes, nascitur ridiculus mus."

He might, perhaps, be told that ample discretion had been left to Admiral Dundas; but was that discretion fettered and clogged in such a manner that the Admiral ran all the risk while the Government received all the praise? Personally, it is only fair to Admiral Dundas—but this matter has a wider bearing; for if no information were given by the Government, the effect would be to prevent high public men from undertaking important enterprises, under the impression that they might be left to lie under a cloud of dark insinuations, or be rendered liable to unworthy attacks. Admiral Napier in his letter said, that "no officer of honour or character was safe;" and while he complains that in October he was goaded to risk Her Majesty's fleet in the Baltic, we ought to know why nothing was done in summer in the Black Sea. When Nelson was alive, Sir Robert Calder attacked the fleet of Villeneuve with an inferior force. He defeated the French Admiral and captured two large Spanish vessels, but though victorious, the people at home were so dissatisfied with his conduct, that upon arriving in England he underwent a court-martial and received a severe reprimand. Surely, then, if in such an instance inquiry was desirable, it was much more requisite in a case of this description. The running into Curaçoa harbour, 100 yards wide, the capture of that place, with its ships and batteries, was but a morning's work for Captain Brisbane in 1807, with only four frigates; could not Admiral Dundas have done as much? If so, why did he not? We are compelled to credit the surmises we have heard respecting the conduct of the war; that we are "conducting the war with the least possible interruption to the usual operations of trade"—so said the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell); but how does this apply to Odessa? No doubt Odessa was a most important commercial town, but of late it had become something more—namely, a dépôt for stores, provisions, and munitions of war, and at any rate it ought to have been occupied by the allies. By the course which had been pursued the trade in that quarter had been closed to us and opened only to the Greeks. By neither occupying Odessa nor blockading it, and by leaving trade open to others which we closed to ourselves, we had done exactly the reverse of what the Board of Trade desired; the consequences to commerce have been, to transfer to foreigners the British trade, to give the gain to Greeks the friends of Russia, to keep the losses to ourselves, to pay the enemy for their troops in money, to raise or maintain the rates of exchange in Russia, and to render a losing concern the rising trade to India and our Colonies. The Economist said, last autumn, "While Russian exports here remained the same, British exports thither had greatly declined." The merchants of Bristol complain that the peace of the Board of Trade with the war of the Horse Guards, is injurious to them. Odessa was spared on principles of commerce and humanity;—we send coin and lead to the Czar to conduct his war, as we sent arms and ammunition to the Kafirs, and look at the exchange! We tenderly give the quarter to Russian property they barbarously refuse to our wounded men. The enemy is weakest in credit, we spare and uphold him when he is weak. Your vicious mercantile system, untrue to trade, has been as false to humanity; your counters have been human heads, and your economy and humanity alike faulty. The red ink in which you have made out your commercial balance-sheet, has been the blood of the victims of your mercantile policy which spared Odessa. Every man in the Crimea cost the country 100*l.* to get there, and every man whose death is due to Odessa spared, paid it an item to your expenditure. The unfortunate result of this course was that we had been paying for Russian tallow with human blood, and bartering the lives of our own men for Russian hemp. Her Majesty's Ministers had stated this winter that they never expected the Russian corps d'armée could have been conveyed from Odessa to Sebastopol so rapidly as they had been moved, to the glorious, but dreadful and fruitless field of Lükermann, where they surprised us, and caused such fearful carnage; but when they left Russia the means of moving her troops, they should have expected that she would avail herself of those means. Since the consequences of leaving Odessa, a fortified city, in the hands of the enemy had been so fatal to our troops, he thought it was due to Admiral Dundas, to the troops who had fallen, to the survivors, to those who were mourning the loss of relatives, and to the people of this country, who had to bear the cost of the war, that they should have some information on this subject. Reference had been made to the disasters that had taken place in previous wars; but they might in the present instance lay claim to originality, they had gone to war in ignorance, as Lord Clarendon admitted, of the treaties which justified the war, in ignorance of the nature or power of the country they opposed, in ignorance of the character of the man with whom they were to be engaged, and of the troops that were to be encountered. The causes by which they had drifted into this war were concealed from the House, and he hardly thought the Government would also conceal from them the instructions that had been given with respect to the first operation in that war.

MR. BENTINCK seconded the Motion.
Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions, that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Instructions relative to the Attack on Odessa, given to the Commander in Chief in the Mediterranean and Black Sea; and Copies of, or Extracts from, all Correspondence relating thereto."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the same reasons which induced him to object altogether to the Motion would also preclude him from advertizing in any detail to the only portion of the observations of the hon. Gentleman which had the slightest reference to his Motion. He (Sir C. Wood) should not be justified in troubling the House with statistical information respecting the inhabitants of Odessa, and some other matters to which the hon. Member had referred, which had no connection whatever with the Motion; neither would he advert to the objections which the hon. Gentleman—creating giants in order that he might slay them—had said might be raised to his Resolution. His (Sir C. Wood's) objection to the Motion rested on a very simple ground, and he thought the great majority of the House would concur with him in opinion that the proposition was one which ought not to have been submitted to the House. The hon. Gentleman moved for the production of those instructions under which our Admirals in the Black Sea were now acting, and of correspondence which had reference to those instructions. Hon. Gentlemen must see that if such instructions and correspondence were produced, they would at once disclose to our enemies, the Russians, the possible intentions of our commanding officers in the Black Sea, and the views they took as to the advisability and possibility, or otherwise, of making an attack upon Odessa. He must certainly admit that hon. Members of that House, and other persons elsewhere, had gone great lengths in disclosing to the enemy the position of affairs at the seat of war, but the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Scott) went still further, and proposed to let the enemy know not only what the state of things was, but what were the present and future intentions of the Government. It was bad enough that correspondents of newspapers should have disclosed to the Russians the position of the batteries and magazines of the Allies. Improper as such communications were, an attempt had been made to justify them on the ground that the persons making them fully believed that before the intelligence could be conveyed to Russia, Sebastopol would have been taken. The result showed how unjustifiable such communications were, but the hon. Gentleman proposed to adopt a course which the slightest reflection and the experience of all ages showed to be fraught with the most mischievous and prejudicial consequences to the interests of the country. They could not fail to remember that one of the greatest operations of ancient warfare, undertaken by a Carthaginian general, and which placed the fate of Rome in peril, was defeated by the secret march of the Roman Consuls. Had electric telegraphs and "our own correspondents" been employed during the military operations of the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula, some of the most successful movements of that distinguished commander might have proved abortive. At some future time it might be a very proper subject for consideration whether the instructions and correspondence for which the hon. Member asked might not be produced, but he (Sir C. Wood) altogether objected to their disclosure at the present moment, and while hostilities were pending. The operations of the commanding officers, both naval and military, would be a very fair subject of criticism in after times. Great commanders had always been severely criticised. The most adverse opinions had been expressed as to the conduct of the Duke of Wellington throughout the Peninsular campaigns, and a very able officer of the British army had written some amusing volumes to prove that Napoleon was utterly ignorant of the art of war. He (Sir C. Wood) could not, however, conceive anything more mischievous than that the House should consent to the proposal that instructions and correspondence which, according to the showing of the hon. Gentleman himself, contained the views of our commanders with respect to attacking the enemy's ports should be made public. He thought it was not unreasonable on the part of the Government to ask the House to refuse the hon. Gentleman's request, for our commanders on the spot must be supposed to know far better than any one at home what course it was most advisable for them to pursue under existing circumstances. The war in which they were engaged was one of no light importance, one in which great and mighty interests were concerned, and objects of greater moment than that which seemed to be that of the hon. Gentleman, and which he could not better describe than in the words of the Roman poet, in the sneer which was levelled at a great commander of antiquity—

" Ut pueris placeas, et declamatio fias."

MR. MITCHELL said, he had been informed, on good authority, that the usual number of troops in Odessa was from 5,000 to 6,000 men, that there were not barracks for more than that number, and that when a larger force happened to be in the place, the authorities were obliged to billet them upon the inhabitants. His informant also said, that since the month of May, 1854, no troops had been billeted at private houses, and he (Mr. Mitchell) thought, therefore, it was clear that since that month there had been no addition, even temporarily, to the garrison of Odessa. By far the greater proportion of the Russian troops sent to the Crimea had never gone to Odessa at all, and the munitions of war sent to the Russian army had been principally conveyed from the east of the Crimea, and had not passed through Odessa. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Scott) had spoken of large magazines and stores existing at Odessa, but there were no other magazines or stores in that city than were necessary for the supply of the regular garrison. As to the permanent occupation of Odessa, unless they were prepared with a large army to stop there, the thing was impossible.

SIR GEORGE PECELL said, he hoped it was not the intention of the hon. Gentleman opposite to cast any reflection on Admiral Dundas. If the papers for which he asked were produced they would completely establish the reputation of that gallant Admiral, than whom a more able or vigilant officer did not exist. There had been but one ship of his, the Tiger, that endured any calamity.

MR. A. STAFFORD said, he thanked the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (Sir G. Pechell) for affording him an opportunity of advertizing to the conduct of Admiral Dundas, which it was not too much to say had been severely criticised upon some former occasions. He believed that the defence of Admiral Dundas was to be found in the speech of the gallant Admiral who had just resumed his seat. As far as Admiral Dundas was individually concerned, he was sure that nothing would gratify him more than that every paper transmitted to him since he had assumed his great command, should be laid upon the table of the House. If, however, any member of the Government thought it was not conducive to the interests of the public service that the papers should be produced, no one would be more ready to endure criticism, or to submit to attacks and imputations, and to submit to them in silence, as was the duty of any man accepting a post of such difficulty, than Admiral Dundas. And he would take that opportunity of saying that he thought the House must feel that the silence of Admiral Dundas under all the imputations cast upon him contrasted favourably with some examples recently before them. It was the fashion to say that, when Admiral Dundas was removed from the command, Odessa would fall, and Sebastopol would be taken. Well, the gallant Admiral had been removed, but Odessa had not yet fallen, nor had Sebastopol been yet taken. He entirely approved of the reasons alleged by the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) for refusing these papers, and he therefore trusted his hon. Friend (Mr. Scott) would not divide the House, as it would be his duty, if such should be his intent, to divide against him. However, he only rose for the purpose of bearing his humble testimony to the prudence and vigilance of a gallant Friend of his, whose conduct had been severely criticised, and to express his approbation of the manner in which he had performed his duty, for which he merited the sympathy of the House.

MR. SCOTT said, he could have no objection to withdraw the Motion if the current of opinion was against it. Nothing was further from his intention than to cast any reflection on the conduct of Admiral Dundas; and he believed that if the papers were produced they would remove every shadow of a stain from the character and conduct of the gallant Admiral. He hoped, however, some Member of the Government would state that Admiral Dundas had done all that he had it in his power to do.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, in reply to the invitation of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that I am not aware that any censure or imputation can be cast upon Admiral Dundas. Admiral Dundas stands as high as any gallant officer in Her Majesty's naval service. His conduct, while employed, has not done anything but honour to him, and if he should be employed again, I am sure he will deserve equal credit for the discharge of the duties that may be imposed upon him. The hon. Gentleman did not cast any imputation upon Admiral Dundas, and therefore my right hon. Friend (Sir C. Wood) did not think it necessary to vindicate him. Nobody accused Hercules, and there was no necessity to make his defence.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CASE OF THE EARL OF LUCAN.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, it might, perhaps, be thought that the Motion he was about to submit to the House would have been better in the hands of a military man. He could only say that, owing to the absence, through illness, of a gallant relative of his, the Member for Cheltenham, he now had the honour to stand in his place. At the same time, he must say that he had met with no military difficulties in this case which should prevent any civilian from undertaking it, and it was his intention, as much as possible, to keep clear of all military technicalities. He took it for granted that there never was a time when our soldiers were more dear to the nation than they were at that moment. Their brilliant gallantry, their patient endurance of suffering, their intelligence, and the high moral tone which beamed forth in the correspondence of all ranks of the army entitled them to our respect and gratitude, and, he would fain hope, to our protection. Was it not their duty then, as the representatives of the people, narrowly to watch over the safety and interests of such an army? Already the people, through the mouths of a large majority of their representatives, demanded inquiry into the destruction of our gallant countrymen by withholding from them the absolute necessities of life—fuel, food, raiment, and medical comforts; and the late Ministry, by opposing the appointment of the Committee on the Army before Sebastopol, had not only sacrificed their places, but, he believed, lost caste with the country. Their efforts, however, were in vain. The Committee had been appointed and was worthily doing its duty, and the result of its labours promised to be most satisfactory to the nation. He was there, however, to ask for an inquiry into the destruction of a particular portion of our army, namely, of a body of 300 soldiers, as brave as ever drew sword or put foot in stirrup, who, it was admitted, had been uselessly and wantonly sacrificed in an attempt of which there was no possibility of success, and where defeat was certain. He was not about to ask the House to grant a Committee to inquire into that loss, but, inasmuch as there already existed a proper tribunal to investigate the conduct of those composing the army, whether officers or men, and the Horse Guards having proved as much opposed to inquiry as the Ministry, it seemed to him advisable that they should address Her Majesty, praying that She would direct a court-martial to be held on the officer who was charged with being the cause of the wanton destruction of those men. He was at a loss to understand on what principle such an inquiry had been refused. Courts-martial could be held upon a couple of boys who had dragged each other out of bed and beaten each other about the head with candlesticks; but, when the subject of inquiry was the wanton destruction of 300 men, it was not conceded by the Government. The care of human life was peculiarly English, and the country was renowned as being the safest in the world to live in. Laws were passed not only to punish those who wilfully took life, but those who by their ignorance, carelessness, neglect, or incompetence, were the occasion of its loss. Should a railway servant cause the death of any person while in the execution of his duty, it was no apology for him to say that he made a mistake or misconceived the orders of the board of directors; he was held to be criminally liable; and in like manner recently had been the driver of an omnibus who had accidentally driven against a truck and killed the boy in charge of it. Why was it, then, that Parliament would not extend that protection to our gallant soldiers which it willingly afforded to railway travellers or boys employed about the streets? Were they prepared to say that the moment Englishmen put on Her Majesty's uniform they forfeited all claim to protection or sympathy? Were they prepared to treat them as mere food for powder? If so, at all events, let them clearly understand it. Let the commanders speak of the battle of Balaklava in the same strain as Falstaff of the battle of Shrewsbury, and with him say, "I have led my raganuffins where they are well peppered; out of 150 there are but three left alive, and they are for the town's end to beg for life." Was that the way to treat our soldiers? If the lives of those gallant men, who were prepared to shed their "golden blood" like water, at the command of their officers, were dear to their country, ought they not to be protected from commands falling from the lips of ignorance and incompetence? He was there to ask for inquiry into the conduct of Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan, because he believed that, through the misconception of an order received by him, the disaster at Balaklava had been occasioned. In consequence of that fatal mistake not only were 300 soldiers slain, but he might mention, though it was a minor consideration, the country had lost 360 horses, estimated with their equipments at the value of 160*l.* each; and, in point of fact, the Brigade of Light Cavalry, at that time in the Crimea, had been almost annihilated. In bringing this subject forward he was animated by no personal feeling of animosity against Lord Lucan, he had no enmity whatever to gratify, but he did it simply in the fulfilment of what he conceived to be his duty. He made no charge against the honour or the courage of Lord Lucan, he believed them both to be undoubtedly; but a grievous wrong had been done to our troops, and an inquiry into the matter would be received with joy by the whole army, for it would prove to them in what esteem they were held by that House, and would be a guarantee against the recurrence of similar mistakes. It, therefore, seemed to him that the present course was the only one which he could take; the sanction of the House was required to find the ways and means for the support of the naval and military force of the nation, and it was, therefore, their duty carefully to guard the interests and well-being of both services. The House of Commons having, however, placed those services at the disposal of the Crown, if it should decide that a case of wrong had been made out, it was its duty humbly to address Her Majesty, praying Her to institute a court-martial upon the offending party. He did not, therefore, ask for a court-martial on the ground that any officer was aggrieved, he did not ask for a court-martial for Lord Lucan, but he stood up to ask for a court-martial against Lord Lucan. In order to place before the House the grounds of his Motion, it would be necessary for him to state briefly a few of the particulars of the battle of Balaklava more immediately connected with the brilliant but most disastrous charge of the light cavalry. The Russians had advanced in great force, variously estimated at from 20,000 to 30,000 men, they had driven in the Turks, and, flushed with their easy conquest over the "true believers," they advanced with a portion of their cavalry against Sir Colin Campbell, who easily repulsed them with his gallant Highlanders. Another portion of the cavalry advanced against our heavy brigade, and were also defeated, and retreated in confusion. He begged the House to observe it was late in the day, and at a period when the Russians were in retreat, and, as Lord Raglan imagined, were attempting to carry off the guns deserted by the Turks, that his Lordship issued the following order, than which, he (Mr. Berkeley) conceived, nothing could be more clear or precise for the purpose it was intended to serve—

"Lord Raglan wishes the cavalry to advance rapidly to the front, follow the enemy,"—mark that word—"and try to prevent the enemy carrying away the guns. A troop of horse artillery may accompany. The French cavalry is on your left. Immediate. (Signed) AIRY."

Lord Raglan issued that order, and Lord Lucan on the strength of it—though it could only be interpreted as a direction to follow in the rear of a broken force and

harass its retreat—caused a body of 670 Light Dragoons to charge the whole Russian army, horse, foot, and artillery formed and in position 20,000 strong. It would be observed that there was no army in retreat, which Lord Lucan could follow according to the order, but an army with their faces towards him and in the strongest position that an army could possibly be in. The whole of the case he had to submit to the House hinged on Lord Raglan's order, and if there could be found in it one word which could extenuate Lord Lucan's conduct, most gladly would he make a present of it to the noble Lord; but the more it was dissected and analysed the more clear did Lord Raglan's intention become. In the first place, no order whatever was given by Lord Raglan to charge, the order being to follow the enemy and try to prevent his carrying away the guns. The mode of doing that was left entirely to Lord Lucan. The direction to follow certainly could not be applied to a stationary force, for it was impossible to follow a man who did not run away. But one point of the order which made Lord Raglan's intention more clear than another was the permission given to Lord Lucan to send a troop of horse artillery, for nothing could be more proper than that a couple of light guns should be sent with a brigade of light cavalry to protect it from the cloud of the enemy's cavalry which might be thrown out to cover the enemy's retreat; but, to suppose Lord Raglan contemplated that a troop with guns, merely six pounders, should follow and blaze away against the whole of the enemy's guns, some of them of very large calibre, was as absurd as to suppose that he contemplated 670 dragoons dealing with the whole of the enemy's army. The fact was, that Lord Lucan was ordered to do one thing, the necessity for which had passed away, and on his own responsibility he did another thing, and that the worst thing in the world he could have done. Why, if Lord Lucan had been ordered to embark his cavalry at Dover, and, not finding any transports there, had then commanded his men to ride over Shakespeare's cliff into the sea, he could not much more have misconceived the order, or committed an error more fatal to his men than he did at Balaklava. It certainly was strange that the noble Lord should have misconceived one of the most intelligible orders ever issued. Lord Raglan, in his despatch after the battle of Balaklava, said—

"Lord Lucan was ordered to advance rapidly and follow the enemy in their retreat, and try and prevent them effecting their object. In the meantime, the Russians had time to re-form upon their own ground, and, from some misconception of the order, the lieutenant general considered he was ordered to attack at all hazards, and he ordered Major General the Earl of Cardigan to move forward with the light brigade."

They had heard a great deal of what Captain Nolan said and did; but if his evidence could be taken, as unfortunately it could not, it would avail nothing whatever against Lord Raglan's written order, and must be useless unless the seal could be "railed" off that bond. Captain Nolan was unfortunately killed—and de mortuis nil nisi bonum—yet he really believed Captain Nolan to have been a most amiable and gallant officer. According to Lord Lucan's account, General Airey first gave Captain Nolan a verbal message, but luckily for Lord Raglan he afterwards called back Captain Nolan, and committed the message to writing. Now, one of the greatest military authorities of the day, the Duke of Richmond, fully agreed in his (Mr. Berkeley's) view of the case, and that was not a little support to an humble civilian like himself. It appeared that Captain Nolan was most anxious to have a fight, and volunteered his advice, or, as Lord Lucan stated—very justly no doubt—obtruded his advice. It was only to be lamented that Lord Lucan did not rather take the opinion of Lord Cardigan, but permitted Captain Nolan's advice to operate on his mind so as to lead to that unfortunate charge, instead of putting Captain Nolan under arrest, as had been suggested elsewhere. Now, if anything could be pointed out in extenuation of Lord Lucan's conduct, he would be most ready to admit it. Perhaps it would be charitable to suppose that Lord Lucan imagined that the enemy was in retreat, but nothing of the sort had occurred to his Lordship's mind. He was prepared to show the House that when Lord Lucan sent those 670 dragoons to contend against such odds he was perfectly informed of the strength of the enemy and their position. When Lord Lucan received the order from Lord Raglan he commanded Lord Cardigan to advance. Now, if there was one man in the British army to whom an order to advance would be more grateful than to another, that man was Lord Cardigan. All the antecedents of that nobleman's life—which had been known to the public, savoured rather of rashness than caution. A most gallant man, he might well be termed the Hotspur of the British army, and it might be said of him that he would consider it—

"An easy leap
To pluck bright honour from the pale-faced moon."

But how did Lord Cardigan receive the order to attack? Did he receive it with alacrity? Far from it; he received it with grave consternation. He had the great moral courage to demur to that order, until he was perfectly assured that Lord Lucan was aware of the desperate nature of the attack ordered. Lord Cardigan sent his aide-de-camp to Lord Lucan to explain the nature of the ground, and to state that the place ordered to be attacked was three-quarters of a mile distant, that there were batteries on each flank, and that the hills on each side were covered with infantry. Lord Lucan still persevered in his order to charge, and then Lord Cardigan himself iterated to Lord Lucan the description just given. After that, Lord Cardigan made the charge, riding himself at the head of his dragoons, and it was not too much to say that when that gallant body marched down "the valley of death," there was not one man, from the general officer to the humblest farrier, but believed that he was about to charge upon eternity. He would tell the rest of the tragedy in Lord Cardigan's own words extracted from a speech delivered at the Mansion House on the 6th of February, and reported in The Times—

"We advanced down a gradual descent of more than three-quarters of a mile, with the batteries vomiting forth upon us shells and shot, round and grape, with one battery on our right flank and another on the left, and all the intermediate ground covered with the Russian riflemen; so that when we came to within a distance of fifty yards from the mouths of the artillery which had been hurling destruction upon us, we were, in fact, surrounded and encircled by a blaze of fire, in addition to the fire of the riflemen upon our flanks. As we ascended the hill the oblique fire of the artillery poured upon our rear, so that we had thus a strong fire upon our front, our flank, and our rear. We entered the battery—we went through the battery—the two leading regiments cutting down a great number of the Russian gunners in their onset. In the two regiments which I had the honour to lead, every officer, with one exception, was either killed or wounded, or had his horse shot under him or injured. Those regiments proceeded, followed by the second line, consisting of two more regiments of cavalry, which continued to perform the duty of cutting down the Russian gunners. Then came the third line, formed of another regiment, which endeavoured to complete the duty assigned to our brigade. I believe that this was achieved with great success, and the result was that this body, composed of only about 670 men, succeeded in passing through the mass of Russian cavalry of —as we have since learned—5,240 strong; and, having broken through that mass, they went, according to our technical military expression, 'threes about,' and retired in the same manner, doing as much execution in their course as they possibly could upon the enemy's cavalry. Upon our returning up the hill which we had descended in the attack, we had to run the same gauntlet and to incur the same risk from the flank fire of the Tirailleurs as we had encountered before. Numbers of our men were shot down—men and horses were killed, and many of the soldiers who had lost their horses were also shot down while endeavouring to escape. But what, my Lord, was the feeling and what the bearing of those brave men who returned to the position. Of each of these regiments there returned but a small detachment, two-thirds of the men engaged having been destroyed! I think that every man who was engaged in that disastrous affair at Balaklava, and who was fortunate enough to come out of it alive, must feel that it was only by a merciful decree of Almighty Providence that he escaped from the greatest apparent certainty of death which could possibly be conceived."

At a dinner at Northampton, on a subsequent occasion, the Earl of Cardigan said, his absence from the Crimea was accounted for by his having no longer any army there to command; and he then went on to say—

"In the attack at Balaklava, 400 horses were killed or rendered unserviceable; 370 were killed in action, and the remainder were in such a sad state from numerous wounds that they were obliged to be destroyed the following morning. But, in connection with that charge, I have to mention a much more serious circumstance—I mean the sad loss of human life that then occurred. No fewer than twenty-six officers and 276 non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, making total of 300, were killed and wounded in that action. It is for this reason that I never can allude to the subject without the deepest feelings of regret. At the same time, though I do not pretend to more sentimentality than other men, it seemed to me at the time, and still seems, that the loss was so certain and serious, and the advantage to be gained by the attack so slight, as to make it matter of deep regret that the order was given. I received the order, however, to attack, and although I should not have thought of making such an attack without orders, and although I differed in opinion as to the propriety of the order, I promptly obeyed it."

No language could be too strong or too laudatory to describe this gallant achievement on the part of the men. It was a glorious proof of the power of discipline, and a sublime example of their loyalty to their Queen and devotion to their country. Lord Cardigan, by his share in it, had won for himself the respect of the British army and the admiration of the world, and it was not too much to say that his name would go down to posterity enrolled in the page of history as a belted Earl of the nineteenth century, entitled by his chival-rous prowess to stand side by side with the Bedford, the Bohun, the Talbot, the Chandos, of the olden time. The terror, the admiration, and the enthusiasm of the bystanders when they saw the British sabres flashing among the Russian guns had been graphically described by an eye-witness, as well as the disgust felt by the army at those who ordered so Quixotic an enterprise. General Canrobert, speaking of the men, was reported to have said, "C'est superbe! C'est magnifique!" But, speaking of the generals who commanded the charge, whoever they might be, he added, "Mais ce n'est pas la guerre." The Russian commander too told the aide-de-camp who was sent in to the Russian lines to inquire after the prisoners who were taken, that the affair was a bêtise—a charge de fous. And, indeed, if it had been a Russian general who had ordered such a charge and risked his men's lives in that way, there was little doubt that he would have died under the knout, or would now have been digging in a Siberian mine. But had any notice yet been taken of Lord Lucan's conduct in this affair—had anybody demanded a court-martial? True, the noble Earl himself, indeed, had demanded a court-martial, and that he had acted gallantly in so doing he would not deny; for he was not now arraigning Lord Lucan's courage, or even his military knowledge, except with regard to this particular case. He did, however, arraign the conduct of the military authorities at the Horse Guards in appointing Lord Lucan, an untried man, over the heads of so many men of proved ability. It was plain that in this case untried aristocracy was preferred to proved middle-class merit. Lord Lucan's claims weighed heavier at the Horse Guards than the claims of such men as Henry Wyndham, Joseph Thackwell, Brotherton, Lovell—better known as Badoock—and Cavendish. He submitted to the House that he had now made out a case at least for inquiry. It was an insult to the service that such a transaction should take place without an inquiry. If Lord Lucan could justify himself, without doubt a court-martial was the proper tribunal before which to do so. He intreated the House, therefore, to concur in this Motion for an Address to the Crown for a court-martial, in justice to those martyrs who had found a bloody grave on the disastrous field of Balaklava, in justice to the survivors to guard against the possibility of the recurrence of such blunders, and in justice to the parents, the widows, and the orphans of those unfortunate men, whose tears for their fall were embittered by the reflection that, though they had died gloriously, they had died in vain.

LORD ELCHO said, that in seconding the Motion of the hon. Gentleman he did so from a deep conviction that it was due, not only to those gallant men who had distinguished themselves on that disastrous day, but also to Lord Lucan himself, that his conduct in this affair should be inquired into. No one, indeed, desired inquiry more earnestly than did Lord Lucan. Before, however, proceeding to advert to the facts of this case, he wished to say a few words with reference to his own position in connexion with it. It was a position alike painful and peculiar, for it must at all times be painful to have to defend a relative when his conduct was impugned, but it was doubly so when the accusation referred to an occasion on which he had the misfortune to lose a relative still nearer and dearer. He said this, not with a view of exciting the interest or sympathy of the House, but simply to show that whatever effect the events of that day were likely to have upon him, they were not calculated to prejudice him in favour of Lord Lucan. It was from a deep sense of justice that he supported this motion, for never in his life had he been so firmly convinced of anything as that Lord Lucan was a grossly wronged and injured man. Lord Lucan, as he had just stated, courted inquiry into his conduct, and his duty, as Lord Lucan's relative, was to endeavour to induce the House to grant that inquiry. He knew too well the value of the time of the House to occupy it with any luberations of his own on military tactics, which, as those of a civilian, could have little claim on their attention. He should not, therefore, follow the hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Berkeley) in fighting over again the battle of Balaklava, he would simply ask two questions which required an answer. The first was with regard to the order sent to Lord Lucan, which, it was said, he had misconceived; and on this he could not help remarking that, though they had heard much about what it did not mean, no one yet had attempted to say what it really did mean. These were the words of the order:—

"Lord Raglan wishes the Cavalry to advance rapidly to the Front, follow the Enemy, and try to prevent the Enemy carrying away the Guns."

Mr. H. Berkeley

The sense in which that order was understood by Lord Lucan and by the aide-de-camp was, that the cavalry were to advance rapidly to the front; but now it was said that the English language was not to mean what it did in the ordinary acceptation of words, and that therefore the order must be read in a non-natural sense. He therefore wanted to know, and hoped that some Member of the Government, or that Lord Raglan himself, at some future occasion, would explain what the real meaning of the order was. It should be observed that within a short time of their advance Captain Nolan had the misfortune to fall, which showed that they were already in a position from which the slightest advance brought them immediately under the fire of the enemy's guns. As Lord Lucan had been blamed for having obeyed that order in its ordinary acceptation, and for being guided by the explanation of the aide-de-camp, and was now in this country in disgrace in consequence, he begged to ask would Lord Lucan have been in a more favourable position, would he now be commanding the cavalry in the Crimea and an honoured man, if he had disobeyed that order? Those were the two questions with reference to that order to which he wished to direct attention; but as much had been said about Lord Lucan being afraid to take upon himself that responsibility which, as a lieutenant general commanding a division, he should have done, and as upon that point military opinions greatly differed, he begged to point out to the House that Lord Lucan was not a man who shirked or was afraid of responsibility. Lord Lucan had published his speech, delivered in another place, in the form of a pamphlet, to which he had appended notes. In one of those notes Lord Lucan said—

"Lord Lucan, in his speech, omitted to state that at an interview with General Estcourt, which he had asked for the purpose the day after the battle of the Alma, he sent a message to Lord Raglan through the Adjutant General, expressing a hope that his Lordship had that confidence in him, as commanding the cavalry, that he would allow him to act on his own responsibility as occasions should offer and render advisable: for, otherwise, opportunities of acting would be frequently lost to the cavalry. To this Lord Lucan received no reply. Lord Lucan was led to make that communication in consequence of his having on the previous day taken upon himself without orders to remove the artillery and cavalry across the river, with the view of protecting the flank of the infantry in its ascent of the heights. This movement, though accidentally delayed by the upsetting of a gun in the river, proved most advantageous in its results, as it brought the cavalry to the front immediately after the Highlanders had crowned the heights, gave them the assistance of his guns, which were most effective, and protected them from a large body of the enemy's cavalry which was hovering in that quarter. And again Lord Lucan considered that had he felt himself more of a free agent on that occasion, more prisoners might have been taken."

He thought that that passage clearly proved that Lord Lucan was not a man to shrink from responsibility, and that he had asked Lord Raglan to intrust him with responsibility because he felt that without it, and a certain amount of discretionary power, he could not make that use of the cavalry arm which he might otherwise do. This was further confirmed by a passage in a previous note, referring to a conversation which had taken place between Lord Lucan and General Airey the day after the battle of the Alma. The note was in the following terms :—

"At this conversation Lord Lucan expressed his hope that orders less peremptory, and leaving him some discretion, should be sent to him; for if orders were sent to him more fitting for a subaltern officer than for a general to receive, as a subaltern he would execute them, as he would not expose himself, in the absence of a discretion which had been denied him, to being charged with disobeying an order."

He (Lord Elcho) would here corroborate what Lord Lucan stated with regard to his conduct at the battle of the Alma by reference to a letter which had been written soon after that battle by his late brother, in which the writer stated that Lord Lucan, at a certain period of the action, ordered up the cavalry and the artillery, and that they proved so effective and of such signal service to the Highlanders, who at that time had just crossed the heights, that Sir Colin Campbell went up to Lord Lucan, shook him by both hands, and with tears in his eyes thanked him for what he had done. He should not say anything further respecting the battle of the Alma; but, as he had said that he should not enter into any discussion of the battle of Balaklava, or weary the House with any military lucubrations, so neither did he intend to discuss the prerogative of the Crown or the right of the Government to recall Lord Lucan. That right undoubtedly existed, and it was necessary for the efficiency of the army that it should be exercised by the Crown without being questioned. He might doubt, however, whether in the case of Lord Lucan the recall had been, either just or necessary. The reasons which had been given for it were, that he had written a letter to, and was on bad terms with, Lord Raglan. Every one had been led to believe that the letter of Lord Lucan had been couched in disrespectful terms. When it came to be read, however, he thought that that was not the impression which was conveyed to the people of this country; and he knew from a statement made by Lord Lucan in another place, that previous to his embarking on his return home, General Estcourt said that Lord Raglan was astonished at his recall, that he regretted it, and was unable to understand why it had taken place. There was one point, however, with reference to the recall of Lord Lucan to which he wished to direct attention. As he had before said, he did not dispute the right of the Government to exercise their power of recalling him; but if they considered it so essential for the good of the service that two officers who were on such bad terms should not remain together, how was it that so long a period had been allowed to elapse between the receipt of Lord Raglan's letter and the date of the recall of Lord Lucan? Lord Raglan's letter was written on the 16th of December; Lord Hardinge's reply to the reference made to him respecting it was dated the 26th of January, and the date of the recall was not till the 27th of February, so that upwards of three weeks must have elapsed between the receipt of Lord Raglan's letter and the recall of Lord Lucan. He asked this question, because he had heard it stated by others that the delay might have arisen from the fact of there having been a question as to who should be recalled at that time. There was, moreover, a strange coincidence of dates between the recall of Lord Lucan and the notice of a question put upon the papers by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol with reference to the battle of Balaklava. No doubt, a clear explanation of these matters could be given by the Government, but as he had heard them mooted in society, he had thought it desirable to call attention to them. The point to which he wished mainly to confine his remarks was the letter of Lord Raglan, which brought against Lord Lucan charges of the gravest character. It appeared to him that the production of that letter on the part of the Government was, if he might be allowed to say so, a grave mistake. It entirely changed their position. So long as they kept it in the office of the Minister of War they could take their stand upon the right of the Government to recall any officer without assigning their reasons for the step; but when they produced that letter they shifted their ground, and it appeared to him that they must either stand by the one course or take the consequences which naturally flowed from the other. In a communication which Lord Lucan addressed to the Commander in Chief, praying him to reconsider his application for a court-martial, he thus described that letter of Lord Raglan's:—

" It contains entirely new matter, and is replete with new charges, reflecting more seriously than before on my professional judgment and character. There is now imputed to me, and for the first time, not only the misconception of one order, but inattention to and neglect of another order; and, again, a total incapacity to carry out any instructions, and to avail myself of the means placed by his Lordship at my disposal. Charges so grave and of a character so exclusively professional cannot, I submit, be properly disposed of without a military investigation. I find myself therefore compelled to express my anxious wish that the Commander in Chief will be induced kindly to reconsider his decision, and consent to my whole conduct on the day of the action of Balaklava, the 25th of October, 1854, being investigated by a court-martial."

He thought that any military man would admit that what Lord Lucan said upon that point was justified by the fact, and that the charges which had been brought against him were of a very grave professional character, and required a professional investigation. That second appeal of Lord Lucan's, however, was also refused, and it was not until all other modes of redress had been denied him that he had ventured to make that statement in another place which was now in the possession of most hon. Members. He (Lord Elcho) wished to examine, as well as he was able, the grounds upon which the appeal of Lord Lucan for a court-martial had been refused. In the letter containing the refusal no grounds were assigned; and he must therefore look to the speeches which had been made upon the subject in another place by the noble Lord at the head of the War Department and by the Commander in Chief. So far as he could gather from those speeches, there appeared to be four principal grounds upon which the refusal had been based. First, it was said that there was no precedent for a court-martial appointed under similar circumstances; secondly, it was urged that if a court-martial were granted to Lord Lucan, it must be granted to every officer and every private who thought himself aggrieved; thirdly, that there would be a difficulty in framing the charges; and, fourthly, that Lord Lucan had done duty since the action at Balaklava, where he had been at fault, and that therefore by military law he could not be tried. He would next proceed to examine these four reasons which had been adduced against granting a court-martial, and he would first touch upon the question of precedent. He had himself a great respect for precedent, but at the same time all precedents must have a beginning, and in a case where justice demanded a fair trial, he did not think that the absence of precedent was a sufficient cause why that trial should not be granted. At the same time, however, he thought that a precedent did exist in the case of Lord George Sackville, afterwards Lord George Germaine, the commander of the English cavalry at the battle of Minden in 1759. He had looked with great care into all the circumstances of that case, and it appeared to him to be in its main features analogous to that of the Earl of Lucan, although, indeed, there was the difference that Lord George Sackville was condemned for not obeying his orders, whereas the Earl of Lucan had been censured for his implicit obedience to them. He did not think it would be necessary for him, and, indeed, it would be presumptuous on his part, to enter into the detail of the battle of Minden; but, perhaps, the House would allow him to read an extract from the general order issued by Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, the Commander in Chief of the allied army, in order to show the grounds upon which Lord George Sackville demanded a court-martial to inquire into his conduct. In his general order, issued the day after the battle of Minden, which was fought on the 1st of August, 1759, Prince Ferdinand wrote:—

" His Royal Highness further orders it to be declared to Lieutenant General the Marquess of Granby that he is persuaded that if he had had the good fortune to have him at the head of the cavalry of the right wing his presence would have greatly contributed to make the decision of that day more complete and more brilliant. In short, his Serene Highness orders that those of his suite whose behaviour he most admires be named (Lord George Sackville, not included in the list), and his Royal Highness desires and orders the generals of the army that upon all occasions when orders are brought to them by his aides-de-camp they be obeyed punctually and without delay."

It was that insinuation against him which led Lord George Sackville to request that he might be allowed to return to England, and, leave being given to him, he arrived home on the 7th of August, and immediately wrote a letter to the military authorities praying for a military inquiry into his conduct. On the 10th of August he received an answer granting him an inquiry, but in the meantime he was deprived of his military emoluments and his military position. In that answer he was informed—and the point was well worthy of the consideration of his noble Friend at the head of the Government—that the inquiry would be held whenever the officers on service returned to England. The court-martial was subsequently held, and its verdict condemned Lord George Sackville as being guilty of disobedience of orders. He could not but think that the position of an English general was somewhat unfortunate, for there was a precedent for granting a court-martial in the case of Lord Lucan, and that precedent was a court-martial which condemned Lord George Sackville for not doing that which Lord Lucan was condemned for doing. In the case of Lord George Sackville, two orders having been given him by two aides-de-camp which appeared to him to be of an opposite character, he rode up to Prince Ferdinand to have his difficulty cleared away; for that he was condemned, and yet they were told that it was the very course which ought to have been adopted by Lord Lucan, or that he should, if he had any doubt about the order, have sent some one to the Commander in Chief for an explanation. In that respect he considered, as he had just said, the position of a British general unfortunate. Wishing to find out as much as he could that would bear upon the case, he had spent some time in referring to books and pamphlets in the British Museum, and he found among other things, that amongst the officers by whom Lord George Sackville was tried was one William Earl of Panmure. He hoped this might be regarded as a favourable omen, and that we should soon have a warrant signed "Fox, Baron Panmure," ordering a court-martial upon Lord Lucan. He found also a letter of consolation addressed to Lord George Sackville by the Maréchal de Contade, the French Commander at the battle of Minden, and transmitted by Voltaire, in which that general alluded to the shooting of Byng and Lord George Sackville's condemnation, and said that the conduct of the English with respect to their admirals and generals bore a strong resemblance to that of the Carthaginians, who, whenever they lost a battle or a place of strength, crucified a general. Bayle said that there were no class of men who had more need than the generals of the army to cultivate those qualities which would be useful in a life of retirement. With reference to the bearing of military law upon this point, he found that Mr. Arthur laid down the principle—

" An officer who may be suspended, and feels his character unjustly impeached, may demand an investigation of his conduct by court-martial, which, if not attended with manifest injury to the service, ought to be granted, that an opportunity of justification may be afforded. Lord George Sackville, having been suspended and divested of all military employ, and finding his character to be impeached in the public opinion, demanded an inquiry into his conduct, which the King, from motives of justice and humanity, and regard to the reputation of an officer of such high rank, readily granted. Captain Norris, of the Essex, even after having resigned the command of his ship in the Mediterranean, finding his character had been aspersed by his officers in the engagement off Toulon, applied to the Admiralty Board for a public investigation of his conduct, and a court-martial for that purpose was accordingly ordered."

And, in the case of Sir Hugh Palliser, Mr. Fox said, a court-martial might be appointed to try him at his own request, as had been done in the case of Lord George Sackville—even though dismissed the service. He would next pass to the second argument, which, as he understood it, was, that if a court-martial were granted in the case of Lord Lucan it would be necessary to grant one in the case of every private or inferior officer who might demand it; but he thought that he should be able to show that no analogy existed between those cases. What were the grounds upon which Lord Lucan was condemned? He was condemned because it was said, that, as a lieutenant general, he was a responsible person possessing a discretionary power, and that he did not exercise it, but simply obeyed orders, a thing which any private or inferior officer ought to have done, and which Lord Cardigan also did. What was the real state of the case? Lord Lucan, upon receiving the order, did not understand it—and, certainly, it was not very intelligible—and he ventured to ask the aide-de-camp its meaning. The aide-de-camp explained the meaning of the order, and Lord Lucan obeyed it. The order was given to Lord Cardigan, who objected to it, and remonstrated against the madness of executing such a charge; but he obeyed the order, and in so doing did his duty in a manner which no man admired more than he did. Two men acted in pro-

cisely the same manner, and yet one was received with praise and honour while the other was more or less censured and professionally disgraced. If responsibility were conferred upon an officer, and he was called upon to exercise a discretionary power, more favour ought to be conceded to him than to an inferior officer who held no such position. The third argument adduced against granting the court-martial was, that there would be great difficulty in framing the charges. To that argument he could reply that, in the case of Lord George Sackville, Prince Ferdinand in his general order did not mention his name, but it was on account of an insinuation that he demanded a court-martial. The Judge Advocate of that day found no difficulty in framing charges and drawing up a bill of indictment against Lord George Sackville, upon which he was condemned, declared unfit to hold a command, and dismissed the service, and he (Lord Elcho) had too much respect for the abilities of the right hon. Gentleman who at present filled the office of Judge Advocate not to believe that, from the letter of Lord Raglan, containing charges against Lord Lucan—charges of so grave a nature—he could easily frame charges and draw up a bill of indictment. The fourth and last point with which he had to deal, was the argument that Lord Lucan had done duty with the army after the battle of Balaklava, and that, by military law, he could not therefore be put upon his trial. He did not mean to question the military law. He granted, that if an officer had committed a fault for which he was put under arrest, and was subsequently released from arrest and did duty, that he was thereby condoned for his offence, and could not be put upon trial for the same offence. But it was a question whether he might not be put upon his trial by a superior officer to him who put him under arrest, and who subsequently released him. At all events, here was a law really enacted for the benefit of the accused; and surely the House did not mean that that very law should be used to the disadvantage of the accused, which would be the case in the instance of Lord Lucan, should the present Motion be rejected. He might of course quote many cases in illustration of the principle, that if a soldier, after arrest, was discharged and allowed to resume duty, he could not be subsequently tried for the offence for which he was arrested. An instance had been given that during the Peninsular war a private soldier was put under arrest, and subsequently allowed his freedom, and served with great gallantry before the enemy; that after the battle he was again arrested and brought before a court-martial, found guilty, and flogged. Unquestionably nothing could be more unjust than such a proceeding, and as there was no doubt that the military law was enacted for the benefit of the accused, the soldier in that instance would naturally have claimed its protection; but in the case of Lord Lucan it was decidedly adverse to his interest. It appeared to him that if Lord Raglan, when he wrote his letter, believed the charges he made, he was to blame for leaving a general officer who had proved himself, according to that letter, so incompetent as Lord Lucan had done, to remain one hour after showing his incompetency in command. The whole safety of our army in the field depended upon the cavalry, and the efficiency of the cavalry depended upon its commander. But what did Lord Raglan do? He left Lord Lucan two months in command without putting him under arrest or sending him home, one or the other of which he submitted Lord Raglan ought to have done if the charges against Lord Lucan were well founded. A great deal was heard about this not being a fitting subject to bring under the consideration of Parliament, and Lord Lucan had been blamed for having brought his case forward in another place. No doubt the House would be told by the right hon. Gentleman the Judge Advocate, or by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War, that nothing could be more dangerous than to establish a precedent for bringing the subject of military discipline under discussion in the House of Commons. He confessed he did not feel at all alarmed at any such thing. The Queen had, undoubtedly, the prerogative of commanding the army, but that prerogative was at all times subject to certain checks and control. The House of Commons reserved to itself the power of passing the Mutiny Bill from year to year, and it had also the power of stopping the supplies, by which it necessarily exercised a very powerful control over the whole army, and also over the management of it. According to a high authority on military law—Simmons on Courts-martial—

"It was quite evident that courts-martial were as strictly derived from and formed part and parcel of the law of England, as any Courts depending on Statute could be. It had been aptly observed by Mr. Tytler, 'The Mutiny Act was, by the very limited term of its duration and frequency of its renewal, more truly and immediately framed by the people itself than any other of the existing Statutes of the Realm.'"

This power of control and check was a power of which the House was jealous, and justly jealous; and it was a power which had been frequently exercised. He had taken at random, from Hansard, instances of Motions being brought forward materially affecting the discipline of the army, and such Motions had been followed by the most beneficial results. In 1745 an Address was moved and carried for a court-martial on Admirals Matthews and Lestock, to inquire into their conduct in the action off Toulon between His Majesty's fleet and the combined fleets of France and Spain. In that debate Mr. Henry Fox used these words:—

"As we in this House are the great inquisitors of the nation, this, Sir, was the reason—and it is a sufficient reason—for an inquiry into the case, and the end we proposed to ourselves by such an inquiry was, to vindicate the innocent and to punish the guilty."

Mr. H. Pelham, who opposed the Motion on the part of the Government, said—

"When there appeared to be a failure or want of justice on the part of the Crown, we may inquire into the conduct of any officer, or into the proceedings of any court-martial."

Now, he contended that in the case of Lord Lucan, there was not a failure of justice on the part of the Crown, but a failure of justice on the part of the commander of the forces. To return to previous subjects of a similar nature, in the same year (1745) Parliament voted the proceedings of the court-martial appointed to try Captain Norris (to whom he had already referred), to be "arbitrary, partial, and illegal," and this, too, in the teeth of the opposition of the Minister of the day, Mr. Pelham. In 1778, Mr. Luttrell moved for a court-martial to inquire into the conduct of Vice-Admiral Sir Hugh Palliser for disobedience of orders, and Mr. Fox afterwards moved that he be dismissed the service. In 1814, Colonel Palmer moved for papers relating to the trial of Colonel Quentin. In 1815, Lord Proby moved the introduction of a clause into the Mutiny Act, to prevent the dismissal of an officer without the previous inquiry of a court-martial. In 1832, Mr. Hume moved for the production of papers relating to the trial and punishment of Alexander Somerville for writing a letter to a newspaper—a well-known case. But more recently the noble Lord the Member for Huddersfield (Viscount Goderich) had made a Motion—for which he received very considerable support—that materially affected the discipline of the army, and in which he endeavoured to show that great injustice was done to the private men by their not being promoted. But he had a case to quote which he thought his noble Friend at the head of the Government would not refuse to recognise as of weighty authority. In 1836 a Motion was made for a Committee to inquire into the conduct of the commander of the forces with reference to a recent appointment, and he found that the name attached to that Motion was that of his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works (Sir W. Molesworth). The reason which led his right hon. Friend to bring forward the Motion was, that he thought the appointment calculated to be injurious to the service and generally to the army, and he boldly and ably, in one of those carefully prepared and elaborate speeches which he was wont to deliver, laid down the law with reference to the responsibility of Ministers in regard to the administration of the army. He on that occasion said—and his speech was almost prophetic—

"I consider that one of His Majesty's Ministers ought to be at the head of the army—ought to be held responsible to this House for the administration of the army, and be present by himself or delegate in his place in the House of Commons to answer to the questions and complaints of the people with reference to his conduct in the administration of military affairs."—[See 3 Hansard, xxxiiij. 535.]

Nothing could be more sound doctrine, and a doctrine which he was happy to say had been acted upon. If the hon. Gentleman who brought forward this Motion should be met with the objection that it infringed upon the Royal prerogative, he (Lord Elcho) had forearmed himself with a passage from the speech of his right hon. Friend in reference to that point, for his right hon. Friend observed that—

"Whenever we hear the word prerogative made use of in this House, we may feel convinced that some abuse is about to be defended—some attempt is about to be made to escape inquiry—to shrink from responsibility."—[See 3 Hansard, xxxiiij. 533.]

He hoped, therefore, that that argument would not be adopted on this occasion, but that the present would be considered an open question, in which case he felt secure of the support of his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works. But he was prepared to maintain that the interference of Parliament had not only been innoxious, but that in many cases it had been highly beneficial. Take the case of flogging. Would any Gentleman say that that did not affect the army? He found that Sir George Murray, in his reply to a Motion by Mr. Hunt in 1832 on the subject of flogging in the army, said—

"He was afraid, if that House became a court of revision for military offences, it would infringe on the great principle of the constitution by which the army was placed under the exclusive control of the Crown."

Was the House controlled by that argument and prevented from interfering with the subject? Not at all. The House did interfere, and the result, as they all knew, was most beneficial. It was notorious that flogging in the army had comparatively ceased; and if they wanted to know whether it had been attended with beneficial results or not he would point to the Crimea, where they had an army without crime, and where officers and men vied with each other, not more to maintain the reputation of the British army for valour than for high moral discipline. He thanked the House most sincerely for its indulgence, while he had endeavoured to show, to the best of his ability, that this was not a question of prerogative, or a question to which the objection would apply, that it would affect the discipline of the army. Whether he had succeeded or not, the case of Lord Lucan was so strong and so good that it could not suffer from the feebleness of the advocate. As he had said, Lord Lucan courted inquiry, thinking his professional reputation damaged by the charges brought against him. He knew that it had been stated in another place by the organ of the Government, the Minister of War, and, that evening, by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Berkeley), that Lord Lucan's personal character and honour were unimpeached; but what consolation was that to a man whom the Government had disgraced? He could not believe that discipline required the perpetration of injustice, or that the public interests were served by disgracing as gallant, as zealous, and, he would venture to say, as efficient a soldier as any in Her Majesty's service. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Berkeley) stated that he brought forward this motion as a question of justice to Lord Lucan, as well as to those gallant men whose conduct that House and the whole country admired. The hon. Member said Lord Lucan's honour was unimpeached, but he added that if the general who commanded on that occasion had been a Russian subject, he would have died under the knout, or have been exiled to Siberia. Lord Lucan had the good fortune to belong to a free country, in which such extreme measures were not resorted to. The knout under which he suffered was the censure of the hon. Gentleman. The Siberia to which he was banished was the professional disgrace by which he was incapacitated, as long as these charges were not met and refuted, from again holding command in Her Majesty's service. He had said Lord Lucan was as gallant an officer as any in that service. He was present when his Lordship was examined before a Committee of that House, and after his examination a statement was made to him (Lord Echo) by a member of the Committee, whose name he had no authority to mention, but whose name, if he could give it, would add to the effect which he hoped his opinion would have upon the House and upon the Government: that hon. Gentleman, a friend of his, and a member of the Committee, said to him, "Lord Lucan has proved himself, by his evidence, to be an able and a zealous officer, careful of his horses and of his men, and a thorough master of every detail connected with the management of his division." His reply was, "Do you think that a general officer, who has shown himself thus competent in the camp is wholly incompetent in the field?" There was an innate love of justice in the breasts of Englishmen. Lord Lucan had appealed to the proper authorities for redress, and had failed to obtain it. Lord Lucan had made a statement in the House of Lords, and, now that the hon. Gentleman, though not at his request, had brought the subject under the consideration of the House of Commons, he appealed to them on behalf of his gallant and noble relative, confidently trusting that the House of Commons would do him that justice which had been denied elsewhere, and by the expression of its opinion induce the noble Lord at the head of the Government to recommend Her Majesty, in the exercise of her undoubted and unquestionable prerogative, to grant that professional inquiry which could alone vindicate his conduct, and relieve him from the disgrace under which he now more or less laboured.

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to order that an inquiry by Court-martial be held on Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan, for ordering a charge of the Light Cavalry at the Battle of Balaklava."

MR. C. VILLIERS said, the question before the House was, whether upon a certain statement of facts they would agree to an address to the Crown praying that an inquiry by court-martial should be instituted into the conduct of the Earl of Lucan; and as it was his duty, from the office which he had the honour of holding, to be acquainted with the principles and practice which regulated the military tribunals of the country, it might be convenient if he thus early addressed the House on the subject. He should not dispute with the noble Lord about the right of Parliament to interfere in matters affecting the army, though he thought some of his noble Friend's views were somewhat extreme on that matter. He should confine himself to the question of the particular claim for interference put forth in this case. In the first place, he must observe that his hon. Friend (Mr. H. Berkeley) had brought this Motion forward, not so much as an original proposition for inquiry, as an appeal from a decision which had been already given by the Crown, by the Commander in Chief, by the other House of Parliament, and by the legal officers who had been consulted. He would not question the propriety of his hon. Friend in adopting this course, but he would merely observe that the hon. Gentleman, instead of proposing any other mode of inquiry, asked for a court-martial upon the Earl of Lucan, with the perfect knowledge that it was the precise form of inquiry already demanded by Lord Lucan himself, decided upon by the authorities to which he had referred, and for the refusal of which reasons had been assigned. Holding the peculiar office which he did, the facts of this case, as is usual in cases where a general court-martial was contemplated, had been communicated to him for the purpose of advising whether it was one in which a court-martial should be appointed. He had viewed it without reference to the station of the person, or some of the peculiarities attending it, and he was quite ready to share all the responsibility which attached to the course which had been pursued. He thought, now, that he should best consult the wishes of the House if—without referring to topics somewhat irrelevant that had been alluded to by the seconder and mover—he called their attention to the particular facts which had been submitted to him, and the reasons which were assigned for refusing the particular tribunal which was demanded. What were the facts of this case? Lord Lucan, on the 28th of November, became aware of the terms in which Lord Raglan had referred to his conduct on the 25th of October, and thereupon entered into communication with Lord Raglan on the subject, expressing his displeasure at the mode in which his conduct had been reported by Lord Raglan. Lord Lucan complained, not only of injustice done him, but also questioned the veracity of Lord Raglan's communication to the Minister of War. Thereupon a series of communications ensued between Lord Lucan and Lord Raglan, the purport of which on the part of Lord Raglan was, that Lord Lucan should withdraw a certain letter of comment on his report which he (Lord Lucan) had sent him, and should remain satisfied with the report already sent to this country. Lord Lucan was unwilling to do this, and pertinaciously adhered to his own explanation of the events of the 25th of October at Balaklava, and left Lord Raglan no peace until he sent his communication, or rather his criticism upon his (Lord Raglan's) despatch, to this country. At the same time Lord Raglan felt himself bound, in vindication of his original despatch, to send his observations upon that letter, entering more fully into his reasons for having expressed some kind of disapprobation of Lord Lucan's conduct at Balaklava, while he so far modified that expression of disapprobation as not to cast any slur upon Lord Lucan's professional character, or preclude him from receiving the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. It was upon receipt of these communications that the Minister of War discovered that there were essential differences between the lieutenant general of cavalry and the commander of the forces in the East; and upon that ground, and that ground alone, fortified by the opinion of the Commander in Chief in this country, considering that these differences were detrimental to the public service, and that harmony was essential between officers of that rank, the recall of the lieutenant general of cavalry was decided upon. He (Mr. Villiers) stated these facts for the purpose of showing the grounds on which it was decided that Lord Lucan was not in a position to claim court-martial; and why it was not consistent with military usage to grant one. The House was aware, in the first place, that Lord Lucan, upon his return to this country, had claimed, as the unquestionable privilege of every officer, to have a court-martial if he chose to demand one; and subsequently, upon being apprised of Lord Raglan's comments on his letter that he had asked as a favour, to have this court-martial, and had learnt that his Lordship's request was refused in both cases. He would now apply himself to these facts in order to show on what ground of military law and practice Lord Lucan had been refused that inquiry by court-martial for which his hon. Friend (Mr. H. Berkeley) asked. In the first place, he thought the noble Earl, when he applied to have a court-martial as an unquestionable right, must have done so either in haste or under very erroneous advice, because every one might ascertain by searching the most elementary works upon the military system of this country, that an officer had no right whatever to a court-martial as a means of inquiry into his conduct. Persons who entered the army did so on the well-understood condition that they might be dismissed without any reason assigned, and without any redress given, at the discretion of the Crown. This power in the Crown was so ancient and had been so generally recognised that it was useless to discuss it. In the House of Commons the question had been raised whether such powers should be intrusted to the Crown, and there had been attempts to limit the prerogative in this respect, but Parliament had uniformly decided that the Crown was wisely intrusted with this prerogative. It was not, therefore, difficult to answer the question as to whether an officer possessed an unquestionable right to a court-martial. Then arose the question whether in this particular case it was proper to grant such an inquiry as a favour. [Lord ELCHO : Hear.] His noble Friend seemed satisfied to rest upon that. Well, but then arose the question whether a court-martial could be conceded upon the facts as they stood—namely, that either no military offence had been imputed to the Earl of Lucan by the Commander in Chief, or that if any such offence had been so imputed to him, it had been overlooked or forgiven by the same authority. For it must be remembered that Lord Lucan had been deliberately continued in his employment after the alleged offence had been committed. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) treated that fact rather lightly, looking upon this "condonation" as he called it, as one for the benefit of the offender, or, as in this case, the complainant, and as a matter which could no longer stand in the way when the complainant chose to demand an inquiry. Now, military laws and usages could not be dispensed with so lightly, nor was it fit that the administration of the army should be regulated by caprice, and no people were more interested in its not being so than the service itself. There was in the military, as in the civil system of judicature, a written and an unwritten law—the one based upon the Mutiny Act, and the Articles of War, and the other upon custom and established usage, recognized and applied in numberless cases. Both these branches of Military Law were recognised by the Legislature; and every member of a court-martial was required by the Mutiny Act to take an oath that he would administer justice according to the Mutiny Act, the Articles of War, and the custom of war in the like cases. The particular custom of war which had reference to the present case was this, that when any offence had been committed, whether by an officer or by a soldier, and that offence had been advisedly overlooked or not punished or forgiven, and the person implicated was continued in his employment, this was held a good plea and was deemed a bar to any further proceedings. There was no end to the cases which might be referred to in proof of this position. There was the case during the Peninsular war of Captain Archdall, who ordered certain of his men on service in the field after they had been sentenced by a court-martial and before the sentence was carried into execution, and who proposed to execute that sentence after their return from service. For this he was put upon his trial by the Duke of Wellington, was convicted and broken. Again in 1811, there was a case of a very striking kind and of just the same character, and now reported in the books, in which, though a man had been guilty of mutinous language, yet having afterwards been engaged in active service, the

Duke of Wellington felt himself for that reason under the necessity of ordering him to be released. Then there was the case of Colonel Quentin, regarding whom a court-martial found the facts to be true as alleged in one of the charges preferred against him, but they found also that upon these facts he had been reprobated in the field by his commanding officer; they therefore refused to convict, upon this charge, because Colonel Quentin had been dealt with before for this offence, and they rebuked the prosecutors for introducing such matter into the charges. He (Mr. Villiers) repeated that it was an established usage in the army that no man whose offence had been knowingly and advisedly overlooked by competent authority, could be tried afterwards for that offence, and in the present case, the question would arise, as to who was to act as prosecutor, for Lord Raglan having condoned the offence, and Lord Lucan having been continued in employment, the offence was obliterated, and nobody could act as prosecutor. Not only, then, did the legal difficulty he had pointed out exist, but there were technical difficulties in the way of any proceedings. There was nobody to prefer any charge. In former times the Judge Advocate was officially the prosecutor, and the warrant for the prosecution was directed to him: but it is now nearly thirty years since a different provision was introduced into the Articles of War, and since that time it has been considered to be the province of the Judge Advocate General to watch the proceedings of the court-martial, to see that justice was done to the prisoner, and that the case was presented in a proper legal form on the part of the prosecution. Even if the Judge Advocate could, therefore, be directed to prefer charges, he was bound, in the first place, to give his opinion that there was a legal difficulty in the way of their prosecution, and in his capacity as responsible legal adviser of the Crown, it would be his duty to call the attention of the Sovereign to the legal objections that appeared to exist in the way of the confirmation of the proceedings. It was a common maxim in the civil courts that a man could not be tried twice for the same offence, and in this case a plea analogous to that of autrefois acquit would have applied. A man could not be allowed to compromise a criminal proceeding, or claim one against himself for a purpose of his own, nor would it be consistent with the duty of a judge to allow a second trial after an acquittal, merely on the request of the party accused. It was the duty of the Judge Advocate to see that the law was applied strictly. Still it was said that justice required that Lord Lucan should be tried by court-martial; but if such an inquiry were granted, when must it take place, and where? It certainly could not take place here. The commander of the forces could not be recalled in order to give evidence, because his presence could not be dispensed with in the Crimea, yet his evidence here would be indispensable, and it would be impossible to secure the attendance of witnesses who would be essential to the inquiry. Then, could the inquiry take place in the Crimea? It certainly would be most inconvenient at present. Men high in command could hardly be called upon to vindicate their conduct when they had important duties to discharge requiring their whole attention. Consequently, an inquiry could only take place when the war was over, and when many of the persons who ought to be examined would not be forthcoming. Had he been Lord Lucan, at the time the conduct of the noble Lord was first noticed by Lord Raglan—and it was right to remember that on the very night of the action there was a difference between Lord Lucan and Lord Raglan on the subject—he should have said when he was first charged with having misapprehended the order, “Let there be an inquiry at once. Let me have a court-martial now, when the witnesses to my conduct are still living, and upon the spot where the action occurred.” It was open for Lord Lucan to have followed that course, and the noble Lord had already declared that every officer of rank there was in his favour. It was said, however, that Lord Lucan was recalled indirectly on account of his conduct on the 25th of October, and that, having been deprived of his command, it was an injustice not to grant him an inquiry. It must, however, be remembered that Lord Raglan had never demanded the recall of Lord Lucan. On the contrary, Lord Raglan had throughout shown great consideration to Lord Lucan, if he believed him to be wrong. It was the opinion entertained at home that the differences between Lord Raglan and Lord Lucan, which appeared upon the face of the letters referred to the Minister of War, ought not to be allowed to continue. He understood from the noble Lord who had just addressed the House that Lord Lucan admitted that there had been a difference between Lord Raglan and himself—[Lord ELCHO : I admit it.]—and that Lord Lucan had not been recalled at the request of Lord Raglan. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Berkeley) and the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) seemed to take up this question upon very different grounds. His hon. Friend the Member for Bristol came forward on behalf of the public, as he said, to demand a court-martial, and his noble Friend very naturally came forward on behalf of his relative. The question, however, was the same, namely, whether, or not, Lord Raglan had exercised his discretion wisely, and whether he was justified in his report of Lord Lucan, with reference to the celebrated charge at Balaklava. [Mr. BERKELEY here made an observation, which was inaudible in the gallery.] Yes; but that is the hon. Gentleman setting up his judgment here against that of Lord Raglan in the field. Lord Raglan did not complain of Lord Lucan in the manner in which the hon. Gentleman did. The hon. Gentleman, from his great military experience, he supposed, took a view of Lord Lucan's conduct upon this occasion widely different from that taken by Lord Raglan. Lord Raglan ventures to say, that Lord Lucan is a meritorious officer. No man could have acted more bravely on the 25th of October; but in this particular instance he misconceived my orders." The hon. Gentleman, on the contrary, said, "This man has been shown to be so unworthy and so faulty as a general"—[Mr. BERKELEY : No, no!] Not faulty as a general, then; but only, to have given such an order as to have produced one of the greatest disasters that have yet occurred; not faulty—only, by want of capacity, he has caused the destruction of his troops! The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) complained of an injustice done to Lord Lucan by Lord Raglan, and thus, in fact, both agreed in bringing Lord Raglan's conduct before the House, and thus proposed that they should here sit in judgment upon the manner in which the Commander of the Forces exercised his discretion in the field. Why, what was the question at issue? It was whether the Commander in Chief was to have the discretion of censuring, blaming, or, at least, of reprobating those over whom he was placed, and whose conduct he was required to observe. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) asserted, if he (Mr. Villiers) understood him correctly, that it was not true that Lord Lucan had misconceived the orders given to him, and that if Lord Lucan was guilty of the conduct imputed to him on the 25th of October, he ought to have been broken or deprived of his command, and at any rate the offence ought not to have been condoned. In the opinion of the hon. Member for Bristol, Lord Lucan had acted so badly, that he ought not to have been continued for a moment in his command. The House was therefore called upon to condemn Lord Raglan, and, at the same time, to address the Queen, to remind her that she had neglected her duty in not having already instituted an inquiry into Lord Lucan's conduct. The hon. Gentleman, as Member for Bristol and a Member of Parliament, considering that the Queen had not been rightly advised, appealed from her decision already given in this matter, and demanded inquiry. The hon. Gentleman complained of the manner in which the Crown had acted. [Mr. BERKELEY : No, no.] He complained, then, of the manner in which the Crown had been advised to act, and raises a question as to the discretion with which the commander of the forces ought to be entrusted. If the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) was right in complaining of Lord Raglan's censure of Lord Lucan, other persons would be equally justified in complaining that sufficient praise had not been bestowed upon other officers who had been noticed in the despatches of the Commander in Chief. If such complaints were received, the conduct of Lord Raglan must of necessity be called in question. But, surely, it was requisite, that the Commander of the forces in the field should be invested with large discretionary powers, and among others with that of censuring those who were wrong, of praising those whose conduct deserved admiration, and even of visiting a certain amount of punishment upon those whose conduct he disapproved. Of course his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) would say—"That this was monstrous, for thus a man might have reflections cast upon his character and conduct, and have no redress." That, however, was not precisely the case, though, if it was so, it would not apply only to his relative, but possibly, to those acting under him and reproved by him. But the discretionary power entrusted to a Commander in Chief in the field, like the discretionary power entrusted to a justice of the peace, was not unlimited; nor was the person entrusted with such power absolutely irresponsible. If Lord Raglan had wantonly abused his power, or had exercised it corruptly or maliciously, the Earl of Lucan was not without a remedy : it was competent to him to prefer charges against Lord Raglan, with a view to having his conduct investigated before a court-martial. There were plenty of cases in which subordinate officers had preferred charges against their superiors, in some of which they had succeeded and in others failed. Nobody can doubt that as the case now came before them, it was one between Lord Raglan and Lord Lucan — unless Lord Raglan had not the usual powers of Commanders. Lord Lucan complained that he had been aggrieved by Lord Raglan, and it was open for the noble Lord to prove that Lord Raglan had gone beyond the limits of the power and discretion confided to him, and that he had been actuated by unworthy or malicious motives. The papers in reference to the case were already before the House, and hon. Members were perfectly able to judge under what impression Lord Raglan conveyed his opinion at first, with regard to Lord Lucan. Lord Lucan had, however, been noticed for his gallantry in the field, and had already received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. When Lord Raglan was obliged to speak more explicitly, and to state more fully his views with regard to Lord Lucan, which he had been forced to do by the course adopted by Lord Lucan, he said he had no intention of casting any slur upon his character, or indeed of hurting his feelings. Lord Lucan was not charged with having wilfully disobeyed orders, and it was just as much open to Lord Raglan to demand a court-martial upon the charges made by Lord Lucan as it was for Lord Lucan to demand a court-martial upon the charges made by Lord Raglan. What had been said by Lord Raglan against Lord Lucan was said in vindication of his own conduct. When his mode of noticing Lord Lucan's conduct was called in question, it was clear that large discretionary powers must be placed in the hands of the Commander of the forces. Precedents for the course that Lord Raglan had taken had frequently occurred under the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula, and though officers might not have been satisfied, no complaints were preferred by them. The Commander in Chief, was answerable to his country for his conduct, but large discretionary powers in the field he must have, and if it was to be questioned in this manner, in one case, it might be in every other case. With these remarks, he would leave the matter in the hands of the House, believing that no case had been made out either against Lord Hardinge or Lord Raglan, and that there was no ground for calling for a court-martial.

MR. FRENCH said, he would admit that there might be some technical difficulties in the way of granting a court-martial, but still he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate was not justified in his sneer against Lord Lucan for not having asked for a court-martial on the evening of the action of Balaklava. Lord Lucan, however, could not have demanded inquiry, immediate inquiry, on the spot, for he never dreamt that a report would be made such as that which had been made. Indeed, he had been assured by General Airey and others that the report would be favourable to him ; and it was only when Lord Raglan's report came back to the Crimea that he learned what had been done. To the motion of the hon. Member (Mr. H. Berkeley) he had no objection, but he did object to the mode in which it had been met by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate. The hon. Member for Bristol had spoken highly of the heavy cavalry charge, but he had not done justice to his noble and gallant Friend (Lord Lucan), for he had omitted to mention that this movement was ordered by him in person. No doubt the charge was brilliantly executed by General Scarlett, but the whole merit and credit of the business were due to Lord Lucan. The hon. Member said that Lord Lucan did not attend to the first order of Lord Raglan ; but the reason was, because it was impossible to be carried out, for redoubts could not be captured by cavalry alone. The order was peremptory to wait for the infantry, but they did not arrive, and there was no reason to suppose that the order had been given to the infantry to advance. If it was the intention of Lord Raglan that the infantry should advance upon the redoubts, that order was never given. The second order was so exceedingly plain that it could not be mistaken by any one. The Russians had never made any attempt to carry off the guns that were in the redoubts abandoned by the Turks. Captain Nolan was an officer of great reputation and distinction : he had received the order sent to Lord Lucan, first verbally and then in writing. He had just left Lord Raglan, who commanded a view of the field, and there could be no mistake either as to the tenor of the written directions or of Captain Nolan's impressions of them, for he volunteered to show the way, and he rode a short distance at the head of the 13th Dragoons, when he unfortunately received his death wound. Regarded in a common sense point of view, Lord Lucan had no discretion whatever. The order was positive. For anything Lord Lucan knew, the fate of the French cavalry might have depended upon his arriving at a certain place at a certain time, and if a discretion on the part of an officer receiving such instructions were admissible, how could a commander in chief conduct any great engagement ? It might have been possible to check the advance of the Russians only by one of those desperate charges in which a commander might find it necessary to sacrifice 300 or 400 to save a much larger number. That charge was one of the most glorious ever made either by English troops or by the soldiers of any other nation. His noble and gallant Friend did everything that man could do to make the light cavalry charge as effective and as little disastrous as possible. He himself led up the heavy division almost to the very point where the light division charged. Lord Lucan's disposition of the troops was skilful ; he was himself wounded, and one of his aides-de-camp near him was killed. He made no error whatever himself, and he did all that a general and a soldier could do to remedy the errors committed by others. The case was one of injustice to his noble and gallant Friend, for which no redress could be obtained. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate admitted that Parliament might interfere if a case of injustice could be made out. But no greater case of injustice could be made out than had been committed towards an officer who, from the moment he landed at the Crimea, had always been at his post and performing his duty.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said he should oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Bristol and at the same time he must call upon the House of Commons to be cautious how it sanctioned a Motion which might be drawn into a most dangerous precedent. If they did so there would be scarcely any one in the public service censured by his superiors who would not call for the interposition of Parliament, and seek to overthrow the prerogative of the Crown. The noble lord (Lord Elcho) had been driven to the case of Lord George Sackville as a precedent for inquiry. Than that case it was impossible to imagine one more opposite than the case of Lord Lucan ; in fact, they formed a perfect contrast. Why, Lord George Sackville had been branded as a coward at the battle of Minden by one of the greatest generals of the age. His reproof was, that his name was passed over in silence, which every one knew was the greatest punishment that could be inflicted upon him. The public indignation in England was excited to the highest pitch. Lord George Sackville was at once deprived of his command, and of all offices under the Crown, and declared incapable for ever again serving. Lord George Sackville was accused of the gravest offence—and he (Mr. Phillimore) thought rightly accused—that a soldier could be guilty of—cowardice. Now, Lord Lucan's bravery was admitted upon all hands—he had received the thanks of Parliament—and the only charge which had been brought against him, if charge it was, amounted to this—that he had misconceived the orders that had been given to him. In the eyes of any high-minded person such an offence must be regarded as of an extremely venial character. The courage of Lord Lucan was unquestionable and unquestioned—his zeal was unquestioned—and every one who spoke on the matter expressed great personal respect for his character. He would repeat that, if Parliament interfered here there would arise a hundred occasions upon which its interference would be demanded. At the same time, he must observe that, in his opinion, his right hon. and learned Friend, the Judge Advocate, had pushed too far the principle of condonation, for it was a principle of the law of England that a man might waive his own privilege, that his own privilege should not stand in the way of his obtaining justice. The other arguments of his right hon. and learned Friend he considered irresistible, and that the House of Commons, whether it regarded its own dignity or the prerogatives of the Crown, could not and ought not to interfere in this case.

MR. BELLEW said, he adhered to the law as laid down by the right hon. and learned Judge Advocate, which he maintained, in opposition to the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, was the law as it stood, and by that law it was impossible to concede the trial demanded. Still, he must say that, in his opinion, Lord Lucan was a very hardly treated man. He felt it to be his duty, entertaining the very decided opinion he did upon this subject, to vote against the Motion. The Crown having exercised its prerogative, and deliberately declared that it was not the wish or intention of the Crown to grant a court-martial, it was not for the House of Commons to attempt to wrest that power from the Crown, nor any Member to question or contravene its undoubted right and privilege. It was with great pain—believing, as he had already said, that Lord Lucan had been very hardly used—that he would feel bound to vote against the Motion.

COLONEL DUNNE said, it was excessively painful for a military man to be placed in Lord Lucan's position, and he should not have ventured to trouble the House with any remarks, had it not been for certain doctrines on military law laid down by the Judge Advocate General. He agreed with a great deal of what had been laid down by that right hon. and learned Gentleman, but some points of his law he considered were perfectly new. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the noble Lord could not raise the question, as it had already been decided by his superior authorities. This was tantamount to saying that no soldier had a right to have a question re-discussed in which the prerogative of the Crown was concerned. In the abstract he agreed with this principle, but the question to determine was whether a decision which the House and the country might think wrong should not be reconsidered. The charges against Lord Lucan appeared simple, but they were very serious. In the first place, disobedience of an order in which Lord Lucan had exercised his discretion in not advancing, because the infantry were not sent. If he had obeyed, he must have advanced without the infantry; and having exercised his discretion, he was accused of having disobeyed the order. In a short time the second order came, and he was accused of having obeyed that order; and further, for not having brought the heavy cavalry into the same danger as the light cavalry. From his own opinion, and from the opinion of qualified officers, he was satisfied that Lord Lucan had done all that a prudent general could have done. The opinion of competent officers was that Lord Lucan could only do what he had done upon receiving the second order, and had he not obeyed that order, which both he and Lord Cardigan objected to, he must have braved disgrace for disobedience of orders. It had been laid down distinctly that the orders of an aide-de-camp must be obeyed the same as if given by the Commander in Chief. It was a mere quibble to say, that the order to advance to the front was not an order to charge. He must charge if he advanced. Lord Lucan was perfectly exonerated from blame in the opinion of the military men conversant with the subject and with all the circumstances. The doctrine of condonation had been pushed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate to an excess that he had never heard attempted before. Nothing was more clear, if a man was guilty of an offence, and afterwards went into action, that he could not be tried for that offence. But, assuming that a soldier had committed a theft, which was not discovered until after he had been ordered to march, that offence was not to be considered as condoned when the march was completed. The offender could be tried for the offence. That was the principle of Lord Lucan's case. Lord Lucan had never heard the charge that was brought against him until he came to England. Therefore the doctrine of condonation, as laid down by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, was utterly unworthy of him. But that doctrine, coming as it did from so high an authority, would be felt in the army as tending to confuse the law, and as being capable of being drawn into a precedent. He should much regret to see the House go to a division on this subject. He hoped the noble Lord at the head of the Government would reconsider the matter. He did not think it advisable to have a court-martial; but then there was such a thing as a court of inquiry, which would be satisfactory in this instance. Additional powers had lately been given to these courts of inquiry; witnesses might be examined on oath; and he would therefore put it to the sense of justice of the noble Lord to say whether such an inquiry might not be held, although for a court-martial not a tittle of ground existed? If Lord Lucan were tried on the despatch of Lord Raglan, he would be acquitted with honour. He believed, if all the facts were fairly brought out, that Lord Lucan would stand acquitted of any charge of misconception of Lord Raglan's order, and would be found to have done his duty in such a way as was an honour to the service and to the country.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he must express the gratification he felt, that Lord Panmure had issued a circular to the militia, in conformity with the assurance given to the House a few evenings ago. He ventured to say, on the part of that service to which he had the honour to belong, and on the part of that corps of which he had the command, that a finer body of men did not exist in the world. He did not wish to make a boast of what he had done or what he might do, in spending any sums of money within his power to make them efficient. He had heard the statement made the other evening by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, about the enrolment of the militia, with great delight, and he had immediately telegraphed it to his regiment. [Cries of "Question."] Hon. Gentlemen might cry question, but this was a military question, and a question that interested him more than any other. He begged to assure the Government and the Crown that he would go any lengths to keep the Royal South Lincolnshire Militia in the most efficient state—and that nothing should be wanting in his purse or person to make them in every way worthy of the country, and able for any service, whether foreign or otherwise, that they might be called upon to perform.

MR. DISRAELI : I cannot refrain, Sir, from expressing my opinion that the question before us to-night ought not to be the subject of a division. Having followed with much attention this debate, I entirely sympathise with the feelings of a gallant soldier like Lord Lucan, who, after having served his sovereign and his country with great courage and devotion, finds himself, at a moment like the present, in the peculiar position in which he is placed. I think, however, the noble Lord must have felt that, in a free country like this, where every man has the power, by some means or other, of appealing to opinion, and placing his conduct fairly before the public, great as are the difficulties in which he has been placed, the appeals he has made to the calm reflection of his countrymen have not been unattended by satisfactory results. But, whatever may be our feelings with respect to the noble Lord, and however we may sympathise with a gallant officer under the difficult circumstances in which he is placed, we must, with regard to the vote we are now called upon to give, look to the nature of the Motion before us. I am not inclined, Sir, to take a pedantic view of the nature or the power of the Royal prerogative. I believe that, as it at present exists, it is extremely beneficial to every one of Her Majesty's subjects. I am not inclined to uphold the dogma that that prerogative is too strong. My own feelings would influence me to a very opposite tendency. I would rather see the influence of that prerogative increased than diminished. At the same time, I cannot but admit that, under some circumstances in which the prerogative might be exercised, this House might feel it their duty to interfere. The first duty of the House of Commons is to redress the grievances of the people, and I suppose we have not arrived at that state of affairs when an individual who happens to be a nobleman may not yet enjoy the privilege of being counted one of the people. The first and the greatest grievance which any member of the community can suffer is certainly a denial of justice. If, therefore, it is alleged that there has been a denial of justice to any subject of Her Majesty, whether he be a patrician or a ploughboy, I maintain that it is our duty to consider the case; and, if we believe the appeal well founded, to do our best to afford justice to the applicant. But, Sir, I cannot bring myself to believe that the present is a case which sanctions interference with the prerogative. In a position of great difficulty the noble Lord has shown distinguished gallantry and great ability; and I may add, that in other positions of life he has exhibited qualities which entitle him to public respect. I cannot forget what Lord Lucan did in Ireland, in his character of a landlord, at a period when that country was in a position of very great difficulty, and when its affairs were brought under the consideration of Parliament. Although the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate has told us that this was really an affair between Lord Raglan and Lord Lucan, I could not resist the conviction, as I listened to the debate, that if the affair had only been left to Lord Raglan and Lord Lucan, there was no need why the country or Parliament should ever have been acquainted with it. The comments that were made upon the statement of Lord Lucan by Lord Raglan, the rejoinder of Lord Lucan to Lord Raglan, and all that afterwards occurred, even the representation to the Minister, did not necessarily require publicity. All this difficulty has been occasioned by the recall of Lord Lucan on the responsibility of the Minister of War. Now, what was the position of the Minister of War at that time? He was a Member of a Government in very great distress and difficulty, and against which a considerable amount of public odium was excited; and the Minister of War, when a victim was necessary—when it was thought, perhaps, that the recall of some general officer would in some degree appease public indignation, and might in some measure satisfy the vindictive craving which had seized the public appetite—fixed upon Lord Lucan. Taking advantage of circumstances which were within his official knowledge, he recalled Lord Lucan, he subjected a distinguished, and, as I believe, a meritorious officer, to a slur upon his reputation, and thus has led to all these discussions and debates. Now, although I cannot question in the present case, the exercise of the Royal prerogative, notwithstanding that perfectly legal, but, at the same time, in some respects, cruel exercise of the Royal prerogative, of refusing inquiry after condonation by which Lord Lucan has become the victim, I think there is one point upon which the House of Commons has a right to complain—there is one point which I consider a grievance. I cannot forget that this gallant officer, whose conduct is now so impugned, who is labouring under an infliction which must be most bitter to any man of generous spirit—I cannot forget that the noble Lord, in his capacity as a British general, was, a brief time since, marked out by Her Majesty's Government as worthy of almost the greatest distinction that an Englishman can possibly receive. I remember the then leader of this House (the noble Lord now absent) came forward and proposed a vote of thanks by the House of Commons to those who had distinguished themselves in those glorious victories, which, whatever the fate of this struggle may be, will remain for ever in the recollection of Englishmen. I had the honour—and I deemed it a high honour—of seconding the Motion of the noble Lord. I told the House in the few words I uttered the deep responsibility that I felt, for I myself considered that the public expression of the thanks of the Parliament of England was one of those inestimable rewards which an Englishman cannot too highly prize, and which ought to be classed with those stars and ribands which are the symbols of the feelings of respect which our Sovereign entertains for the subject who distinguishes himself. Her Majesty's Ministers are cheapening this great honour—they are treating it as a mere ceremony, as an idle ceremony—if they ask in this solemn and formal manner the House of Commons to express their thanks to the general officers, when they are in the possession of facts which could justify them in recalling one of those general officers in disgrace from the scene of his achievements and his conflicts. I do not think, Sir, the Government in this matter were acting fairly by the House of Commons. Either it was not acting fairly then to ask us to express our thanks to Lord Lucan for his conduct, or it is acting unjustly and unfairly to Lord Lucan now, after such a proposition, unanimously carried by this House, to recall, with a slur upon his reputation, that distinguished officer from the scene of his achievements. I do, therefore, think it a circumstance which requires some explanation—if Her Majesty's Government did not without thought propose the thanks of this House to the general officers, which were at once liberally, freely, and unanimously accorded, because there was only one opinion in this House as to the merit and services of Lord Lucan—if they did this when they were in the possession of circumstances which, according to their present interpretation, justify them in recalling the noble Lord from the scene of his professional labours. I will not attempt to give an opinion on those labours; it would be presumptuous in me to do so; but I have been glad to hear men who were entitled to give one, speak of the noble Lord in a spirit which I believe to be the general opinion of this country. As far as I can form an opinion from discussions, I certainly think that public discussion has not injured either the character or the career of the noble Lord. Although he may not receive the formal inquiry he has sought—sought, perhaps, without sufficient justification, but in a spirit which we must all respect—still it will be seen, however, that the character of the distinguished officer who has been engaged in the late struggle has been shown to be not unworthy of the public confidence and interest. I hope and trust that the result of those discussions has been soothing to the wounded spirit of Lord Lucan; but I cannot but say that the Motion, whether regarded in the spirit of the hon. Member who brought it forward, or of the noble Lord who seconded—and the two dispositions were very contrary—still I do not think that the Motion is one which the House of Commons can sanction. Still, in thus giving my opinion, I do not wish it to be inferred that I at all agree in any opinion adverse to the noble Lord's professional reputation and conduct as a gallant officer.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I entirely associate myself with the expressions which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us, and in concurring with him in objecting to this Motion, whether placed on the grounds urged by the Mover, or whether placed on the grounds put by my noble Friend who seconded the Motion. I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, and trust that nothing has passed in this debate which can be considered as casting anything on the military character of the noble Lord who has been the subject of the present discussion. Nothing can be more painful to this House than discussions of this kind, involving the feelings of individuals and matters of professional conduct. There must be topics—whichever may be the subject, or whatever the occasion which has given rise to them—which the House must always feel a disposition to avoid, unless they are absolutely forced upon its attention; and these subjects are particularly to be avoided when they relate to officers of the army and to matters of military discipline. It is quite natural, in the present state of things, when the attention of the country has been so painfully directed to military events at the seat of war, that this House should sympathise with the public, and should have its attention more than usually directed to matters of this kind. At the same time, I think that the House ought not to forget that the command of the army is, by the constitution of the country, vested in the Crown; and if this House, whose powers I do not wish to limit or define, should take into its own hands matters involving the discipline of the army, or should take upon itself questions with respect to good services and the maintenance of good order, which ought to be left with the Crown, and its principal advisers, you may depend upon it that such a course will give rise to dangers, the extent of which may not at first sight be seen. I think, on the grounds which have been stated, that this is a case in which it is impossible for the Crown to grant a court-martial. I think the examples which have been adduced in justification of a court-martial go quite the other way. The case cited of Lord George Germaine is one in which that nobleman was accused of not having done enough in the execution of an order; but Lord Lucan is found fault with for having done too much. Nobody has ever questioned the courage of Lord Lucan, or his services during the whole period of the time he was employed. His case is precisely the reverse of Lord George Germaine's, and not the slightest imputation has been cast on the military qualities of Lord Lucan, of which Lord George Germaine is said to have been deficient. If, Sir, therefore, I were asked to point out a case precisely the reverse of Lord George Germaine's, I should cite that of Lord Lucan. I think, therefore, we have the strongest grounds why a court-martial should not be granted. We have grounds of a technical nature, grounds of the inexpediency of such a course, and grounds of particular and general consideration. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has adverted to a circumstance which I think tells in a different manner to that in which he applied it. He says, that Her Majesty's Government seem to have treated lightly the thanks of the House of Commons, by having recalled an officer—as he says, in disgrace—which I utterly deny—to whom the thanks of this House had been given. I must say, as far as the military services of Lord Lucan are concerned, the very fact of that vote of thanks having been given to him, is a proof that Lord Lucan well deserves the thanks of his country, and places his character in a position in which his best friends would wish to have it placed. Was he recalled, I ask, for reasons at variance with that vote of thanks? Was he recalled because he had not done good service? He was recalled because differences had arisen between himself and his commanding officer (Lord Raglan)—differences which placed Lord Lucan in such a relation with his commanding officer as to render it incompatible with the good of the service for him to remain longer with the army, and which rendered it impossible, in the view taken by the Government, that those officers could continue to act usefully together, and consequently Lord Lucan was ordered home. But he was not recalled in disgrace, nor was there any reflection cast upon his character, and I should be the last man in the world to sanction any such inference being drawn from his being recalled. As far as the professional feelings of Lord Lucan and those of his friends are concerned, I hope they will be satisfied with this discussion, for I do not consider that any grounds have been shown on which a court-martial can be granted. I therefore trust that this Motion will be negatived as one which it is inexpedient for the House on any possible grounds to adopt.

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, he was willing that the Motion should be negatived, but he thought that as matters stood there was one person who could not but feel aggrieved at the course which the debate had taken, he meant Lord Raglan. The Motion had been brought forward with a view of defending Lord Lucan, but had resulted in a series of attacks on Lord Raglan, who as an absent man had every right to complain. He hoped, that while Lord Raglan remained at the head of the army, nothing would be permitted to transpire in that House which could damage his reputation or impair his authority. He had no objection to the course suggested by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, but he humbly entered his protest against the charges which his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) had made against Lord Raglan while defending his relative, Lord Lucan.

LORD ELCHO said, he was not aware of having brought any charges against the Commander in Chief of the army in the Crimea. So far as he recollects, the only charge he made—if, indeed, it could be called one—was that, having brought those charges against Lord Lucan, and believed him to be incapable, Lord Raglan did not remove him from his command at once. After what had passed, he begged the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Berkeley) not to press his Motion to a division. The honourable and respectful manner in which Lord Lucan had been spoken of—the testimonies which had been borne to his military services and military capacity by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) and other Members of the House, and also by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, would, he was sure, be satisfactory to Lord Lucan himself, as they could not but be highly satisfactory to his friends.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would consent to withdraw his Motion, as upon legal grounds the inquiry it asked for appeared to be impossible.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, before the discussion closes, there is one point that I think should not be left in doubt. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) has stated that, in his opinion, the late Government were actuated in the recall of Lord Lucan by feelings connected with the difficulties in which they were placed by the public demand for a victim. Now, that is an imputation of a character that should not be left in any degree of uncertainty. I did understand that the answer of the noble Lord at the head of the Government intended to go to that point and to negative the statement, when he said that the ground on which Lord Lucan was recalled was the incompatibility which, in the opinion of the late Government, existed between the discharge of duty by the Commander of the Forces and the continuance of Lord Lucan in his command.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My right hon. Friend has correctly understood what I intended to say. The recall of Lord Lucan was founded entirely on the difference which took place between him and his superior officer, and there is no ground for the imputation which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) has cast upon the Duke of Newcastle of having made him a victim. For that act the Duke of Newcastle was not responsible any more than the rest of the Cabinet; it was the act of the Government, and I am as much responsible for it as the Duke of Newcastle.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in the observations which I made to the House, I certainly did not intend to cast any imputations individually on the Duke of Newcastle. I have on all former occasions avoided making imputations on individual Ministers. I hold the Cabinet responsible, and not individual Ministers, and therefore I made no particular imputation on the Duke of Newcastle as distinguished from the rest of the Cabinet. But I beg to say in explanation, that I recognise no difference between the late Cabinet and the present; I look on them both as the same Administration.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CHURCH-RATES ABOLITION BILL.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill for the abolition of church-rates, said it was not necessary for him to trespass but for a very short time on the patience of the House, as it was not his intention to touch upon debatable ground, or to enter upon arguments calculated to provoke opposition. The main object of his present measure was the total abolition of church-rates, in which respect it was similar to the Bill which he had introduced last year. He felt, however, that in abolishing church-rates certain substitutes would become necessary, and were, in fact, the consequence, or, more strictly speaking, the complement of the abolition of the church-rates. The right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) had, in the discussion of the previous year, alluded to certain difficulties which, in the event of church-rates being abolished must stand in the way of defraying by voluntary contributions expenses which were now defrayed by the rate. He (Sir W. Clay) had not been unaware of the difficulty, and had therefore not thought the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion unreasonable. He had since then looked carefully into the state of the law, and had endeavoured in the Bill he now asked leave to bring in, to find a way by which they might be obviated. If Parliament, on the one hand, abolished church-rates, it was bound, on the other, to remove all obstacles to Members of the church, by free-will offerings, maintaining her fabrics, and supporting the decent performance of her services and rites. The present Bill, like that of last Session, would provide for the continuance of church-rates in all cases where charges had been contracted upon them as a security under the authority of existing Acts of Parliament. The first purpose to which the new provisions of the measure were directed was to meet the condition of affairs that would exist after this impost had been removed. They would provide for the new position in which churchwardens would be placed in their relation to those persons who might voluntarily subscribe towards the support of the edifices and the ministrations of the Church, and also for cases in which churchwardens might be reluctant to undertake such functions. It would likewise give the contributors to this voluntary fund a control over its application. It would be seen, therefore, that the general principle and tendency of the Bill were based on an entire reliance upon the willingness of the Members of the Church of England to maintain the edifices of the Church, and to defray the expenses incident to the performance of her rites. The next object which its provisions sought to attain was to empower parishes, if so disposed, to allot a certain portion of the area of their churches for pews, to affix a rent to those pews, and to apply its produce to those purposes for which church-rates might now be legally appropriated. Such an application of pew-rents was consistent both with precedent and with widely-spread practice under the sanction of existing local and general Acts of Parliament. The measure required that in no case should more than a given proportion of the church be devoted to pews, and that another portion should be allotted for free sittings. This part of the Bill was, however, in no way compulsory—every parish would decide in regard to it as it thought fit. Such, then, were the main provisions added by this measure to the absolute removal of church-rates. They had been framed in a desire to alter the law as little as possible consistently with the attainment of their immediate object. With the important exception of the absolute repeal of this objectionable impost, they were of an enabling rather than of an imperative character. He had not the least intention to change the status of the Established Church, to diminish the rights or the authority of her dignitaries and ministers, and still less to impair, by a single iota, the powers, privileges, or immunities of the inhabitants of any parish, or to deprive any subject of the realm of whatever rights or advantages he enjoyed in regard to the Church as it now by law existed. This Bill might not satisfy those who thought either that no alteration, or that but a very slight one, should be made in the present state of the law; but he certainly hoped that it would meet the views of those who, admitting the necessity not only of some considerable change, but of the entire abolition of church-rates, were yet impressed with a sense of the difficulties incident to such a proposition. These provisions would make the Bill workable in a practical shape. If the House would now consent to the introduction of the measure he would take care that it should be in the hands of Members immediately after the Easter recess, and that ample time should be given for the consideration of its details.

MR. MIAULL seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the Abolition of Church-rates."

MR. WIGRAM said, as far as he could gather from the statement of the hon. baronet, the present bill was exactly the same in effect as that of last year, notwithstanding the alterations which it was proposed to introduce into it. As far as he could understand the hon. baronet's explanation, it did not differ either in principle or substance from the previous measure. It was simply a Bill to abolish church rates. There, however, appeared to be in addition to that a provision to enable persons voluntarily to contribute towards the support of the national Church ; but without a Parliamentary enactment, he apprehended that enabling clause would be found in many cases wholly inoperative. It was also, he understood, proposed to allow money to be raised for the purpose by letting the pews. In many parts of the country, especially in the rural districts, that would be very objectionable. There might be no very great objection to it, probably, in some of the large towns, where wealthy persons generally occupy the pews, who would be willing not only to pay for their sittings, but also to contribute towards the maintenance of the fabric of the church, and the ministration of the elements ; but in the country parishes any such provision would be wholly ineffectual. Generally speaking, those parishes were too poor to raise funds for supporting or upholding the church, and if they failed, as he believed they would, in raising the funds by voluntary contributions, he much feared that they would not be able to let their pews. On a former occasion it had been shown that neither in point of law nor principle was the demand for the abolition of church-rates founded upon any plea of justice or expediency. The land of the country was as much bound to the payment of that impost as any other to which it was liable. It was a common law obligation attaching to the land, of which the owners were aware when they came into possession of the property. The demand for the abolition could not, therefore, rest upon any plea of justice. Then, with regard to expediency, the national churches were the national property of the country ; they tended to the public good, and the promotion of morality and religion, and in that respect the Dissenters were as much interested in upholding them as members of the Established Church themselves. It was clear, then, that on the ground of expediency there was no plea for the abolition of the impost. The plea, and the only plea, ever put forward for the abolition of church-rates was, that it was a violation of the rights of conscience to call upon one portion of the community to compel them to contribute towards the maintenance of a religious fabric and the performance of religious services in which they did not concur. That was the principle involved in the present Bill, and if it prevailed it would be pressed hereafter to the extent of abolishing all religious endowments. To that principle he was opposed, and he trusted the House would not give its assent to it so far even as to allow the Bill of the hon. baronet to be introduced. A promise had been given by the late Government to introduce a Bill to remedy the anomaly of the law which the decision of the House of Lords (in the Braintree case, in which it was declared that though, by law, the burden rested upon the land, the option of carrying that law into effect rested with the majority of the parishioners) had created. If the present Government would fulfil the pledge so given, the inconvenience arising from the present state of the law would be obviated, and the proposal of the hon. baronet would be unnecessary.

MR. LLOYD DAVIES said he fully concurred in the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed the House. He considered such a Bill as that under consideration would increase the difficulty that already existed, but it would change the complaining parties from the Dissenters to the Churchmen. It appeared to him that the object, so far as the conscientious ground was concerned, might be effected without any violation of public rights. They might deal with church-rates, he thought, on the same principle as they had dealt with tithes under the Tithes Commutation Act, and place the expense of supporting the fabric of the churches as a rent charge upon the land, leaving the elements of worship to be provided by the voluntary offerings of those who joined in the holy ordinances. With regard to raising a fund from pew rents in the country parishes, he believed it would be impracticable. In the two counties with which he was connected, there was not a single parish in which the pews were paid for.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, he cordially concurred in the wish that had been expressed by the hon. Gentleman opposite, that Government would bring in a measure to settle this long-vaed question; at the same time, he was not inclined to offer any opposition to the first reading of the Bill of the hon. Baronet. He thought it due to the House and to the subject that hon. Members should have the opportunity of reading the clauses of the Bill before they were called upon to decide upon them. If, however, the hon. Baronet imagined that he held out any inducement to Churchmen to concur in his object by the proposal to let the area of the church to the best bidders, he would find himself greatly mistaken. He was astonished, when he heard the hon. Baronet say, that he proposed to make but a very slight alteration in the law of the land. Why, it was impossible to make a more serious alteration in the common law of the land than to make the whole area of the church divisible into pews, to be let to the highest bidder. To this part of the measure he should give his most unqualified opposition. He was aware that in some parishes such an expedient was resorted to, but that was the exception; and in the very last Church Building Act a clause had been introduced to remedy the evil. In the hon. Baronet's Bill, however, this, which was one of the worst anomalies of the Church of England, would be continued, and that which was now the exception made the rule. He should be glad to know from the hon. Baronet, whether he proposed to include Scotland in the operation of his Bill? He had never yet heard any argument why the consciences of the Dissenters in Scotland should not be relieved as well as the consciences of English Dissenters.

MR. BENTINCK said, he did not mean to trouble the House by entering into a discussion upon the general character of the measure under their consideration. He could not, however, refrain from entering his protest against its being brought forward at a period of the Session, when many hon. Members who took a deep interest in the question were precluded from recording their opinions upon the propositions which the hon. Baronet had just submitted to the House. They had received no intimation whatever as to the course which Her Majesty's Ministers intended to pursue in reference to the Bill; but, as we no longer suffered under the affliction of possessing a coalition Government, he had no doubt that noble Lords and right hon. and hon. Gentlemen upon the Treasury bench, whose antecedents were of a character so similar, would at all events unite in the decision at which they might arrive with regard to a subject so important as the abolition of church-rates, and would adhere to the opinion which had been expressed in opposition to a measure similar to that now before the House by one of their colleagues last year. He found that the noble Lord the Member for London had expressed himself, when the question was last under their consideration, to the effect that in his opinion it would not be wise or consistent with the position which the Established Church held in this country to abolish church-rates. That noble Lord had also stated that "to assent to the abolition of church-rates without any modification would, he believed, be a concession dangerous to the Established Church, and through it to the peace and welfare of this country." Now, having had that assurance from the noble Lord, and having reason to place confidence in the unanimity of the Government, he could entertain no doubt as to the course which they would feel it to be their duty to take with reference to the measure under discussion. At all events, he was justified in assuming that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London would, if he were in his place, vote against that measure. For his own part, he should at all times give to it his most strenuous opposition.

LORD STANLEY said, he apprehended that it was the wish of the House that no protracted discussion should take place upon that occasion with reference to the measure of the hon. Baronet opposite, but that such discussion should be postponed until the second reading of the Bill. That, no doubt, was the most reasonable course to adopt. At the same time, he must observe, that, as the measure contained so few details, and was so explicit—there being involved in it only one question of principle—it was matter of little importance whether the discussion of its provisions were to take place that evening or when it came to be read a second time. Everybody concurred in the opinion that the present state of the law with respect to church-rates was highly unsatisfactory. Looking back upon the history of the question, from the time of the Reform Bill in 1832 up to the present moment, he could not find that any Government had expressed its satisfaction with the existing state of the law. Almost every Government had, since then, tried its hand at the amendment of that law, but in that endeavour Minister after Minister had successively failed. The position in which they at present stood in relation to the question was, in his opinion, that if, after a period of more than twenty years, any amendment of the law could be introduced to meet the views of the Nonconformists and the Churchmen, such alteration should, at all events, receive a favourable consideration at their hands. They were therefore called upon to entertain a proposition for the amendment of the existing law, which dealt with that law in the only manner in which he believed it could now be placed on a satisfactory footing. As to the ministerial measure which had been promised to the House last Session, he could not say that he looked forward to its introduction with any great degree of hope. There had, for the last twenty years, been many Ministerial measures laid upon the table of that House for the purpose of remedying the defects of the existing law with reference to church-rates; but, as he had previously stated, none of those numerous measures had ever received the approbation of the Legislature. The provisions of the Bill now under their notice, he did not think the present was the time to discuss; but there was one proposal of the hon. Baronet which he conceived was liable to be misunderstood—he alluded to that by which the hon. Baronet meant to provide for the reception of voluntary contributions for the repairs of our churches. The difficulty which that proposition had been framed to meet was, he apprehended, that the churchwarden being, under the law as it stood, responsible for the repairs of the church, a hostile churchwarden might, even now, not only refuse to take any part in raising a rate, but might decline to apply subscriptions received for that purpose. Pew rents were matters of detail; the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Clay) he believed did not mean that the whole area of the churches should be appropriated on that footing, but that the larger portion should be left open and free. [Sir W. CLAY: Hear, hear!] These, however, were only matters of detail, the time for discussing which had not arrived, and, therefore, without pledging himself to approve of the measure, he (Lord Stanley) thought the House were bound to give it a fair trial, in the absence of any other proposition to amend the law, the state of which was admitted by all to be most unsatisfactory.

MR. H. DRUMMOND: Sir, it is just because I agree in the "major premise" of the noble Lord's proposition that I have arrived at an exactly opposite conclusion. It is because the measure differs in no respect from other similar measures, and that there can be no reason why we should not state our opinions upon it at this stage, that I oppose its introduction. Sir, this whole question is another instance of the many which we have seen since the Reform Bill of an error persisted in by our rulers till it becomes intolerable, and forces on the people something which they think is an amendment, but which always is, and never can be other than, a complete revolution. The evil insisted on for years is the partition of churches into pews. Nothing I have ever heard has justified—nothing can ever justify—this, which has now become a most intolerable nuisance. Next, there is the gross injustice of applying rates to rites of worship which they were never intended to support. When you admitted the principle of toleration to Dissenters, they had a right to object to have anything raised from them for the rites and worship of the Established Church. But the churches of England are national property. And you cannot separate this question from another. The only way in which you can deal with the Church here (however you may dispute elsewhere as to the meaning of the word) is by looking to the buildings in which the members of the Church assemble for worship and the salaries of the ministers who preside over them. With every other meaning of the word we have nothing to do. And the moment you admit that it is not a national obligation to uphold those buildings and pay those ministers, you had better do the bold and honest thing, which nine-tenths of the supporters of this measure mean and desire to do—that is to pull down the Established Church—[loud cries of "Hear, hear," and "No, no!"]. I say that is what you mean. And why are you not manly enough to bring it forward, instead of tinkering and haggling about it in this way; trying to undermine the material fabric of the Church. You mean that. When that comes down, then the whole Establishment falls. This, Sir, is a middle-class movement—that middle class who have bought houses with this burden upon them, and who now want to get rid of it—robbing the Church on one hand and cheating the poor on the other. Robbing the Church of the rate and cheating the poor of the pews, to which they now have a right. Parcelling the churches out into pews, and letting them out to the highest bidders, to make the most money out of them. If the churches are not national, and to be supported by the people at large, let the Government take them, and let the houses be valued, and the fair amount of their liability to church-rate estimated and paid into the Exchequer as a fund, out of which to maintain them. Whenever any revolutionary measure is proposed, it is professed to be in order to "uphold our institutions," and now you are wanting to pull down the churches by way of upholding the Church. Why repair the Royal Palaces, and why uphold the Civil List? They stand on the same footing as church-rates. And if you declined to maintain them longer, what would become of Royalty in this country! Put down church-rates, you put down the Church; and, depend upon it, you can never uphold it by withholding support from its buildings.

MR. E. BALL said: the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had cast upon the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) imputations of a most ungenerous and unfounded nature. The hon. Member for West Norfolk had objected to the introduction of this measure, because the House was about to adjourn till after Easter; but he (Mr. E. Ball) thought that that was just the reason why the Bill ought to be introduced now, because in the Easter recess hon. Gentlemen would have an opportunity of considering it. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Wiggram) had said that the great objection to this measure was, that, if it were passed great difficulties would be experienced in obtaining money to repair churches in country places. He (Mr. E. Ball) presumed that the poorer part of the population in those places were Dissenters, and yet they contrived to build and repair their chapels and to support their ministers. You could scarcely find one country place throughout the whole of this magnificent kingdom, in which there were not Dissenting chapels which were supported by the voluntary contributions of Dissenters. Why, then, should any fear be entertained that the wealthy part of our population would not support the Church of which they were members? If there was any ground for such a fear, he must suppose one of two things—either that they were unwilling to support their own Church, and did not take so deep an interest in religion as Dissenters did, or that they objected to the principle of voluntary contributions. But he should be very unwilling to impute either of those things to the rich members of the Church of England. But the law, even as it stood at present, was not compulsory with regard to the repair of the fabric of the Established Church. Without the assent of the majority of the rate-payers, a church-rate could not be imposed either in towns or in country places. And, gradually, the whole of the country would refuse to give their assent to the levying of church-rates. Very little, therefore, was to be gained by the members of the Church of England succeeding in resisting this Bill. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Drummond), who was always ready to cast imputations upon the motives of those who differed from him, had said that nine-tenths of the supporters of this Bill aimed at the destruction of the Church. Now he strenuously denied that such was their intention. He was as sincerely attached to the Church as was the hon. Gentleman himself. If the hon. Gentleman was affectionately attached to the Church, why did he not propose to set her free from the odium which the levying of church-rates and other matters brought upon her, whereby the affection of multitudes of the people of this country was alienated from her? Dissenters were not unwilling to contribute voluntarily to the repair of the fabric of the Church, and it ought to be the policy of the Church to deal affectionately, and not harshly, towards them. The Dissenters were nearly, if not altogether, the majority of the people of this country. They were training 3,000,000 of children, the greater part of whom were taught, not by the catechism, but by the New Testament. Those children were the rising generation of the country, and it ought to be the policy of the Church of England not to insult, but to treat them affectionately when they came to the age of maturity.

MR. MUNTZ said, he very much wished to know what was the use of retaining a law that was practically inoperative? In the town which he had the honour of representing there had not been a church-rate for twenty years, and, although he himself had subscribed as much for church repairs as he should have been called on to pay had there been one, that was no reason why he should advocate that persons dissenting from the Church of England should be called upon to contribute. It was disgraceful to the Church of England to ask a Dissenter to pay church-rates. Why, one man might as well ask another to pay for his washing and lodging! The Church of England was quite able to support itself, and he believed that every real churchman was individually opposed to levying rates upon Dissenters. But it was a curious circumstance that a body of persons would frequently do that which the persons forming it would individually be ashamed to do.

MR. PACKE said, he thought that the House ought to receive some explanation as to the course which the Government intended to pursue with respect to this measure. He had last year asked the Government what course they proposed taking with regard to church-rates, and the noble Lord the Member for London had said in reply, that he would, after the recess, state the intentions of the Government on the subject; and now he thought that it was very necessary for the House to know how far the Government approved of the measure of the hon. baronet. He himself had not heard anything to induce him not to offer a decided opposition to the measure, which appeared to him to give to church-rates an optional principle which was highly objectionable. By the levying of tithes all were called upon to contribute to the support of the clergy, and it appeared to him to be inconsistent that a provision should be kept up for the support of the clergy, while provision for the repair of the churches in which they were to preach was abandoned.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he did not care what course the Government intended to pursue, but, acting on his own judgment, he should oppose the Bill. He had heard with great satisfaction the speech of the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond). He himself was actuated by no hostile spirit to Dissenters; on the contrary, he respected them, and was honoured with the support of many of them, but he would not shrink from the duty of supporting the Established Church. He always took a straightforward course, whether right or wrong, and he felt bound to oppose a Motion which would undermine the Church, and which was supported by many hon. Members, he firmly believed, solely that they might secure their seats. It appeared to him to be the fashion of the day to subvert everything, and the result was that the country was on the verge of danger, if not of ruin. Everything in its turn was attacked—the Church, the Law, the Navy, and the Military department. He had often said, let well alone, and he believed most firmly that Radicalism and the Reform Bill would prove to be the principal causes of the ruin of the country. He could only say, that his main ambition was to sacrifice his life and fortune, if it should be necessary, in his country's service.

MR. FLOYER said, he did not feel himself bound by any arguments which had been raised respecting the interests of large towns. For many years past the interests of large towns had been too exclusively considered by that House, and it was now time to consider the interests of county constituencies. They were often called upon to vote large sums for the support of such institutions as the British Museum and National Gallery, because they afforded means of instruction and education; but what institution could compete with the National Church as a great public instructor for the poorer classes, and how could they refuse the small sum required for church-rates throughout the country, when they so willingly granted large amounts for the purchase of objects of virtù or decorative ornament? If in the country church-rates were abolished, great difficulties would be experienced in maintaining the fabrics, and, therefore, if the Legislature unwise determined to adopt the proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets, they would inflict a serious injury on the country by restricting the benefits of the Church, and depriving the poor of that to which they had hitherto looked with firmness and success for consolation.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he was of opinion that if, as was asserted, the principle of the present measure was the same as that of the Bill rejected last Session, the existing law was entitled to the same support it then received. The noble Lord the Member for London on that occasion took the high ground that church-rates stood on the same footing as the hereditary institutions of the country, and the upholders of the system might, therefore, look with some confidence to the support of a Government which, although changed, still retained many of the individual Members composing Lord Aberdeen's Administration. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had said, would they show him any great town where for some years past they had been able to enforce church-rates? A Return had been obtained by the hon. and learned Member for Tavistock (Mr. Phillimore) which showed that, in the large parishes of this metropolis, since the agitation of the present question, church-rates had been granted in a very great number of cases. He, therefore, denied that the popular feeling was as much against church-rates as had been represented. Although he would confess that the large towns opposed the imposition of church-rates, they must place against them the 10,000 or 12,000 rural parishes, where the law was readily enforced, and was looked up to by the parishioners with veneration and respect. He admitted, however, that with regard to Dissenters it was in an unsatisfactory position, and, being inclined to consent to some compromise on the subject, he had looked anxiously for a proposition of that nature from Her Majesty's Government. Believing that such a compromise would yet be made, he should vote in opposition to the present Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The question, Sir, now brought under the consideration of the House is undoubtedly one beset with great difficulties of both kinds. It is exceedingly difficult to maintain the law, and it is exceedingly difficult to alter it in a satisfactory mode, and those difficulties have been long felt. In the first place, the contest about church-rates keeps up animosities and religious differences between sects in a way very prejudicial, I think, to the general interests of the country, and prejudicial, I should also say, to the interests of religion itself. It must be admitted upon all hands that if an arrangement could be made which would provide adequately for the repair of churches and chapels without involving questions of religious controversy, it would be a great blessing to the country at large. There has been, for a long time, a difficulty with regard to the maintenance of the existing law, and I think that the decision which took place not long ago in regard to that law—and which was referred to by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Wigram)—has increased that difficulty. When it is stated by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the maintenance of the fabric of the Church is a part of the law of the land, they appear to forget that, by recent decisions, there is no power of enforcing that law. If the law were that a compulsory power existed requiring every parish to levy a rate, then I agree that that would be the best mode of providing for the fabric of the Church, and those who wished to maintain church-rates would act consistently in supporting that law. But when the law says that the fabric of the Church must be maintained by rates which are to be raised in parishes by a vote of the majority of the parishioners, then it becomes no longer the law that the church must be maintained by rates, because it depends entirely upon the will of the parishioners whether church-rates shall be levied or not. I was sorry to hear a comparison made between the position of large towns and country parishes. That is a question which ought not to be mixed up in an argument of this kind. Though, if you come to consider what are the localities in which the largest repairs of churches are the most needed, and the largest amount of money is required, you will find that they are those very towns where the majority of the inhabitants are against raising that money by church-rates. I think, therefore, that all must feel that some change in the law is very desirable in the interest of the Church itself. How is that alteration to be made? That, undoubtedly, is a very serious question, and one on which I beg to refrain from pronouncing any decided opinion upon the present occasion. Now, it is said that the present Bill is almost identical with that which the House rejected last year. I do not think that that assertion is correct. My hon. Friend (Sir W. Clay) has shadowed out and explained shortly and clearly those modifications of his plan which renders it very different from the simple proposition for a total abolition of the tax which he made last Session. Therefore, regarding this as a subject which is well deserving of consideration, and reserving to Her Majesty's Government full freedom to deal with the measure when it shall be introduced according to their judgment of its merits, I shall certainly not oppose the introduction of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he could not agree to a proposal to sweep away church-rates without any substitute being provided, but, without entering into any argument, he thought the best protest he could make against any proposition of that kind was to vote against the introduction of the Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, that the main reason given by the noble Lord for entertaining the project of a total abolition of church-rates was the alteration of the law in regard to the collection of those rates; that alteration took place in August, 1853, and yet in the year 1854 he found the noble Lord concurring with the noble Lord the Member for the City of London in a vote declaring that it would be dangerous to society to effect a total abolition of church-rates. Without entering into the merits of the question, he should take the same course as that of his right hon. Friend who had last addressed them, and vote against the introduction of the Bill.

MR. LUSHINGTON said, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had stated that the question had been taken up by several Governments. So far, however, as he knew, no Government had done so since Mr. Spring Rice had introduced his Bill in 1847. He (Mr. Lushington) should be glad of any reasonable proposal for the settlement of the question. He hoped that such a one would emanate from the Government.

Motion made, and Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the abolition of Church Rates."

The House divided:—Ayes 155; Noes 76: Majority 79.

JUVENILE CRIMINALS.

MR. ADDERLEY said, it was not his intention to bring forward that night his Motion upon the subject of reformatory schools, because he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would introduce a measure on the subject, and he had only given his notice because they had delayed to do so. But he should, as early as possible after the recess, introduce a Bill for the amendment of the Youthful Offenders Act of last Session. The amendment he should propose was nothing more than to facilitate the operation of one portion of that Act, which had not been effectually carried out—namely, the recovery from their parents of the cost of the maintenance of children at the reformatory schools. It was very important that the parents should not be relieved of the cost of maintaining their children, by their being sent there. The country was much indebted to the noble Lord at the head of the Government for the Youthful Offenders Act that was passed last year. Its provisions had been extensively acted upon, and there were now no less than twelve institutions, most of them county or other public institutions, already established, or in process of being established, under the powers of that Act of last Session. He only intended to propose two clauses, to render it more effectual; but if Her Majesty's Government would introduce a Bill, he would leave it in their hands.

FREE SCHOOLS BILL.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that having been Chairman of a Committee of inquiry into the subject of education, which sat the whole of one Session and part of another, he thought it his duty to submit a plan to the House such as, in his view, appeared consistent with the evidence taken before that Committee. If the Committee had reported in favour of any particular scheme he would not have presumed to do so; but, as they made no Report, he thought it right to ask the House to see a plan which was based upon the information there obtained. He did not propose to introduce the measure in any antagonistic spirit to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington.) He felt that their objects were at least the same. He believed that in material points, perhaps the most material, they were agreed. They were agreed that schools should be free and supported by local rates; but he thought the Bill he now asked leave to introduce would accomplish what the right hon. Baronet professed a wish to accomplish, but failed to effect, by his measure—namely, the establishing of entire local management and control in reference to the rates, and securing liberty of conscience. He was sure it would be to the advantage of the right hon. Gentleman that he should know in what those who promoted the secular scheme differed from those who promoted the plan which he had undertaken to carry through Parliament, and that it would be more convenient to see those differences in the form of a Bill than in amendments proposed on his measure during its passage through Committee. He should therefore move, without further preface, for leave to bring in a Bill to establish free schools in England and Wales.

SIR JAMES DUKE seconded the motion.

MR. MILES said, he could see no objection whatever to the introduction of this Bill. In common fairness the House ought to hear the opinions and to discuss the plans of every sect of educationists before they decided upon adopting any particular scheme.

VISCOOUNT PALMERSTON said, of course it was very desirable that all the various schemes should be laid before the House, and there could be no objection to the introduction of this Bill.

MR. WALPOLE said, he quite agreed that it was very desirable that the House should be put in possession of the different propositions made for the extension of education. There were now five schemes before them, two for Scotland, and three for this country, namely, the Government measure, the Bill of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington), and that now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, (Mr. M. Gibson). Upon the principle of these Bills it was premature as yet to pronounce an opinion; but he wished to ask the Government whether they intended to proceed with the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London on the day at present fixed for its second reading, and whether, soon after Easter, they would be prepared to state the details of the scheme upon which they thought the education of this country ought in future to be conducted?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the principle of the Bill of his noble Friend the Member for London, and of the Bill of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, was the same. The Bill of his noble Friend would not be proceeded with on the 16th of April, the day fixed, but would be proceeded with shortly after the return of the noble Lord.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, there was one omission in both of the Bills before the House of which it was proper the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) should be informed. He felt that some of the difficulties which were most in the way of those anxious to promote education might be overcome by the establishment of industrial schools; but he saw no provision either in the noble Lord's Bill or in that of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) for establishing schools of such a character. At present many parents could not be induced to send their children to school while employment could be got for them. Now if you could establish industrial schools where children could be instructed in useful occupations, as well as profitably employed, he thought this would overcome objections on the part of the parents, and could not fail to promote largely the cause of education throughout the country.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should be glad of some further explanation of the intentions of the Government. Several of the education Bills would come on before the noble Lord's (Lord J. Russell's) return, and what was to be done with them? The Bill of the hon. Member for Manchester was a secular Bill, and excluded religion; the Bill of the right hon. Member for Droitwich provided for teaching the religion of the majority. He (Mr. Hadfield) disapproved of the caricatures and hideous representations of the ignorance of the people, which had been so industriously depicted. It was not fair or honest that no mention was made of 2,300,000 children being taught religiously in the Sunday schools, by 263,000 teachers who possessed their confidence and affection.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he thought the suggestion of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir S. Northcote) as to industrial schools was deserving of attention. It was clear that some compromise must be come to by the advocates of the five Bills before the House, and, for his own part, he should be quite willing to accept of some such moderate plan as that in operation in Ireland, embracing the use of Scripture extracts in the schools.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that, with so many schemes before the House, there was danger of something like a triangular dual on the subject of education. He could not say he agreed with the principle either of the noble Lord's (Lord J. Russell's) Bill, or of the measure introduced by his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington), and he should certainly not be sorry to see the scheme of the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) in competition with the other plans before the House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that in reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Dudley (Sir S. Northcote) there was a provision in the Bill for the establishment of industrial schools.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD BROUGHAM said, that this Bill consisted, as it came from the other House, of two parts. As to one part, that which abolished prospectively all proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts for slander and defamation — there could be no doubt. With respect to the second part—that which enabled the Ecclesiastical Courts, under certain restrictions, to liberate persons who were already imprisoned for the non-payment of costs, some difficulties had been found to exist. There was every disposition to enable Ecclesiastical Courts to liberate such persons ; but there was great difficulty in such retrospective provisions, particularly where the private interests of individuals were concerned. But it appeared to those who had considered this matter, that the Act which was framed in the year 1840, by his learned friend Dr. Lushington, to give to the Judicial Committee, and to the Judges of the Ecclesiastical Courts, power, under certain restrictions, of dealing with the cases of those persons who had been sentenced, and who had afterwards been detained in prison for the non-payment of costs, might be extended so as to apply to the class of cases he now contemplated. The provisions of that Act applied chiefly to church-rate cases ; but they might, he thought, be very well extended to cases of slander and defamation. He thought, and those who assisted him, that they might be able, before the third reading of the Bill, to frame some clause instead of the second of this Bill, to which, as it now stood, he had a great objection ; but it did not appear a hopeless task so to modify the clause as to make it entirely unobjectionable. One of the most venerable ornaments of the Church, the Chancellor of the diocese of Carlisle, had written to say that he suffered severely from the pressure of the present law. It often happened that a woman in some brawl, possibly a squabble in an alehouse, was overheard, unhappily, by some practitioner of the law to use defamatory expressions ; and a suit was instantly commenced, undeniably for the purpose of obtaining costs. The poor woman paid a little, and being unable to pay the rest, she went to prison, and was imprisoned for a long time. The Chancellor justly observed that it was very painful to him to be put in a position where he had no choice allowed him ; he must pronounce sentence, and order the payment of costs, and then the commitment for non-payment. He (Lord Brougham) did hope, therefore, some means would be devised of relieving, not only the parties against whom the suits were instituted, but such excellent persons as the Chancellor of the diocese of Carlisle, from being subject to those malpractices. There could be no doubt that, prospectively, such jurisdiction ought to be taken from the Ecclesiastical Courts ; but with respect to the case of Charlotte Jones, a woman who had been incarcerated for a long period under such a sentence, he (Lord Brougham) might be allowed to remind their Lordships that, in presenting her petition the other day, he made no allusion whatever reflecting on the Ecclesiastical Court which had pronounced that sentence, and to which the same remark would apply as he had just used with reference to the Chancellor of the diocese of Carlisle—that they were passive in the matter, and could not act otherwise than as they did. It had gone forth, however, that some remarks were made against the particular court by which she was sentenced, whereas the contrary was the fact ; and in the other House of Parliament, when this Bill was brought forward by his learned Friend (Dr. Phillimore), the case of Charlotte Jones was never mentioned. The Chancellor of that diocese, Dr. Williams, was, he understood, one of the most respectable members of the Church, and had been for thirty-five years in high ecclesiastical office ; and during the whole of that time there had not only been no appeal against, but no exception taken to any of his proceedings.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would bear witness that not a word fell from the noble and learned Lord reflecting on the tribunal which had committed Charlotte Jones, which had only done what it was bound to do, and could have done nothing else. But, with regard to the difficulty suggested of a retrospective remedy, it would be better to strike out the second clause of this Bill.

LORD BROUGHAM consented that the clause should be struck out, in order to its being amended in the next stage.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that in the Court of Chancery, when a person had been discharged from his utter contempt of court, and was only in custody for contempt in not paying the costs, those costs were now, by a measure which he (Lord St. Leonards) introduced for that purpose, made a subject for the Insolvent Court; and, therefore, a person might always get out of prison, and discharge himself of any amount of costs under the Insolvency Act. It would not be unreasonable to adopt a similar arrangement with respect to the costs of suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts, but as their jurisdiction of slander and defamation was intended to be abolished, he should not object to give power to the Judge of the Ecclesiastical Court to mitigate, in certain circumstances, the costs incurred by persons on whom sentence had been already passed. Undoubtedly the case of Charlotte Jones was one of those to which relief would so be given; but he believed there never was a case that was less entitled to their Lordships' attention; because in that case, he was informed, six months were allowed to elapse before any proceedings were taken to recover the costs, and every reasonable proposition was then made to spare her; but some persons were determined to be made martyrs, and so a great outcry was raised about that particular case—which, indeed, as well as others, he desired should have the benefit of this Bill. The noble and learned Lord then said that he hoped to receive any assurance from the noble Lord on the woolsack that the Government would be prepared this Session with a solution of that difficult, but most important, question, the transfer of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. He hoped the Government would not proceed with this Bill until every other part of the subject had been fairly brought before the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the subject was proposed to be dealt with in a series of Bills, one of which, the Bill for providing an improved jurisdiction in testamentary cases, would be introduced by the Solicitor General in the other House that evening. Among the other measures which would be brought in were a Bill dealing with divorce cases, and a Bill for the amendment of clergy discipline. But substantially the whole subject of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts would be before Parliament at one and the same time.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER expressed his satisfaction at the prospect of legislation upon this matter, and acknowledged that cases of defamation generally were exceedingly unfit for an Ecclesiastical Court; but there were certain exceptional cases in which defamatory words were alleged to have been spoken by one clergyman against another; and his Lordship referred to a very recent case of that character, and to state his apprehension lest, in some instances, where the defamatory words that were spoken could not be made the subject of any civil action, and were injurious more especially to the plaintiff in his ministerial and spiritual character, no remedy should be left by this Bill.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he would recommend the suggestions of the right rev. Prelate to the consideration of their Lordships and the Government during the interval that must elapse before the Bill should pass through its next stage.

An Amendment made.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

LORD BROUGHAM rose to call the attention of the House to the Resolutions he had laid upon the table, and to the adjourned debate of the 23rd and 26th instant, in reference to Criminal Procedure. The more he considered the subject the more he remained of opinion that the course to be taken was the one he had then glanced at—to ask for a Commission to consider the whole subject. It had been found that this course of proceeding had been successful in 1828. In the statement which he then made it appeared that there were ninety-five grave defects in our law; that of these ninety-five no less than eighty referred, not to the law itself, but to the procedure and administration of that law. A Commission was issued, and of these eighty, sixty had since been removed. He was thus encouraged to ask the House to adopt the same course now with respect to the criminal law which had then been taken as to the civil, and he hoped that his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, with Her Majesty's other Ministers, would consider in the holidays the expediency of issuing a Commission to examine the whole of this important subject—for the manner in which the law was administered was even of more importance than the law itself. He knew, from communications which had reached him within the last week or ten days, that the deepest and most general interest was felt in these discussions, and in the proposed amendments of the law. There were one or two of the eighteen Resolutions he had laid before the House on Friday last—the second and the twelfth of them—as to which there was, some hesitation on the part of persons in whose judgment he was disposed to place the most implicit confidence, and which he, therefore, proposed to withdraw for the purpose of modifying them. It had been apprehended that the second Resolution pointed to excluding the local authorities; it did not so point; but he should add words to make that clear. Then it had been suggested that the mere repayment of costs to a poor person who had been improperly arrested, tried, and acquitted was not a satisfactory compensation; the great difficulty was for the prisoner, however innocent, to defray the expense of procuring the attendance of witnesses. He (Lord Brougham) should, therefore, add a sentence to the twelfth Resolution to enable the committing magistrate in such a case to certify what witnesses for the prisoner should be brought to the place of trial at the public expense. There was another very important and delicate subject which had been pressed on his attention—the unanimity of jurors in criminal cases. An important improvement in civil cases was proposed last Session in the Common Law Procedure Act, and carried through the House of Lords; but, unhappily, the clause was rejected by the other House—he meant that clause which would have enabled the Judge to take the verdict of ten jurors, if two obstinately held out. The rejection of that useful clause as applicable to civil cases was a great loss; but he should pause long before he could propose the extension of the same principle to criminal cases, although instances had been brought under his notice, some of which were of such a character that he hardly dared trust himself to express his feelings upon them. It was indeed extraordinary that a man, because he happened to be a member of what was called an "Anti-Punishment-of-Death Society," and happened unfortunately to be summoned on a jury, sworn to give his verdict according to the evidence and the law, should hold out and prevent the law taking its course, because its results might be contrary to his individual opinion. Nevertheless, although such things had happened—and very recently happened, in a case that was most clear and manifest, a case he would not more particularly allude to, because, right or wrong, there had been an acquittal—although such things had happened once and again, he should be slow to alter the law that required an absolute unanimity for the verdict. The subject deserved consideration, for there had certainly been an entire failure of justice. It would give him great pleasure to hear, after Easter, that the Government had determined to issue a Commission to inquire into our whole system of criminal procedure.

Moved,

"That the Resolutions moved on Friday last be amended as follows:

"In Paragraph II. after ('Government') insert ('acting as far as possible in concert with the local Authorities')."

"In Paragraph XII., at the End thereof, add ('and that the committing Magistrate should have Power to certify what Witnesses for the Prisoner should be brought to the Place of Trial at the public Expense')."

The same was agreed to.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that no one could deny that the country was deeply indebted to his noble and learned Friend for his labours in law reform and many other subjects; and he had, if it were possible, added to his reputation by his Motion on Criminal Procedure.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he desired to have more success and less reputation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, his noble and learned Friend was rather unreasonable about success, when it appeared that seventy out of ninety-five of his proposals had been carried.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that the others not yet carried were by far the most important, and were worth all that had been carried put together, except, perhaps, the County Courts and the Evidence of Parties.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it might perhaps be thought that he was exercising an undue amount of caution on the occasion, but he did not wish to commit himself or the Government with respect to the course which they would adopt in reference to the Resolutions of his noble and learned Friend: he would add, however, that it appeared to him the most practicable mode of attaining the desired results was that the subject should be inquired into by the persons most competent to form an opinion of its difficulties and advantages. He was the more unwilling to give any positive opinion upon the matter in the absence from town of his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chief Justice, who therefore could not give him the aid of his opinion and counsel. He would, however, assure his noble and learned Friend that the matter should meet with his attention during the recess.

LORD HATHERTON added his earnest recommendation to the Government for the appointment of a Commission, and expressed a wish that the Resolutions of his noble and learned Friend should be printed with the Minutes. The noble Lord added that if the matter had been brought forward after the recess, which he should have preferred, he and many other noble Lords would have been prepared to bring forward illustrations of the present state of criminal procedure, and to show that, sooner or later, there must be an alteration.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE GOVERNMENT AND THE WAR.

EARL GRANVILLE rose, pursuant to notice, to move the adjournment of the House until Monday, the 16th of April.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR interposed, and said he hoped the adjournment of the House would only be moved until Monday next, as he proposed on that day and on Tuesday to dispose of some appeal cases, in conjunction with his noble and learned friends. He would take care that on Tuesday the adjournment should take place until Monday, the 16th of April.

The noble EARL then moved—That the House be adjourned to Monday next.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: Then the House is to understand that the real adjournment of the House for purposes of public business is until Monday, the 16th of next month. [Earl GRANVILLE indicated his assent.] I think the Government have proposed an adjournment of somewhat unusual length, after a sitting during which a very small amount of public business has been transacted; and I confess I very much regret that we shall, in consequence, probably be detained a week longer in town at the end of the Session, attempting to transact public business at a time when, as we know, it is remarkably ill transacted. But, at any rate, this adjournment constitutes a break in the Session, and I think it will not be inconvenient that we should take this opportunity of looking back a little, of looking also at our present position, and at the same time looking forward; though the latter operation is one, I am afraid, which is very rarely performed. It so happens that we are now exactly at the termination of the first year of the war, and it may, therefore, be convenient that we should consider how we stood at the beginning of the war, and what we have as yet done. Now, at the beginning of this war, a year ago, we had a very strong Government—we had a very fine army. We have since lost half that army—we have also lost half that Government. I am not quite sure whether some persons may not think that the Government, having been deprived of half its numbers, has not increased its strength. I will not pronounce any opinion upon that subject. But at all events it is certain that whatever may have been the increase of strength to the Cabinet, their strength in Parliament has materially diminished; and instead of having a very strong Government to prosecute the war, we have now a very weak one. But further, we had a year ago a confiding Parliament and an enthusiastic people—we have now an inquiring House of Commons and a disappointed people. And, my Lords, are not the people justly disappointed? Were not hopes held out to them by none more than by some of the Ministers, many of which were no doubt exaggerated, but many of which might no doubt have been realised? What has been done in the war? Where are we now? We occupy, by means of our allies the Turks, Eupatoria; in conjunction with our allies the French we have occupied for the last six months twenty-five square miles of desert, in front of Sebastopol. From that position we can neither advance, nor retreat. Our officers and our soldiers have maintained their accustomed reputation—I say they have maintained it, because I will not, in derogation of the great soldiers who have preceded them, say that they have surpassed the achievements of former armies. It would be extremely difficult for them to do so. But, notwithstanding the reputation which has been undoubtedly obtained individually by both soldiers and officers, it is impossible for us to conceal from ourselves the fact that the reputation of this country as a military Power has been very seriously impaired. The last men in the country who believed in this reality of the war were, unfortunately, Her Majesty's Ministers, and, in consequence, due preparation was not made to meet it. Their eyes were at last opened, and with the best possible intentions, but knowing little or nothing of that which they were called upon to perform, they did everything too late and nothing well. My Lords, I apprehend that every one will admit that, in order to perform great services to the State, an army should be numerically equal to the work imposed on it—that it should be well organised—that it should be well officered, well equipped, and well commanded. But there is another thing even yet more essential to the success of military operations—and that is, that that army should be well placed. No matter how strong, no matter how well equipped, no matter how well commanded it may be, if an army be thrown into a false position, it is impossible it can obtain adequate success for the country. Now, the condition—the insuperable condition—of our expedition sent to Sebastopol was, that it should be sent without an adequate force of cavalry and without any means of moving. From the inadequacy of the cavalry the victory of Alma could not be followed up; and from the total absence of the means of movement, when the force of Prince Menschikoff was divided by the march of Lord Raglan on Balaklava, it was impossible to take advantage of that separation, and the Russian armies were again united. But a still more fatal consequence has been entailed by that want of carriage—that is that it has had a most destructive influence on the health of the army; and thus that army of ours—victorious as it has been wherever it was engaged with the enemy—within seven miles of the sea—and, therefore, I may say within seven miles of all the resources of England—yet that army has been exposed to an amount of distress unknown since the retreat of the French from Russia, and this distress has been almost equally destructive of our force. Now, I cannot be surprised that those difficulties should have been encountered; for what has been the attempt made by Her Majesty's Government? They have attempted, from a desire to do everything economically and to do everything as delicately and considerately as possible—they have attempted to carry on the war, as regards the militia, without a ballot or any substitute of a coercive character—they have attempted to carry on the war, as regards the navy, without bounty and without impressment—they have endeavoured to carry on the war without a reserve at home, and to carry on a campaign without animals. The Duke of Wellington, with just pride, declared, at the end of the Peninsular war, that with the army which he then possessed he could go anywhere and do anything. The army we have now can go nowhere and can do nothing—it can do nothing but defend its life in the position in which it is placed. But what is the effect of your system in the navy—and this was so properly brought under the consideration of your Lordships last night by my noble and gallant Friend near me (the Earl of Hardwicke)? What is the effect on the navy of the determination to carry on the war with no other resources in view than such as can be obtained by those ordinary means which are now resorted to, without either impressment or bounty? My Lords, I rejoice, with the noble Earl, to observe that the number of seamen and marines voted last year is now complete; and I think that in the course of the present year, by the ordinary method of engaging seamen, in conformity with the calculations which I formed eight or nine years ago when I was for a short time connected with the navy,—and which the experience of the past year bears out—I think that in the course of the present year the number of men now voted will be obtained, and that in all probability in successive years a force of about 6,000 or 7,000 men will, without any difficulty, and without departing from the ordinary mode of proceeding, be gradually added to our naval strength. But that amount of force which we shall have at the conclusion of the present year does not exceed one half of the force which we obtained during the last war; and I must say, whatever may be the expectations of those who are now sending out a magnificent fleet to the Baltic—I must say (and I think it right to say it, because I feel convinced upon the subject) that that fleet is not of sufficient strength. I understand that twenty sail of the line, all screw-ships, are to be employed in that service, with a proportionate number of smaller vessels. Now, if we had any just reason to expect that that force would be increased, as our force in the Baltic was increased last year, by six or seven sail of the line belonging to our ally the Emperor of the French, I should think that that force would be sufficient, provided we could rely upon that assistance at an early period of the campaign, and provided it could be continued to us throughout the operations. But it must be recollect that even last year two or three months elapsed before the French ships joined us, and that they left the Baltic six weeks or two months before our vessels; and looking to the great demands at the present moment for transport in the French navy and the French service generally, I certainly do not anticipate that more than one vessel of the line of his Imperial Majesty will join the British fleet in the Baltic during the present season. Of this, at least, I am quite certain, that to us it is of such vital importance to maintain a supremacy in the Baltic, that we ought not to run the smallest risk in that quarter, and that we ought to have a force of our own on which we could entirely depend under all circumstances. Now, a force of twenty sail of the line, with accompanying small vessels, is no doubt a very powerful force, and might do very great things against the enemy. But your Lordships must recollect that the force of the enemy consists of thirty sail of the line, and that we have every reason to suppose that many screw-vessels have been added to it during the last autumn and winter. And however I may rely on the strength of British ships, or the gallantry of the seamen by whom those ships will be manned, and the ability of the officers by whom they are commanded, I do not think that we should be justified in fighting any doubtful battle, or any battle in which we might not reasonably expect a decisive victory. I do not think it would be safe to trust the great interests we have at stake to a fleet of the extent only of that which we are sending to the Baltic. In my opinion—and I know it is the opinion of many naval officers capable of forming a correct judgment—our fleet should consist, not of twenty, but of twenty-five sail of the line; and I must say, that, in addition to that, I think it is absolutely necessary that there should be a reserve of at least five sail of the line at Portsmouth, and five more at Plymouth. I am unwilling to allude more particularly to circumstances which are now in my mind; but you may depend upon it, that if you desire to carry on this war undisturbed by any diversion, or any description whatever of apprehension or anxiety, you should be strong everywhere, and make it clear that it is not safe to incur your hostility. The reason why I now specially press this matter on the attention of Her Majesty's Government and of the House is that we have no reserve at home. At the very end of the last war we had 60,000 regulars and 60,000 militiamen in this country. What is our force now? We have nothing behind that fleet in the Baltic. If by the accidents of war, or the yet greater accidents of the weather—and let it be remembered that during our last service in the Baltic the fleet was for a very considerable period in a fog in the most imminent danger—in a danger which might have been fatal to one-half of the vessels—if by any of those accidents our fleets should sustain any serious loss, we have, I am sorry to say, at present nothing in England which could give sufficient protection to our shores. But observe the effect of our military institutions on the actual strength of our army. Can any one who looks at its present strength—who looks at our militia, at the progress of enlistment, at the progress of all our military institutions—can any one reasonably expect that in the course of this year, or of several following years, it will be in the power of this country to maintain in the field an army of a larger effective force than 30,000 men? But if we can do no more than that—and I do not believe that we can with our present military institutions—we shall be able to do just twice as much as the little State of Sardinia. I think these are matters for very serious reflection on the part of Parliament and of Her Majesty's Ministers; and the more so because it is impossible for me to disconnect the consideration of our actual military and naval position from the consideration of those negotiations which are now in progress at Vienna, and of which we shall soon learn the result. Consider, my Lords, what was the cause of this war. The cause of it was the occupation of the Principalities by the armies of Russia. That led Turkey to declare war; and we very properly came forward to protect Turkey against the consequences of the irruption of the Russians, who were so much superior in force. But the Principalities were evacuated; they were evacuated in consequence of the treaty between Austria and Turkey. There can be no doubt that at the present moment we should be able to obtain all the securities which could be obtained by treaty against the reoccupation of the Principalities, the occupation of which was the cause of the war. There appeared to be little doubt that we should be able to obtain at the present moment all the securities which could be obtained by treaty for the free navigation of the Danube. We could, in like manner, obtain all the securities which a treaty could give for the protection of the Greek subjects of the Porte without any offensive intervention of Russia as their sole protectress. Not only, I apprehend, could we obtain these things now, but we might have obtained them at a much earlier period. But what did we do? We sent an army to Varna, to "give the hand to Austria"—these were the expressions of my noble Friend at the head of the late Government. But as soon as Austria was preparing to rest on that hand we withdrew it, and we sent our troops, for views of our own, to Sebastopol. Could any reasonable man have doubted what the consequence of that measure would be—namely, that Austria, alarmed for her position, would act with extreme caution, and even with timidity? She was in a position of positive danger on the Pruth, where she was left alone when the army on whose presence she depended had gone from Varna to Sebastopol. But, besides that, by sending that army to Sebastopol, you added a new element of difficulty to all the future negotiations for peace. You introduced the question of military honour, which is infinitely more difficult to deal with than any question of policy; and, if I mistake not, the main practical difficulty which now presents itself, is one of military honour. We went further; we said, "We must have some security against the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea." That is altogether a new demand; it is not a demand arising out of the first circumstances of the war. And in what manner do we propose to carry it into effect? The Government sent an expedition to Sebastopol as ancillary to the attainment of that object, and for the purpose, as I apprehend, of gaining some vantage ground from which you could insist upon Russia consenting to stipulations on this point. I trust that Her Majesty's Government have not demanded from Russia any concessions which might be represented by the Emperor to his people or to his army as inconsistent with their honour. My Lords, it is a most dangerous experiment to touch the honour of a military Power; and I do not think we are in a military position in front of Sebastopol which could justify us in asking the Russians to make any concessions. We are the besiegers, it is true; but we are also besieged; indeed, in some of the more recent operations, those who were originally besieged, appear rather to have the advantage. But if you could by any possibility obtain—what you now demand—any concessions or stipulations on the part of Russia, apparently tending to diminish her preponderance in the Black Sea, allow me to ask how the performance of such concessions and stipulations is to be enforced?

Have the former stipulations for the freedom of the navigation of the Danube been fulfilled? Notoriously they have not. How can you then possibly in any manner compel Russia, without entering upon a new war, to perform any stipulations into which she might enter for the practical purpose of diminishing her preponderance in the Black Sea? I think, my Lords, that any attempt to do this must be perfectly vain and futile; and I must say, that whatever our opinions may be with respect to the war, I should deeply lament that any reasonable expectation of making peace should be taken from us by the proposal on our part of terms which, even if agreed to, must practically prove abortive, and could be productive of no real benefit to us or to the rest of Europe. But since the whole attention of Her Majesty's Government, and of a large portion of Europe, appears to be directed to this single question of Sebastopol, do let us endeavour, if we can, to look at the reality of the thing, and see what its real value amounts to. Now, in a time of war, such as the war in which we are at present engaged, we know its value exactly. We have a superior naval force in the Black Sea; we are blockading Sebastopol; we are thus depriving Russia altogether of that naval preponderance which she would otherwise derive from her possession of Sebastopol. No doubt, under peculiar circumstances of weather, the whole or a portion of the fleet at Sebastopol might sally forth, as it did at Sinope, and strike against its enemies a serious blow; but it could do nothing whatever which would exercise any material effect on the results of the war. It could strike, at an enormous risk to itself, a blow, which might be productive of some embarrassment; but, practically, the fleet in Sebastopol and Sebastopol itself are nullified by our naval preponderance in the Black Sea during the present war. Let us suppose that we took Sebastopol, destroyed it, and then left it. In a very few years it would become again exactly the same as it is now. We could not by any possibility impose on a great Power like Russia the terms which the Romans imposed on the Carthaginians, and prevent their return to it. She would never consent to submit to such humiliation; and if she did, such terms would never be fulfilled. Therefore, to take and destroy Sebastopol would only give us during the war an advantage of a temporary character, of which we can exactly measure the value, because it is the value of the ships which we now employ in blockading that port. Suppose, however, that you not merely take it, but tried to keep it. That would certainly be a very different object. But observe how far that would carry us. Remember that you cannot retain Sebastopol alone—you must go a good deal further. It would be impossible for you always to maintain 100,000 men in the Crimea for the purpose of preventing the Russians from re-occupying Sebastopol to the detriment of the Turks. You must go further—you must endeavour to raise the nations in the neighbourhood of the Crimea to form a barrier against Russia. It may seem an absurdity, but, in point of fact, you must attempt to reconstruct the kingdom of Mithridates. Such a scheme is manifestly impracticable, and must be treated accordingly. Well, then, what is the real danger from Sebastopol under these circumstances? I will assume that such a treaty could be formed, under the guarantee of all the Great Powers of Europe, as might effectually protect the Danubian Principalities from being reoccupied by Russia; but there would still remain a danger to Turkey from Sebastopol—a danger which no diminution of the Russian fleet by five or ten vessels, in compliance with the stipulations of a treaty, even if those stipulations were maintained, could prevent—the danger that Russia, embarking some 40,000 or 50,000 men, not in men of war only, but in the mercantile navy collected at Odessa and the other ports of the Black Sea, which, under the convoy of her ships of war, might move down upon Bourgas or the mouth of the Bosphorus, and emperil, even at the commencement of a war, the very existence of Turkey. At the commencement of a war the danger would no doubt be then very great, and the terror of Turkey, even in time of peace, would be very considerable, knowing, as she must do, that she might at any hour become the object of an attack that might be fatal to her. It is against that danger that you are to guard; and though you may diminish the Russian fleet, yet while you leave Odessa and her commercial fleet unmolested you do not guard against such a contingency. Depend upon it, there is but one mode of guarding against it. You cannot nullify to Russia the value of her position; but you can profit by the position of your own ally in the Bosphorus and at Constantinople; and your only security is in creating another Sebastopol in the Bosphorus, and in giving to Turkey an army with which she might, behind strong fortifications, fight her own battles, and defend herself until Europe could come to the rescue. My Lords, I have thought it right—deeply impressed as I am with the truth of what I have been stating—I have thought it right to take this, the last opportunity before the recess, of making this statement, and of expressing my most earnest hope that no demand may have been made on Russia inconsistent with the honour of the Russian army and of her people—that no demand may have been made of her which, even if agreed to, it would be difficult or impossible to enforce, and which, even if enforced, would, under the actual circumstances of the case, truly considered and weighed, not yield us the security that is required.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not mean to reply at any length to the remarks of the noble Earl. I will observe, in the first place, that the noble Earl, in making the remarks which he has thought it necessary to offer upon the policy of the war, has said that the adjournment for a fortnight, which is now proposed, is too long. Now, I can only say that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), under whom a very short time ago the noble Earl was ready to act, has expressed to me his entire approval of the period selected for the present adjournment. Moreover, making every allowance for the ability and eloquence always displayed by the noble Earl in addressing your Lordships, and giving credit to the noble Earl for having frequently made useful suggestions to the Government and this House, yet, balancing the advantages and disadvantages arising to the public service from the speeches he has delivered in the course of this year, I cannot believe that that service would suffer much, though the noble Earl should not have the opportunity of addressing the House for another month instead of another fortnight, though your Lordships would no doubt, in that case, be longer deprived of many a great intellectual pleasure. The noble Earl alluded at some length to the state of our foreign relations. Now, my Lords, if there could be one fortnight during which more than any other it would be most objectionable to drag the Government into a debate on foreign affairs, it would be the fortnight now ensuing; and I cannot help thinking that those of your Lordships who have listened to the noble Earl's address must have felt that any Member of the Government would display an egregious want of a due sense of public duty if he were to follow him into the discussions he has raised at this particular juncture. To two points, however, in the noble Earl's speech, I must refer. In the first place, the noble Earl says that we sent an army to Sebastopol to promote our own particular objects. Now, my Lords, I am unable to explain the meaning of that phrase, but I do most confidently deny that in any one single step which we have taken during this war we have been actuated by any desire to serve any object in which this country may be supposed to have any undivided interest. The noble Earl also referred to the deficiency in our naval preparations with regard to the Baltic, and he gave an account very much differing from that which we have received from the French Government as to the assistance which they would be able to give us in that quarter. I do not wish to make any prophecy in opposition to the prophecy in which the noble Earl has indulged as to the number of ships which will be despatched by our Allies; but when the noble Earl declares that our own force is insufficient, I must say, with great deference to the noble Earl's superior information, that I do believe that such is not the case. The advanced squadron, formed entirely of steamers to the number of ten, has already sailed; and looking to the force which is now ready to sail under Admiral Dundas—seven ships of the line, eight frigates, eight gunboats, all either paddle steamers or screws—and looking, moreover, to the number of vessels of various descriptions which can be added in a very short time indeed—I believe that not less than 104 pendants would be ready for prosecuting the Baltic expedition at a moment's warning—I do maintain that, be the armament of Russia what it may—be it thirty ships of the line, even with the addition of some screws—it would be entirely undervaluing our own forces to say that they are insufficient for the campaign. I am unable to go into details with regard to the army; but I entirely deny that we have lost our military prestige in Europe to that degree which the noble Earl has attempted to make out. It is a gross exaggeration to say that our disasters in the Crimea are exactly parallel to those with which the army of Napoleon was visited in the expedition to Moscow. No doubt there have been disasters, there have been great losses and great sufferings; but when the noble

Earl himself acknowledges that our officers and our men have shown themselves equal, if not superior, to those who have in past times upheld the glory and the honour of England upon the battle field—and when the losses, great as they are, will be very shortly made up, if they are not made up at the present moment—when we remember, moreover, that after having effected the most extraordinary landing which has ever taken place, and fought three battles, each one of which has shown the almost invincibility of our troops, we hold at this moment an impregnable position in the enemy's country—I do say it is conveying an unjust and unfair notion of our strength to the people of this country, and to our friends and allies abroad, to use such language as that which has just fallen from the noble Earl. It is notorious to us all that our army is increasing every day in health and in numbers, and, what is quite as important, that it is in the highest possible spirits; and I do believe, notwithstanding what has fallen from the noble Earl, that it is now equal to any service which it may immediately be called on to perform. The noble Earl alluded to the weakness of the Government, and he expressed his regret that the country, instead of having a strong, was unfortunate enough to possess a weak Government. No one can regret more than I do that we have lost some of those eminent men whose co-operation the colleagues of the noble Earl not long since—when they were endeavouring to form a Government—were so anxious to obtain; but, although those distinguished individuals have seceded from the Government, we have not lost all courage on that account, and we feel convinced, relying on the honesty of our intentions, that we shall be supported by the country in the measures we may feel called upon to take. What has lately occurred in the House of Commons—the divisions which have lately taken place there—clearly demonstrate that that House is not disinclined to give to Her Majesty's Ministers a fair support. Looking, too, at the elections which have lately been held—looking to the fact, that in every instance where a Member of the Government has had to appeal to his constituents, he has either been returned without opposition or by an overwhelming majority—and, looking to the change which has recently taken place in the feelings of the inhabitants of one of the chief commercial towns of the kingdom—I mean Liverpool—these, coupled with the facts to which I have just referred, are, I think, sufficient to prove that the people at large are desirous that the House of Commons should continue to give their support to Her Majesty's Ministers in their endeavours to bring the present contest to a safe and honourable conclusion. If we continue to obtain that Report, I think, without going into details, that I can assure the House on the part of my colleagues that, while on the one hand they will show no want of moderation, they will upon the other do everything which lies in their power to maintain the interests, the honour, and the military reputation of this country.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, had it not been for some very strong observations which have fallen from the noble Earl who has just sat down in reference to the speech of the noble Earl who commenced this discussion, I should certainly not have intruded myself upon your Lordships' attention on this occasion. The President of the Council evidently wished by his observations strongly to impress upon your Lordships that the noble Earl near me (the Earl of Ellenborough) great as is his eloquence, and great as is his experience in military matters, has taken an undue and unseasonable opportunity of laying his views before your Lordships, and that, agreeable as it may have been to your Lordships to listen to his speech, yet, on the whole, he has taken a course likely to be detrimental to the public service. I entirely disagree with the noble Earl in that opinion, and I think your Lordships must think with me, when you remember the different occasions on which the noble Earl has given his advice to this House and to the Government with reference to the conduct of the war in which we are involved—advice which, unhappily, was not attended to by Her Majesty's Ministers, and which, if it had been acted upon, would, I have no doubt, have been productive of the most beneficial results. Two prominent cases occur to me at this moment, though, no doubt, were I to ransack my memory, I could cite many more. The first instance was, when the late Government and half the present advisers of Her Majesty appeared to be convinced that war was impossible. Acting on that real or assumed impression, the Government, with a wanton liberality which has never been explained, proceeded to reduce the taxation of the country, commencing with the soap duty which brought into the Exchequer 1,200,000*l.* The noble Earl above on that occasion warned the Government most solemnly of the inexpediency of what they were about, and entreated them to pause in the course they were pursuing. The Government, however, appeared to think they were wiser than the noble Earl; characterised his sentiments as detrimental to the public service, reduced the tax in question—and, I must certainly say, that I cannot congratulate them upon the result. The second occasion on which the noble Earl gave his advice to Her Majesty's Ministers was, when the noble Earl warned them that they had not calculated sufficiently upon the necessity of having an enormous number of animals for the land transport service in carrying on a foreign campaign. The Government neglected that advice also, and almost all the misfortunes of the army may be traced to the defects of that land transport service and the total disregard of the Government of the points in relation to it to which the noble Earl had called their attention. So much for the observations which fell from the noble Earl the President of the Council—observations which I regret to have heard the more because they imply that the Government still continue to undervalue the advice of the noble Earl, the disregard of which upon a former occasion has in no small degree contributed to those disasters which have caused us all so much pain. The Lord President complains that he cannot understand the noble Earl's meaning when he said that we had gone to the Crimea, for our own objects; but to me it appears to be perfectly clear. What I understood the noble Earl to mean was this—that England and France and Austria were not of the same mind upon that subject; in fact, that, as was stated in one of the despatches which have appeared in the public press upon the question, Austria had declared that she washed her hands entirely of that invasion, that she disapproved it altogether, and that, therefore, when we went to the Crimea it was our own policy which took us there, and not the policy of Austria. The Lord President objects to the comparison which was made by my noble Friend between the disasters which have occurred to our army and those which were endured by the French troops in their retreat from Moscow in the year 1812. Now, I can hardly conceive the existence between any two positions of an analogy more complete.

Earl Granville

Both armies invaded the same country with all its formidable powers of passive resistance and its climate, which upon foreigners acts so injuriously. The French army appeared before Moscow, ours is stationed in front of Sebastopol. The Russians are resisting its attacks with the same courage and determination, with the same national pride, as they resisted the onward march of the French army in the year 1812; and who came to their assistance? not their own army—not a foreign ally. In that year their climate came to the assistance of the Russian forces, and now again we have lost a large number of our soldiers through its agency. I do not mean to say that the climate has been the main cause of the disasters which we have so much to deplore; it has only been the immediate cause. Behind lie the mismanagement and the want of foresight of Her Majesty's Government in not providing against the calamities which unhappily have occurred. The analogy between the present campaign and that of 1812 still remains in full force. You have attacked the same power that Napoleon then attacked, with inadequate resources, and the result has been that half your army has been sacrificed. The analogy between the two events is, in my opinion, complete. The noble Earl appears to think that the present is a most inopportune moment for any Peer to rise in this House to give expression to his sentiments with reference to the occurrences which have taken place, or which may take place, in connection with the momentous subject of the war. But, my Lords, if we are to be tongue-tied upon that great question, as well as with regard to the negotiations now in progress at Vienna, I should wish to know what can be the use of our attending in this deliberative Assembly? The Government have declared that this is not the time, nor this the Session, during the present difficult war, for proceeding with domestic legislation; which, indeed, appears to be completely in abeyance. We have, therefore, every subject of Parliamentary discussion withdrawn from us by the fiat of the Government, because they tell us that on domestic policy we must be silent and quiet, and that on foreign policy it is indecent for us to utter an opinion. Hence, for an independent Peer of Parliament there is no topic on which he can venture to give a free expression to his opinions. That, however, is a position which I think noble Lords upon this side of the House will scarcely be contented to occupy. I, for one, cannot suppose that it would be detrimental to the public service that we should offer our advice to the Government, and should draw their attention to the various important topics which in the course of a contest like that in which we are involved must arise—such as have been submitted this evening to your Lordships' consideration. Indeed, so far from making any apology for my noble Friend for drawing the attention of the House to this subject, seeing how anxious we all are at this moment for the honour of the country, and how completely the eyes of the nation are set on what is passing at Vienna and in the Crimea, I think we should be dolts, and unworthy of our position in this House, if, without at the same time any desire to embarrass the Government, we did not express our sentiments on these great subjects. I intreat the Government to believe that in what I may speak with regard to the conduct of the war, or with respect to pending negotiations, I am not influenced by an atom of party feeling; for no man is more anxious than myself—and every word I utter in this House will support my statement—to see, whoever may be Minister, the honour of the country maintained, and our commercial and naval power in the Mediterranean effectually secured for a great number of years to come. I regard the present as the most important period that has occurred in the history of this country since the year 1815, when the great Congress at Vienna met to resettle the territorial arrangements of Europe, and I hope the Government will pardon me if I ask them to be a little more circumspect now—and I use the word in its literal sense—than were our statesmen in those days, great as they were. Far be it from me to speak with the slightest disrespect of those eminent men who have departed from the scene leaving immortal names behind them; but I cannot but think they committed glaring faults—faults which were, in their case, the natural result of the position in which they were placed, but which the generation that has succeeded them, beholding them by the light of experience, cannot fail to condemn. At that time, it is evident that the great statesmen of Europe did not look around them. Their backs were turned to the East, and their faces to the West. They had one point of view only, and that was France; and they conceived that no other danger existed so long as they were secure against the invasions of that Power. The consequence was, that the security of Turkey and the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea were not attended to, and the difficulties we now experience result from that neglect. From 1815 to this time Russia, step by step, has encroached on Turkey, as is evidenced by the treaties of Akerman and Adrianople, and others equally fatal. At the time to which I have referred, so great was the dread of France—which alone appeared to be considered a dangerous Power—that the most extraordinary treaties were made to prevent any attempt at aggrandisement by that State. It is scarcely credible to the present generation that at that time we actually bound ourselves to prevent by force the French people from ever again being ruled over by the dynasty a member of which at present exercises the chief power in France. It is also almost incredible that a treaty was actually made, and remained in force up to 1852, excluding the Bonaparte family from the throne of France, and that we were bound by force of arms to maintain their exclusion. This shows the short-sightedness of all the eminent politicians of that day, and how necessary it is—not to take moral guarantees against a repetition of wars and invasions—but, as the noble Earl near me says, to obtain material guarantees which may prevent the recurrence of such events. Seeing the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary now in his place, I take the opportunity of stating that I have great confidence in his carrying on the negotiations in the spirit of the declaration he made in this House on the 19th of June last, when he said that it could not be permitted that one great Power should be constantly disturbing the peace of Europe; that the preponderance of Russia ought to be curtailed; and that the present moment was most favourable for attaining those results necessary for the perpetuation of peace, and for the security of that part of Europe, the independence of which had been so often attacked. I trust that the noble Earl will carry out the spirit of those words in the negotiations now going on, and I have not the slightest wish to embarrass him by any question whatever; but I must reassert the privilege which the noble Lord President seemed rather to deny, and which every individual Member has a right to exercise during the present or any other war, of giving his opinion and advice. [Earl GRANVILLE was here understood to explain that his remark in reference to this point ought not to be taken as general in its application.] I certainly think, then, that if advice and observations proceeding from the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough), who possesses so much eloquence and so much knowledge of the subject, were to be considered objectionable, the inference must be that scarcely any other noble Lord can be trusted to express his sentiments on the same matters during the war or the negotiations. But I think the noble Lord President would not be supported in such a notion by his colleagues. There can be no inconvenience or danger in the remarks of the noble Earl who began this debate, and I trust that I have equally avoided saying anything that could produce inconvenience. I can only repeat my earnest hope that the noble Foreign Secretary will, throughout these negotiations, if they continue, and, if they fail, then throughout the war, carry out the spirit of the declaration which he made amid the cheers of your Lordships assembled in this House.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the noble Earl who had just sat down appeared to have changed his opinion in reference to the speech of the noble Earl; for he (the Duke of Argyll) recollects that during last Session, the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) made some observations which were excessively snubbed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough), and the noble Earl who last spoke then observed that no man was less entitled to give a rebuke, as no man made so many impertinent speeches as the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough).

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he did not make use of the word "impertinent," and he did not think the noble Duke's observations in good taste at the present moment. At all events, if they were in good taste, they were not correct. What he did say on the occasion alluded to was, that he thought the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) had hardly treated him fairly in calling him to order for asking a question on a subject relating to the war, inasmuch as the noble Earl himself had made frequent speeches on the same subject. He never said that the noble Earl's speeches were impertinent or useless to the country.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH assured their Lordships that what had passed on the occasion alluded to had entirely left his recollection, but he did not think that a matter of that kind occurring accidentally in debate, having no bearing on any matter of public importance, should afterwards be reintroduced into their discussions.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had made the remark which had fallen from him merely in a spirit of good-humoured reply to some observations of the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury), and without the intention of giving any offence; but the noble Earl mistook the ground of the objection urged to the observations of the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough). It was not because they referred to current events, but it was on account of the peculiar character of those observations. He (the Duke of Argyll) was ignorant of the specific object for which those observations were made. It was true that one specific suggestion had been made, and that was that the Turks should fortify the Bosphorus; but the first observation was a complaint that a Government that had been strong was now weak. Now, the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) at the beginning of the Session said, that nothing could be worse than the Government as it then existed for the prosecution of the war, and he described it only as being something above the level of mediocrity. Perhaps the noble Earl would prefer a Government below mediocrity, with only one or two of its heads above that level. The noble Earl had referred to the position of our army, and said that it ought always to be placed in a position in which it would be able to do its work. That observation involved the whole question of the policy of our invading the Crimea. Now, he submitted to their Lordships that it was impossible to discuss the policy of that measure in a few pithy oratorical sentences. But the noble Earl went on to say—and he confessed he saw no use in the observation, even if it were true, though he did not believe that it was true—that our army at Sebastopol was in such a position that it could go nowhere and could do nothing. He could see no practical benefit in such observations, which, coming from an authority on military matters like the noble Earl, would go forth to Europe and have a certain amount of influence that could only be prejudicial to the interests which the noble Earl professed to serve. The noble Earl must be perfectly aware that, although it was undoubtedly and unfortunately true that that army had suffered from the want of the means of transport, under circumstances which were more or less susceptible of explanation, yet a plan had been sketched out by his noble Friend, the Minister of War, for providing that army with ample means of transport in future. Those means would be speedily adopted, and there was every reason to believe that there would soon be an army in the Crimea that would be able to go somewhere and be capable of doing something. He confessed he agreed with his noble Friend (Earl Granville) in attaching much more serious importance to those observations which fell from the noble Earl, as regarded the policy of the expedition to the Crimea, when the noble Earl described that policy as having been dictated by selfish interests on the part of England.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: What I said was, that our object in sending out that expedition was one in common with that of France, but that it was not in common with Austria. While making that remark, I more especially had in mind what fell from the Foreign Minister when he made an explanation on the subject on a former occasion.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL denied most emphatically that the expedition to the Crimea was a matter of no consequence to Austria. His belief was that in the negotiations now pending the interests of all the allied Powers were inseparably bound together; and that it was impossible to maintain the integrity of the Turkish empire, to secure the free navigation of the Danube, and release the two Danubian provinces, which was essential to the independence and integrity of Turkey, without insisting upon the third point, namely, the putting an end to the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea. That, no doubt, was a matter open to argument; but it could not be laid down by the noble Earl, even upon his high authority, as a dictum, that upon that point England and France had a separate policy from the policy of the rest of Europe, and more especially of Austria and Prussia. He confessed he was not able to understand the general drift of the speech of the noble Earl tonight, when he compared it with other speeches made by the noble Earl on the same subject. He remembered the noble Earl saying last year—and he was not sure the noble Earl had not repeated it this year—that this was emphatically “a statesman’s war.” He (the Duke of Argyll) did not quite understand what the noble Earl meant by that expression. If the noble Earl meant that it was a war which was not sympathised in by the enthusiastic feelings of the people, then he certainly was wrong. But if the noble Earl meant that it was a war waged for great objects, which only great statesmen were able to appreciate, then he should like to know what those great objects were? The noble Earl had condemned the expedition to Sebastopol, and seemed much inclined to believe that, when the immediate and primary cause of the war was removed by the evacuation of the Principalities, the Western Powers ought to have been satisfied. If that was the noble Earl's definition of a "statesman's war," he could only say that he could not concur with him. How could the great objects of the war be accomplished if Russia was to remain in undisturbed possession of the Black Sea? If the noble Earl thought that any result short of that ought to satisfy the view of a statesman, he (the Duke of Argyll) could not agree with him. And how could the noble Earl now advocate the abandonment of the Crimea, when he had heard the noble Earl on previous occasions argue that this war was one in which our Indian empire was threatened, and for the defence of that empire he in part sketched a plan for the invasion of Central Asia, of Georgia, and of Persia, having for its object great territorial changes, altogether with a view to the especial interests of this kingdom and the preservation of its power in India. He must confess, therefore, when he bore in mind these various speeches of the noble Earl he could not quite reconcile their general drift with the drift of the speech which he had made that night. It really appeared to him that the present speech of the noble Earl, as well as former speeches which he had delivered on the same subject, had been made for the sake of making a speech without any very specific object, and certainly without presenting to the Government or the House any very new or statesmanlike suggestion, either as to the mode of carrying on the war or as to the objects for which that war ought to be carried on.

LORD COLCHESTER said, that the noble Duke had not correctly represented what had fallen from the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) on a former occasion. It was not for the purpose of protecting our Indian empire, but to harass Russia that the noble Earl advocated our seeking the aid of Persia and other Asiatic States. What the noble Earl did say was, that if we did intend to carry on the war successfully we must not revolutionise States, but must enlist in our behalf the sympathies of existing States, such as Persia and other Asiatic nations. With regard to the objection that had been raised to discussing the negotiations while they were yet pending, of what use could it be to comment upon them after they were closed, when it would be too late to make alterations?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL explained that what he said was, that the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) expressed himself the other night in favour of enlarging the circle of the war towards the East, whereas, to-night, he complained of the late Government enlarging the circle of the war towards the East by the expedition to the Crimea.

LORD ABINGER said, that if there was any want of confidence on the part of the public, it was owing to the want of publicity as to the reasons on which the measures had been taken. The Government had never yet made a statement of the military reasons upon which the expedition to the Crimea had been undertaken. He believed the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) during the time he held the office of Minister of War was greatly in want of military counsel, and he could assure their Lordships it was the general feeling of the public that the Government proceeded without due military advice in the prosecution of military projects. It merely happened that the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) had expressed better than any one else what every one felt, when he intimated doubts of the importance of Sebastopol to the main object of the war, the defence of the Sultan—and there were many persons in England who concurred with him in thinking that, even if we possessed the Crimea, it would not give a stronger military position than fortified lines on the Bosphorus. He very much feared military advice was not sought by the Government. They were about to send a large force of cavalry to the Crimea, consisting of raw troops and young horses; whereas, if the Government condescended to consult military authorities, they would find such troops would not aid in the prosecution of the war, and that no general could rely upon them. The difficulty in which they were placed had been brought on by not having a proper basis of operations. The only basis was the harbour of Balaklava, and, consequently, they had failed to support the troops. They might succeed in the endeavour to take Sebastopol, but they could only succeed by sending large reinforcements, and by making efforts almost superhuman, equalising the efforts which were being made by the Russians.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I do not like to trouble your Lordships on a matter so entirely personal as the supposed discrepancy between one speech and another; but, as the noble Duke seems to attach so much importance to it, I must call the attention of the noble Earl the President of the Council to the fact that I always objected to the expedition to Sebastopol. I always felt so strongly on that subject that when I heard it talked of, being in the country after the cessation of Parliamentary duties, I wrote two papers containing my opinion, elaborately worked out, against that expedition to Sebastopol, and forwarded them to the Government. But that expedition having been undertaken, I said, in a speech to which the noble Duke has referred, some weeks ago, that the course which the Government was pursuing was not the course which would lead to success; that the expedition could not succeed if it was allowed to proceed against the whole military strength of Russia at that one point to which Russia could bring her troops by land with every means of movement, to be met by troops which could only be sent by sea, with deficient means of transport and deficient means of conveying cavalry. What I said was, that to make the expedition successful, the operations should be pressed against Russia on both flanks, both on the Pruth and in Asia. There is no discrepancy in that. I always objected to the expedition to Sebastopol; but since it had been undertaken, I took the liberty of suggesting, in the manner here stated—the only manner in which I thought it probable it would obtain success.

House adjourned accordingly to Monday next.

H O U S E O F C O M M O N S,
Friday, March 30, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Liverpool, Joseph Christopher Ewart, esq.
NEW WAITS.—For Kilmarnock District of Burghs, v. Hon. Edward Pleydell Bouverie, Vice President of the Board of Trade; for Lewes, v. Hon. Henry Bouverie William Brand, Commissioner of the Treasury; for Cork County, v. Edmund Burke Roche, esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

THE ORDNANCE AND THE ARMY.

MR. HEYWOOD rose to ask the Clerk of the Ordnance whether any public notice had been given of a recent examination for cadetships at Woolwich, and whether, on the non-appearance of candidates, a number of commissions in the artillery had been given without any special examination in scientific subjects?

MR. MONSELL said, that, in order to meet the augmentation of artillery and engineer corps, it had been found necessary to have a number of young men older than the cadets in the public school at Woolwich generally were. For this purpose the Lieutenant General of the Ordnance had first the idea of having the same examination as for cadets rising from a junior to a senior class; but it was found that at the age of between seventeen and nineteen there were not to be found at the Universities a sufficient number of young men whose attainments in mathematics equalled those of the senior class at Woolwich; consequently he had been driven to adopt another expedient, which was to communicate with the heads of the different public schools and colleges all over the country. By this means he had selected thirty young men, who had given the greatest possible satisfaction to the Lieutenant General and the Examiners, who, indeed, had stated that they were about the best lot that had ever come under their inspection. For the future the ordinary course of examination would, so far as was practicable, be resorted to; but he could not promise that if a similar emergency arose a similar expedient might not be resorted to.

NEW COURTS OF LAW.

MR. MULLINGS asked the Chief Commissioner of Public Works and Buildings whether, having regard to the number of Judges both of law and equity, so greatly increased within the last thirty years, and that during that period no permanent courts had been provided for the additional Judges appointed, and to the want of proper accommodation for them, it was the intention of the Government to take any and what measures, and when, for providing proper buildings and accommodation for superior courts of justice in the metropolis?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, several schemes had been brought under his consideration for the purpose of removing the law courts from Westminster Hall and building new courts elsewhere; but to execute any of these schemes a very large sum of money, amounting to nearly a 1,000,000*l.* sterling, would be required. He should have much pleasure in executing such a work if funds were provided; but at present there were no funds applicable to the purpose, and at present it was not the intention of Government to ask Parliament to provide them. He had heard that some increased accommodation was required for the Vice Chancellors, but no application had been made to him by the legal authorities; nor had he received any directions from the Treasury to provide such increased accommodation.

COLONIAL EPISCOPAL APPOINTMENTS.

MR. DUNLOP asked the First Lord of the Treasury, whether—considering that by the Clergy Reserves Act, recently passed by the Legislature of Canada, and assented to by the Governor General in name of Her Majesty, it is declared in the preamble to certain of its enactments, that “it is desirable to remove all semblance of connection between Church and State,”—it was the intention of the Government to cease to maintain that connection in Canada, by no longer advising Her Majesty to nominate to vacant bishoprics in that Colony?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, no episcopal vacancy had occurred in Canada since the Act passed, and he was not aware of any decision of the Government as to any alteration of the practice which had hitherto prevailed in respect to appointments to such vacancies.

SCOTCH STATISTICS.

LORD ELCHO asked if the Government were disposed to continue the grant for the promotion of Scotch agricultural statistics?

MR. WILSON said, the measures hitherto taken had proved so successful as to encourage their continuance, and the co-operation of the Scotch farmers had been very useful. Out of 50,000 applications for information which had been sent out by the Highland Society only seventy had been unanswered—a striking contrast to the result of similar applications in this country. He hoped the example of the enlightened agriculturists of Scotland would have its due effect; and it was so creditable that the Government intended certainly to prosecute the measure, for which purpose they had certain funds in hand, for, of the 6,000*l.* voted last year 1,800*l.* remained, and the grant would probably not have to be repeated.

THE WAR—ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE SICK.

MR. G. DUNDAS said, that he desired to preface the question of which he had given notice by reading an extract from a letter received yesterday from a relative at Constantinople, for whose accuracy he could vouch. [Cries of “Order.”] The subject was of extreme importance, and he would not occupy the time of the House for more than a minute. The extract was to this effect—

“We left Balaklava a few days ago, with 330 sick on board. While we had the sick on board a steamer came in, with carcasses of mutton and vegetables, and lay alongside of us. The medical officer requested I would apply for fresh provisions for the sick. Will you believe it? I had to go through so many forms that it was twenty-four hours before I could get them from the vessel actually touching our side, and, the weather having been unusually sultry from sirocco blowing, most of the meat was not fit for use. A second application took as much longer time, for another supply; and by the time the application was in proper order the meat had been landed and buried.”

This statement sufficiently showed the importance of the inquiry he now addressed to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary at War, namely, if directions had been sent by the Government to the proper authorities in the Crimea and at Scutari to relax the system of check and countercheck, and facilitate the obtaining from the purveyors, Commissariat, and storekeepers, the provisions and necessities which the sick required?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, of course he had no knowledge of the particular case referred to; but he had no doubt it was the fact that the forms which had been established in times of peace, for the purpose of placing a check on the expenditure of the public money, had been multiplied to an extent which now interfered with the more essential object of securing the prompt supply of what was required. Instructions had, however, been issued by the Government that in matters such as the hon. Member referred to, all unnecessary forms should be dispensed with.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that he had sent out such instructions more than a year ago, particularly as regarded the hospitals at Scutari and Constantinople.

MEDICAL SERVICE IN THE CRIMEA.

Mr. BENNET inquired of the right hon. the Member for Wiltshire, whether Mr. George Pollock, assistant surgeon at St. George's Hospital, did not offer his gratuitous services to the army in the Crimea, and, if so, why his offer was not accepted? and he would put a similar question with regard to Dr. Hugh Macpherson, of the Bengal service.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT stated that, so far as he could recollect, an offer of gratuitous service was made by Mr. George Pollock and also by Mr. Macpherson. But in the case of the latter gentleman, the offer was limited to serving for three months, and it was not thought advisable to accept the offers of service for so limited a time. At the time the offers were made the rule of the army service was, that civilians should be admitted to act in the rank of assistant surgeons. Subsequently that rule was altered, and civil surgeons were offered higher rank; and, finally, it had been determined not to confer military rank at all, but to convert the hospitals into civil hospitals. Mr. G. Pollock—very properly so, looking at his position in his profession—declined to act as assistant surgeon; but had he been willing to do so, he (Mr. S. Herbert) would certainly not have been willing to accept gratuitous service from any professional gentleman who would have had to work by the side of those who were receiving pay for the discharge of their duty.

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT.

On the Motion for the adjournment of the House till Monday April 14th.

Sir JOHN PAKINGTON would take the opportunity of giving notice of a contingent Motion with regard to the extraordinary state of the Colonial Department. He would not repeat the arguments he had used on a previous occasion; but he would venture to say that every day which had elapsed since he had called the attention of the house to the subject had tended to prove the justice of what he had then said. Nothing could be more inconvenient, if not dangerous, than the present condition of the Colonial Department. The House had been told on a former occasion that, during the absence of the noble Lord the Member for London at Vienna, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department (Sir George Grey) would discharge the duties of the Colonial Office; but they had since been informed that that right hon. Gentleman had found himself unequal to the discharge of the increased duties which had devolved upon him, and that latterly the duties of the Colonial Department had been performed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Now, although it was true that one Secretary of State might act for another Secretary of State, and so far, the discharge of the duties of the Colonial Office in the absence of the noble Lord, by the Home Secretary might not be irregular, still, he did not believe that any power existed on the part of the First Lord of the Treasury to act for a Secretary of state; so that any portion of the business of the Colonial Department which had been transacted by the noble Lord at the head of the Government had been transacted in an irregular manner; and he should say that in point of form that noble Lord had no power to sign any despatches or to put his name to any official documents connected with the Colonies in the stead of the Secretary of State. The real danger, however, was that it was impossible that such a state of things could be long protracted without a feeling being created in the Colonies that their interests were being neglected. A sufficient time had not elapsed since the commencement of the present extraordinary state of things to receive expressions of opinion from the Colonies with regard to it; but it could not be denied that, if protracted, it would create great dissatisfaction, and nothing could be more unwise on the part of any Government than to take any course which could justify a feeling on the part of the Colonies that their interests were being neglected. Having, on a previous occasion expressed his opinions with regard to the subject, he should, on the present occasion not repeat those opinions, but he begged to give notice that if, when Parliament reassembled, the noble Lord the Member for London had not returned to England, or if the management of the Colonial business was not in a more satisfactory state, he should take the first day he could obtain to submit a Motion to the House, having reference to the Colonial Office.

THE ARMY IN THE EAST—REINFORCEMENTS.

SIR DE LACY EVANS wished, as Parliament was about to adjourn for some time, to make some observations with regard to the momentous events which were occurring, or were likely to occur, at the seat of war. There was one point to which he wished to direct their particular attention, namely, to the reinforcement of the army in the East. The accounts which had lately been received from the army with regard to its health and the return of invalids from the different hospitals to its ranks were very satisfactory, and must be very gratifying to the country. The condition of the army with regard to clothing and provisions had also materially improved. But still there remained much to be done. It appeared that the enemy were by no means wanting in exertions to reinforce their army, and that fresh troops were continually pouring in—perhaps, in a greater proportion than those which this country were sending to the seat of war. He knew nothing as to what reinforcements might have been sent out, except what he had seen in the public papers—but during the last month he did not perceive that any considerable amount had been embarked. He had, however, been much pleased at hearing it stated by the noble Lord at the head of the Government that recruiting was going on favourably, and he hoped that the Government would omit no effort to carry it on. He believed that it was of more importance for the Government to direct their attention to recruiting a class of men physically competent for the work of the army, than to make any extreme efforts with regard to the militia, which, in the present war, was to his mind of secondary importance, inasmuch as the prospects of invasion were most remote:—in the former war the case was very different. He therefore hoped that the increase of the regular army was the great object to which the Government was directing its attention. He did not believe that the bounty now offered was adequate for the purpose, and in a momentous contest like the present—when by liberal efforts he believed that the contest might be terminated in a limited period—it would be false economy on the part of the Government to hesitate to increase the bounty if men did not recruit in sufficient numbers. There was another point to which he also wished to direct the attention of the House. They saw that a powerful armament was about to proceed to the Baltic; and as this fact had been stated in the public papers, as a non-official person, he might, without risk, refer to preparations which it was said were being made for a Baltic campaign. They all knew that a large fleet had been sent to the Baltic last year, where, from unavoidable circumstances, it had not done much. It was generally considered that the ships of which that fleet was composed were too large for utility; but those of the fleet which it was alleged was to go there during the present year were as large. Steamships were much wanted in the Baltic Sea, and indeed, from its narrow navigation, sailing ships were even dangerous, and the number of steamers there should be as large as the naval resources of the country could command. It was also alleged in the public prints that powerful batteries, of a light draught of water, were being constructed to accompany that fleet, and he could only suppose that they were intended for the capture of some fortress in that sea. In his opinion, however, if a fortress were attacked by these batteries, captured, and then abandoned, that proceeding would not materially affect the main objects of the war; whereas those batteries would be of great use in the Euxine, where the main struggle between the European Powers and Russia was going on. He did not pretend to ask for an explanation on the subject, because the Government would probably not think it consistent with their duty to give any information, but he must say that, according to his opinion, the concentration of attack upon one particular portion of the enemy's territory and upon one particular fortress was the principle which should be constantly adopted in war. In the last European war it was, unfortunately, not so adopted, and this was probably the reason why that war had been so prolonged. At that time we carried on operations in the Colonies and in the Mediterranean, and we sent a very powerful armament to Walcheren; while, if these forces had been poured in on one point, and placed at the disposal of the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula, the Duke would have long before found his way over the Pyrenees. He hoped, therefore, that this system of making attacks upon various points, instead of concentrating our whole power, naval as well as military, upon those parts of the enemy's territory where the struggle was most vital, would not be persisted in. It was his earnest hope that every man and every horse and gun at the disposal of the Government would be sent to the seat of war with as little delay as possible. He was told there were several batteries now at Woolwich. He was not sure of this, and, indeed, should be surprised if the statement were true, because it would show, on the part of the Government, a laxity of management which he thought was highly reprehensible. These batteries, if really at Woolwich, ought to be sent out to the commander of our forces in the Crimea, where the enemy was very powerful in artillery, and possessed, probably, a greater armament than any army ever had to contend with in a siege. The authorities were very apt everywhere to keep a body of reserve in their own hands at home. He did not pretend to say that that was the case in this instance. But he remembered that at Constantinople, when the Turkish army was engaged in important operations on the Danube, he was informed by a Turkish general officer, that sixty pieces of artillery, with the horses to serve them, were retained at the capital as a kind of reserve; but as we were now engaged with an enemy who had a most powerful artillery, it should be considered whether these guns should not be sent to the army. There was, he repeated, a tendency everywhere to retain a reserve at home, which reserve would be much better employed in active service than left at some central dépôt. The hon. Member for Berwick (Mr. Scott) last evening, in his observations upon the naval operations in the Black Sea, alluded to the impropriety of our not having destroyed or occupied Odessa, and appeared to think that if that place had been occupied matters would have been in a very different position. Now, the hon. Gentleman was perhaps not aware that to make effectually the diversion he spoke of would have required a small force amounting to 100,000 men. That force was not at the disposal of the Allies, and therefore this little complaint against Admiral Dundas had no foundation whatever. He (Sir De Lacy Evans) had probably seen as much of these maritime operations as any man in that House, and he could say, as an eye-witness of those in the Black Sea, that he had never in his life seen any better conducted, and he really thought they redounded to the honour and credit of the naval commanders.

VOTES FOR THE CONSTABULARY AND ASSISTANT BARRISTERS IN IRELAND.

MR. FRENCH, in rising to call the attention of the House to the sums annually voted for Public Service in Ireland towards the payment of the constabulary force and the salaries of the assistant bar-

VOL. CXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

risters, said that, under ordinary circumstances, he should have waited until these votes came fairly before the House; but after the opinion expressed the other night by the noble Lord at the head of the Government—if opinion it could be called, prompted as the noble Lord had been by the Secretary to the Treasury—he should really like to know whether the Government adhered to the extraordinary statement which had proceeded from them? The noble Lord stated that Ireland received yearly for the payment of the constabulary, assistant barristers' salaries, and payments to Crown solicitors, 730,950*l.* It was—out police, 542,000*l.*; Crown solicitors, 16,000*l.*; assistant barristers, 32,000*l.*; total 590,000*l.* And England, for prosecutions, education in workhouses, and medical attendance, 362,000*l.* Surely this was scarcely a fair way of putting the case. Why should 100,696*l.*, voted for constabulary here, be omitted; or 100,000*l.*, for the purchase of curiosities from private collections? Why should the large sums voted for establishments in London—73,000*l.* for parks; the monies for the Chelsea embankments, bridges, &c.; the 1,300,000*l.* for palaces; the 1,250,000*l.* for harbours of refuge, be left unnoticed? But he should confine himself to the two items noticed by the noble Lord. It was correct that in 1846 the expense of the police force in Ireland was transferred from the counties to the consolidated fund. It was equally true that since that period, in this country, charges to the extent of 1,100,000*l.* had been similarly transferred from the locality to the consolidated fund, 12,000,000*l.* of taxes had been repealed in England, but in Ireland only 500,000*l.* had been removed; and while in England new taxes had been imposed to the amount of 254,000*l.* only, in Ireland the new taxation reached 730,000*l.* Why was the transfer in Ireland made by Sir Robert Peel? The transfer of the payment of the constabulary from the localities, was not a boon gratuitously or unduly given to Ireland; the change was avowedly made as a set-off for the withdrawal of those advantages which that country enjoyed under the corn laws; as a measure, the expense of which would be fully covered by a diminution to an equal extent in the Army Estimates, and as a means of rendering the constabulary force more effective for general service. What said the right hon. Baronet in 1846—

"Now in the case of Ireland, if there be any portion of the United Kingdom which is to suffer by the withdrawal of protection, I have always felt that that part of the United Kingdom is Ireland. Its capital and enterprise are almost exclusively directed to agriculture, and if, in the intended measures with regard to the burdens on land, there should appear at first sight to be any undue favour shown towards Ireland, let us bear in mind that Ireland has not the means which other parts of the United Kingdom have of employing labour in manufacturing pursuits: but, again, I propose no relief from burdens which are not accompanied with some great social advantages. At present you have a great police force in Ireland. The expense of a great portion of that force is borne by the land in Ireland, the expense of the remainder is borne by the public treasury. I believe it will be an immense advantage to place the police force directly under the control of the executive, to prevent the possibility of all interference by local bodies, to make it as perfect a system as you can, excluding all power of local nomination or local interference, taking the whole control on the executive government, and, in order that you make that control complete, paying the expenses out of the public treasury."

He (Mr. French) found it stated in the Dublin Evening Post, that this constabulary was a "complete military organisation," appointed, officered, and, of course, paid by the State. It was a force 12,000 strong, and its efficiency had enabled the Government to withdraw 14,000 or 15,000 regular troops from Ireland, which must have been paid by the national funds—and thereto had been a saving effected to the extent of 400,000*l.* a year. In 1846 there was voted for the expense of the army in Ireland, 1,200,000*l.*, in 1853 but 800,000*l.*—the difference being nearly equal to the entire cost of the constabulary. There was, therefore, no pretence for calling it a local force. When the Act was introduced these men were to be exempt from the duty of enforcing the revenue; but they now assisted in preparing statistical and agricultural returns, and in enforcing and supporting the excise laws. How, then, could this be considered an undue boon to Ireland? The vote for the assistant barristers of Ireland, the noble Lord also characterised as a local charge, and contrasted it with the system of the County Courts here, which he mentioned were no charge on the national funds, as the fees received in those courts were sufficient to discharge all expenses. Here again the noble Lord was wrong, as 13,000*l.* a year was annually voted in civil contingencies for payment of the registers of these courts. Now, in addition to the civil business transacted by those Judges, the greater portion of the criminal business was decided by them. It was deemed advisable that these assistant barristers should be no longer paid partly by salaries and partly by fees, and a large deputation of Irish Members waited upon the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Grey) and stated their reasons why they thought it desirable that a change should be made. A system of payment arising out of stamps, civil ejectment bills, was then resorted to, the result of which was that 40,000*l.* was collected, and 32,000*l.* of that sum only disbursed. Now, in the one case the State was repaid by fees, and in the other by stamps. In the case of England they did not prove a full equivalent; in that of Ireland there was a balance in favour of the State. He (Mr. French) did not ask for Ireland any exemption from taxation. The fact was that that country was unfairly taxed on the one hand, and misrepresented on the other. It had been the practice to insinuate that Ireland did not bear her fair share of the general or local taxation of the country. He would not trouble the House with any opinion of his own on that subject, but appeal to the opinion of one whose scientific acquirements, and whose calm judgment in matters of the kind, must bring weight to whatever might fall from him. Lord Rosse, on the 18th of May, 1849, showed in his "protest" that "the gross income of England was 250,000,000*l.*; ditto of Ireland, 20,000,000*l.* Revenue, 52,000,000*l.*—Proportion of England, 47,000,000*l.*; ditto of Ireland, 4,160,000*l.* Ireland paid upwards of 5,000,000*l.*, and since then the income tax to the amount of 500,000*l.* had been added to her taxation. With regard to local taxation, it was shown that Great Britain pays 12,000,000*l.* on property rated at 105,000,000*l.*; Ireland pays 3,270,853*l.* on property rated at 9,898,566*l.*, being a rate for local taxation of 6*s.* 8*d.* in the pound, whilst the local rate of England is but 2*s.* 3*½d.* From returns before the House in 1851, it was found that the poor-rate in England was 5,000,000*l.*, county rate, 800,000*l.*, highway rate, 1,000,000*l.*; total, 6,800,000*l.*, being on the valuation of 68,000,000*l.*, or an average of 2*s.* in the pound. Ireland pays county cess, 1,100,000*l.*, poor-rate, 1,200,000*l.*; total, 2,300,000*l.*, being on the highest valuation, that of 11,500,000*l.*, an average of 4*s.* in the pound, double that of England." The flippancy and want of knowledge of the noble Lord then stood corrected by the gravity and information of his colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time. If the noble Lord had consulted the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Wilson), he would not have fallen into the error he had pointed out. Sir C. Lewis, in a pamphlet from his pen, made these remarks on the subject of local taxation:—

"Supposing the nett annual value of property in Ireland to remain stationary, the future local taxation of the country, apart from municipal taxes, parish cesses, port dues, and light dues, may be estimated at 3s. 6d. in the pound; that of England being on the average, 2s. in the pound."

These words, on the average, implied a much greater financial strain upon the local resources of a part of Ireland than appeared upon the face of the preceding statement. There were considerable tracts in Connaught and Munster, where the poundage of 3s. 6d., estimated as the average for Ireland must be multiplied by two or three to satisfy the demands for county cess and poor-rate. But the country had the opinions of Lord Lansdowne, Lord Sydenham, and Mr. Goulburn, that Ireland was called on for too large a contribution. Had the case been mended by the budget of the right hon. Member for Oxford University? He had remitted 5,394,000*l.* to England, and 628,000*l.* to Ireland; but he had added to Ireland, in the shape of income tax and spirit duty, 700,000*l.* But not only had Ireland suffered in the allocation of public money, but, from the distribution of patronage, seventeen out of eighteen of the chief places in Dublin were given to Englishmen or Scotchmen, to the exclusion of Irishmen. He called upon the noble Lord, then, either to admit that he had spoken hastily and without adequate information on the subject, or by his own arguments, and not by the promptings of the Secretary to the Treasury, maintain what he had before advanced.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not aware that it was the intention of the hon. Member for Roscommon to introduce the question of the relative taxation of England and Ireland on the Motion for the adjournment of the House. [MR. FRENCH: I placed a notice to that effect upon the paper.] He did not think that the practice adopted by hon. Gentlemen of bringing before the House every variety of subjects on a Motion for adjournment was a very convenient one; and the course which had been taken that night fully illustrated the inconvenience of the practice, for he was not at all prepared to answer the statements of the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, he (Sir De Lacy Evans) had himself admitted that he was sensible of the inconvenience of discussing future military operations in that House, and said that he expected no answer to the statement he had made. He (Sir G. Grey) would merely observe that the Government were fully alive to the importance of the duty which devolved upon them of sending sufficient reinforcements to our army in the Crimea. The Government had not neglected that duty; and if there had been lately a cessation of the arrival of small detachments of British troops in the East, the result would be the simultaneous arrival of a large and efficient force in the course of a short time. He (Sir G. Grey) rose chiefly to notice the misapprehension under which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich appeared to be with regard to the Colonial Department, to which he had adverted that night. That right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the neglect of the business of that department; but in what instances he conceived such neglect had taken place he did not state; he (Sir G. Grey), therefore, could not give any specific answer to the allegations of the right hon. Gentleman. But the right hon. Gentleman had complained of an illegality, or irregularity, which, he said, had been committed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government in having taken part in the business of the Colonial Department, and seemed to infer that the noble Lord had signed despatches to Governors of the Colonies. It was perfectly true, as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman, that despatches from the Colonial Department—instructions, for instance, to Governors, in answer to despatches received from them—must be signed by a Secretary of State acting under the authority of the Sovereign; and that was the course which was now pursued; his noble Friend at the head of the Government had not signed any instructions which had been sent to Governors of the Colonies. These instructions had been signed by himself (Sir G. Grey), as one of the Secretaries of State. But there were many questions of great importance which he (Sir G. Grey) had felt that he could not satisfactorily dispose of himself whilst he had the charge of another department.

He, therefore, communicated with the noble Lord at the head of the Government upon the subject, and he (Viscount Palmerston) said that he was perfectly willing to give his assistance in conducting the business of the office during the temporary absence of his noble Friend the Secretary of the Colonial Department (Lord John Russell). He (Sir G. Grey) was relieved by that arrangement from much of the labour and responsibility which would otherwise have devolved upon him; but he signed all these despatches to the Colonial Governors which a Secretary of State ought to sign. So far from this arrangement as to the conduct of the business of the Colonial Department, being an irregularity, he had always thought that it was not only competent to, but incumbent upon, the First Lord of the Treasury, who was responsible for the acts of the Government, to make himself acquainted with the business conducted by the different departments of the Government. He (Sir G. Grey) felt greatly indebted to his noble Friend for the relief thus afforded him. He believed that, with the assistance of his noble Friend at the head of the Government, all the pressing colonial business had been disposed of during the last four weeks. As he had said on a previous occasion, he did not think that the present arrangement could be sanctioned for any length of time; but he hoped that the absence of his noble Friend the Colonial Secretary would be of short duration; and if so, the Motion of which the right hon. Gentleman had given notice, would be unnecessary. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had given the weight of his name to an assertion that the business of the Colonial Department had been neglected during the absence of his noble Friend. Such a statement was calculated to create needless and unfounded dissatisfaction in the Colonies.

THE CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. W. WILLIAMS rose to complain of the manner in which these estimates, involving an expenditure of 2,750,000*l.*, had been disposed of on Monday night. The Motion was one of the most important of the Session; and without any notice being given as to the intention of bringing it on, it was, as he might say, surreptitiously got through the House at nearly one o'clock in the morning. The grievance was not particularly his, as other Gentlemen, including the hon. Baronet opposite

Sir G. Grey

(Sir H. Willoughby), had desired to enter into a discussion on the Vote. He hoped sincerely that there would be no repetition of such unworthy haste, as the consequences might be serious to Government.

LOD SEYMOUR agreed with the hon. Gentleman so far that he thought it was most desirable that the House should have the opportunity of discussing these estimates, and when they were brought on at a late hour they could not have an opportunity of considering the form in which they were arranged and of discussing them. It was little use to have items brought forward unless they were in a form which would enable them to discuss them under their several heads, and, when necessary, to ask for explanations concerning them. But when it was said that the Government were in fault, and that they had passed the vote surreptitiously, he must take their part, and say that they had no alternative in this case. On every night for bringing forward the estimates, so many motions were made before going into Committee, that it was impossible to get into Committee of Supply at a reasonable hour to discuss these questions. It was most desirable that hon. Gentlemen should bring forward general questions on notice of motion, and that when Supply came on they should merely bring forward those motions that had relation to Supply, and were properly applicable to the votes to be brought forward.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY was afraid the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) had hit upon rather an unlucky way of getting the Government out of their difficulty, because, on Monday night, when this motion came on, the House was already in Committee of Supply; so that there was no possibility of any motions being brought on in the mode pointed out. And besides that, the Government had already disposed of two very important motions on that evening—the one relating to the Sardinian loan, the other to the newspaper stamp—which had occupied the House until half an hour after midnight. Now, he would point out the disadvantage of the course pursued. He had himself an objection to urge against these estimates, founded upon an increase which had taken place in the inland revenue branch of them of 200,000*l.* Well, the hon. Gentleman, the Secretary to the Treasury, had stated, in explanation, that that increase had arisen from the increased poundage. But would the hon. Gentleman adhere to that statement? Let the House observe, the whole of that increase amounted to 211,000*l.*, of which 111,000*l.* was put down for increased poundage. And then there came 36,000*l.* for salaries of officers, 25,000*l.* for buildings, 15,000*l.* for augmented office accommodation, and 12,000*l.* for miscellaneous expenses. Well, he would now ask, were all these items that could be classed under the head of "increased poundage?" He must say, therefore, this very discrepancy between the explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury and the recorded facts fully demonstrated the necessity for discussion relative to these estimates.

MR. WILSON said, he was glad of the opportunity of explaining the course that had been pursued by the Government and also complaining of the course that had been adopted towards them. Those estimates had been on the table for three weeks; on every night there was notice of Supply, and—more than that—there was the usual notice of moving particular estimates: and on three successive nights he had consented to postpone them. On Friday last he thought to get those estimates on, but on that night first of all there was a motion on the question of the adjournment of the House, which occupied nearly two hours. Then there was a Motion on going into Committee of Supply, which occupied the House until twelve o'clock, and it was obviously inconsistent with the convenience of the House that they should bring on the Votes after that hour. The next night was Monday; on Monday, also, there was notice of Supply, and likewise notice that those estimates would be taken on that night; but the discussion on the newspaper stamp occupied the House until nearly twelve o'clock. It was, however, absolutely necessary that the Votes should be brought on on Monday night, though of course it was quite competent for any hon. Gentleman to get up and object to the proposition for going into Supply on that occasion. If such an objection had been made, it would have been his (Mr. Wilson's) duty to explain that it was absolutely necessary for the public service that they should then go into Committee, because if they had postponed the Committee to the period he was addressing them, they could not report until after Easter, and consequently not a shilling of the salaries could have been paid until the House met after the recess. It was necessary, therefore, if they stopped until five o'clock in the morning that that Supply should have been then taken.

If hon. Members chose to let those estimates pass without observation it was not his duty to object to it—quite true that it was of little use hearing those estimates if they were not discussed—but in point of fact it was a matter of disappointment to him that they had not been discussed, for that was the object Government had in bringing them before the House. The practice of hon. Members giving notices of motion on going into Supply had the effect of enabling private Members to discuss some private measure of their own, and deprive the whole of the House of the opportunity of discussing those estimates though the discussion of them formed a most important duty of the House of Commons. Instead of there being ground of complaint against the Government, he (Mr. Wilson) thought he had good reason to retort on those who made it, and to complain that hon. Members superseded the business of Government by bringing forward their motions on going into Supply. In reply to the observation of the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) he begged to state, that in explaining the increase referred to by him, he had said it principally arose from the increase of poundage; and undoubtedly it did principally arise from increased poundage. The hon. Baronet knew that the collectors of the assessed taxes and of the income tax were paid by poundage, and just in proportion as those taxes increased must the expense of collection increase.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that it was entirely the fault of the hon. Gentleman that the votes had not been discussed, he having brought them forward after twelve o'clock, and when he (Colonel Dunne) moved to postpone the vote on the Irish Post Office the hon. Member had divided the House against him. He considered that the hon. Gentleman had treated the House with great courtesy upon that occasion.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE POOR LAW (IRELAND)—REDUCTION OF OFFICERS.

MR. BLAND rose to call the attention of the House to the circumstances and manner under which the reduction of officers acting under the Statutes for the administration of the Irish Poor Law had taken place and was now being carried out. He should not have attempted to detain the House upon this subject, at such a time, had it not been a subject which had occasioned considerable excitement in Ireland; for the reduction and the manner of it had been neither economical nor beneficial, and had moreover had a religious complexion given to it which was likely to produce very mischievous results in a country situated like Ireland, when it was recollecting that the great bulk of the recipients of relief under the Irish Poor Law were Roman Catholics; and he was anxious as a Protestant to acquit himself of the suspicion of persecution. The House would remember, that in June last, on consideration of the Estimates, in consequence of representations from several Irish Members, the then Irish Secretary (Sir John Young) had given a pledge as to certain possible reductions in the Irish poor law establishment; and it was to the manner in which those reductions had been effected that he begged to call attention. Now the facts he had to lay before the House were these. Out of seven Roman Catholic administrative officers formerly existing under the Irish poor law establishment, five of them were about to be reduced; whereas of the eleven officers that remained, independently of the ex officio heads of the department, who were both Protestants, nine were Protestants. The present staff of the Board consisted of one Chief Commissioner, two Commissioners, a secretary, and assistant secretary, and sixteen inspectors. There were also medical inspectors and auditors, but none of these had anything to do with the administration of the law. Well, out of these, instead of a proposal to reduce one of the three Commissioners, it was proposed to reduce the secretary, Mr. Stanley, who had held that office almost since the formation of the board, and who had been in the public service for forty years. It was likewise resolved to dismiss the assistant secretary and five out of the sixteen inspectors. Now the reason why he said that this reduction bore a religious aspect was, that these officers thus dismissed were senior to those that were retained, and were able and efficient men; of the five inspectors to be dismissed, four were Roman Catholics, as was also the Secretary, making five Roman Catholic dismissals out of seven. He was prepared, therefore, to prove that the reduction had been made not according to the boasted principle of the hon. Baronet lately the Chief Secretary for Ireland, namely, that the juniors in office would have to go first, while no distinction whatever would be made as to the religious opinions of the different officers. Now, been carried out, he would mention that the senior inspector of the Board, Mr. Otway, a Protestant, was retained, while the second and third, Mr. Burke and Mr. Phelan, both Roman Catholics, were removed. After them came Mr. Crawford, a Protestant, retained, and Mr. Barron, another Roman Catholic, dismissed; while the sixth on the list was Mr. George Huband, the only Protestant dismissed; and lastly came Mr. Lynch, another Roman Catholic, and who was dismissed. Thus had these reductions taken place without reference to the promises which had been made; and in fact exactly upon the contrary principle: so that the late Secretary for Ireland was ignorant of what had been done in the board, of which he was an ex officio Commissioner. Under these circumstances, the people of Ireland considered that they had been unfairly treated, and that there was something more than met the eye. If there was one Board in Ireland more than another that required Roman Catholics in its administration, it was the Poor Law Board. They had not only to take care of the physical necessities of the poor relieved, but also of the religious requirements of the recipients, and, in some instances, the needs of the people of that country had been brought to bear on their religious persuasion, so as to make them suspicious of the relief held out to them; and, therefore, it would have been politic, if nothing more, for the Government to have avoided anything which countenanced that suspicion. Although himself a Protestant, he had felt it his duty to bring this matter before the House, because he wished nothing to be done that seemed like persecution, even on those opposed to him in belief.

MR. BRADY never remembered during his short experience, a question coming before the House which had excited greater interest in Ireland than this. The people of Ireland looked upon the dismissal of these inspectors as a direct attack upon their religion, and believed, after what had occurred in reference to this matter, that the right hon. Baronet, lately the Chief Secretary for Ireland, would never again have been able to face a Roman Catholic or liberal constituency; he might well, therefore, congratulate himself on his happy release to the Ionian Isles. He hoped that the present right hon. Secretary was not prepared to follow the example of his predecessor as to his appointments, who, under the semblance of liberality, had made some of the most bigoted nominations ever known in Ireland. He deprecated the introduction of any religious or sectarian imputations into the arguments before the House, but he could not but feel that there had been, in the first instance, a disproportionate appointment of Catholics and Protestants to the office of poor law inspectors, and that this disproportion had been greatly aggravated by the recent dismissals. He might be permitted to point attention to the fact, that under the Medical Charities Act, which was administered by the Poor Law Board in Ireland, while the expense of maintaining the head office amounted to 7000*l.* a year, the average income of each medical man appointed under it did not exceed 40*l.* a year; while the total number of patients visited in 1854 was 3,346,042, giving 3485 to each medical officer, so that each of them would receive, on taking into consideration the number of patients attended to, one penny and half a farthing for each of them. And, in further illustration, he might state that one medical officer had travelled over 2500 miles for a remuneration of 20*l.*

MR. J. BALL said, that having had the amplest opportunity of forming a judgment upon such a point, he was quite sure that no sectarian feeling had influenced the conduct of Mr. Power, the head of the Irish Poor Law, in the reductions which had been made. His opinion was that the Government should have had in view the political aspect of the question, and should have taken advantage of the opportunity which had offered some time ago, and appointed a Roman Catholic to be one of the chief Commissioners, as it was of more importance that one of these should be of that persuasion than the inspectors, who were, after all, subordinate officers. He thought it was more important that one member of the Commission should be a Roman Catholic than any of the inspectors, because the people looked with great jealousy on the decision of that body upon which there was no member of that same religion as the people themselves.

MR. HORSMAN said, that he fully admitted the importance of the subject, and thought that when a department had been as much attacked as the Poor Law Department the Government were bound to come forward and to state their view of its conduct; and he was bound to say that in his opinion the Irish Poor Law Department had discharged its duties very efficiently. Hon. Members who had spoken upon this subject were under a misconception as to this reduction, which was not a voluntary act of the Commissioners. The circumstance of the reduction having been made in the persons of Roman Catholics was purely accidental. When the estimates for the Department were brought before the House, it had been determined that whatever reductions could be made without interfering with its efficiency should be made. It was then considered what persons of the establishment could be reduced. The whole number of the body was sixteen, being eight in the first, and eight in the second class. By reducing the first class it was found that a saving of 1,200*l.* a year would be effected in each of the inspectors; by making a reduction in the second class only 600*l.* a year would be saved. The Commissioners, consequently, determined that the reduction should be made in the first class of inspectors. Now it was a very different case when they had the original nomination of the board, for then they were compelled to select untried men. But in the present case they had experience to guide them; and the only thing the Commissioners had to consider was, who were the most efficient and useful men—everybody, however, admitted that all those of the first class were men who were eminent in their department and efficient in the public service. He regretted to see so many reduced from the first class, because it gave rise to this misconception; but what were the Commissioners to do? He thought they should do what they conscientiously considered best, without giving way to the fear of censure. They made the reduction which they felt it was most proper to make, and left it to public opinion and to Parliament to vindicate the course which they had taken. It was true that the reductions which had been as yet effected touched chiefly Roman Catholics; but there were other reductions to take place. Mr. Stanley, the secretary of the board, was to be reduced: the assistant auditor was to be reduced; as was also the architect. When all the reductions were carried out, there would be eleven reduced, of which six would be Protestants and five Roman Catholics. In respect to Mr. Stanley, he could state that no one member of the board was so sensitively alive to the way in which the establishment was overmanned and underworked as Mr. Stanley himself, and he at once concurred in the proposition of reducing himself. The opinion expressed by Mr.

Stanley was most honourable to him. That Gentleman had in the first instance refused an increase of salary; and when the question of retiring pension arose upon his reduction, he evinced the most admirable disinterestedness. He could hardly pronounce a sufficiently high eulogium upon Mr. Stanley for the conduct he has shown. He deeply regretted the loss of that Gentleman's services. He had looked carefully into all the circumstances of the case, and he could assure the House that the reductions should have unfortunately fallen upon the members of one religious creed was entirely accidental. No one had ever imputed to the Commissioners any sectarian feeling in the discharge of their duties; they had at all times been actuated by the most pure and proper motives. He could assure the House that the Government were most vigilant not to give occasion for complaint on the part of the people of Ireland in reference to religion. If any cause could be shown for inquiry in respect to the Government appointments or reductions, they would be most willing to assent to such inquiry, and were prepared to abide the result. He, however, thought that the manner in which the Poor Law Commissioners discharged their duty, in the face of great misconstruction and unpopularity, was deserving of the approval of the Government, and he was sure it would be approved of by Parliament.

THE CAMP AT ALDERSHOT.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON, in rising to call the attention of the Government to the construction of the huts at Aldershot, said he was perfectly aware that the present was an inconvenient time to bring on a question of this description; but the suggestions he was about to make would be of very little use if reserved until after the Easter recess. At present only about 400 of these huts were completed, leaving 800 more to be constructed, and these, he thought, might be much improved, and a large sum of money saved. About double the quantity of boards that were necessary were put upon these huts; and the roofing was badly designed, because it was flat, and the water would certainly penetrate through. The boards were what were called feather-edged, and, consequently, as soon as the dry weather set in and the sun's power was felt, they would all start, and in two months, he would venture to say every hut now made would require another covering, besides the boards. He would suggest, therefore, that the roofing should be altered; indeed, if the Government had consulted any village sawyer, he would have shown them how to make a roof better adapted to keep out the wet. Another defective part of the hut was the provision for lighting and ventilation. The windows were placed in such a position that any man above 4 feet 6 inches high would be breathing an impure atmosphere. Now it would cost but a small sum, perhaps 15s. a hut, to place these windows at the top of the roof, and the windows of the 800 not yet made might be put in their proper places without costing the country a six-pence. He considered the double boarding and roof-boarding to be of no use. It was a great pity that when the Ordnance were about to erect so many as 1,200 huts they did not have a model perfect of its kind, and put it up as a specimen for the contractor. He ventured to say that had this course been adopted, they would have been made for about half the cost which would really be incurred. Before the huts designed by Mr. Brunel for use in the East were constructed, a model was erected in the Great Western station, and suggestions were received for its improvement; and if this had been done in the present case, the huts would have been far more efficient in their construction, and a large sum of money might have been saved; and, considering the large quantities of timber to be used in them, he thought sufficient time had not been given to the contractors to send in their estimates, for they had been allowed only three days. When first these huts were commenced, no foundations were put in until an hon. Gentleman opposite went down to Aldershot, and brought the matter before the House. At present the foundations were being constructed in a most expensive manner; they were making them as solidly as if they were going to build a house, although a little concrete and a few bricks would have answered every purpose. If continued in this style, the huts would not be finished for two or three months. But he would suggest that the Government should not construct so many huts. He thought it would be much better that 5,000 out of the 20,000 soldiers who were to be encamped at Aldershot should be lodged in tents, where they would be much more likely to learn the real business of campaigning, the pitching of tents, and moving from place to place, than if domiciled in these semi-baracks.

Colonel KNOX thought it was due to

Sir Frederic Smith, the engineer officer who had the arrangement of the camp at Aldershot, to state to the House that he had received a letter from that officer, which, he thought, contained a fair and reasonable explanation regarding a statement he had made in that House. Sir Frederic said that they had been limited for time in the work made under his directions at Aldershot, and during the intense frost which prevailed in the latter end of February and the beginning of March they were compelled to proceed with the work as they could. In such weather, it was scarcely necessary to say, that they could neither use concrete nor brick-work for the foundations; but the huts raised since had all been placed on concrete and brick foundations, and those that were built before the weather permitted of foundations being made would be properly secured as the season advanced. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the ventilation of the huts was faulty, but he thought it had escaped the observation of the hon. Gentleman that there were two shaft ventilators in each building, which would be ample for the purpose of ventilation. The huts were perhaps hardly so large as they ought to be, but that was a matter of detail into which he would not enter. With regard to the roofing, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that it was not made in the best possible manner, and that a covering of felt would be a great improvement. A false ceiling would, he thought, be very beneficial to the troops, as it would render the huts warm in the winter, and would keep off the heat of the sun in summer. The other arrangements of the camp appeared to be well conducted.

MR. MONSELL said, the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Paxton) was a formidable critic on a subject with which he was so well acquainted as that upon which he had just addressed the House, and he (Mr. Monsell) laboured under the difficulty of not having been aware before the hon. Gentleman rose of the character of the observations he intended to make, and of the fault he was about to find with the encampment at Aldershot. The hon. Gentleman, at the close of his observations, advised the Government not to proceed with the erection of so large a number of huts, but rather to place a certain number of the troops about to be encamped at Aldershot in tents. Unfortunately, however, it would be necessary to keep the troops at Aldershot, not only during the summer but during the winter months, in consequence of the deficiency in barrack accommodation; and it was, therefore, absolutely necessary to construct huts in which to lodge them. The Surveyor to the Ordnance, who had that day visited Aldershot, gave a most satisfactory account of the progress of the buildings, and stated that they were in a most satisfactory condition, and highly creditable to the contractors. Some time ago it had been decided to cover the roofs of the huts with asphalted felt, and, therefore, any difficulty entertained by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Knox) in that respect would be removed.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, it was most unsatisfactory that the House should now be called upon to adjourn for a period of seventeen days, looking to the extremely critical state of affairs, to the anxious expectations as to the Vienna Conferences and their uncertain issue, to the growing agitation and discontent of the public mind, and to the high price of food in the principal towns. They were left in the most complete ignorance and mystery as to the intentions of the Government with respect to the mode in which they intended to levy taxes to provide for their reckless and extravagant expenditure. It appeared to him that the House was giving way to the most self-complimenting Government that had ever sat upon the Ministerial benches. The Government could do nothing but compliment each other on what each had done, and no doubt that, in their own opinions, they all stood very high. Now, on the contrary, the whole country and Europe believed that they had done everything very ill, and history would comment upon their acts with the utmost severity. He contended that the House should not adjourn until they had the Budget before them, and until the country knew how it was to be taxed. There was only one newspaper in the metropolis that had the courage to support the Government. Let the House consider how our fifty colonies were treated. Representations were pouring in daily from all quarters, but there was no Colonial Minister to attend to them. Again he protested against the adjournment of the House.

MR. JOHN SHELLEY said, that before the Motion for the adjournment was agreed to, he wished to draw the attention of the Home Secretary to the case of a man upon whom an inquest was held, on the 14th instant, at Charing Cross Hospital, and whose death had been attributed to police neglect. The deceased, whose name was Thomas Gooch, was stated, in the evidence given before the coroner (Mr. Bedford), to have left his home on a Saturday night, telling his wife that he should return presently; but nothing more was heard of him until the following evening, when she learnt that he was in the hospital at Charing Cross. It appeared that in the interval, at half-past seven on the Sunday morning, he was found lying in the street by a policeman of the C division, who took him to the Vine Street station, where a wound was discovered on the back of his head. It was stated that no medical assistance was called in, and that he was left in a cell without bedding, covering, food, or attention, for eleven hours; at the expiration of that time a medical officer saw him, when he found him in such a state that he ordered him to be immediately taken to the Charing Cross Hospital. The man was accordingly placed upon a stretcher and conveyed, through a heavy fall of snow, to the hospital, upon reaching which he was found to be dead. The body of the man was subsequently opened by the house surgeon, who stated that he found no food or spirits in the stomach, and that, in his opinion, the man had died from apoplexy, produced by concussion of the brain; and the jury, in returning their verdict, animadverted in strong terms upon the conduct of the police. He (Sir J. Shelley) had made an inspection of the cell at the station, and ascertained that if a man were apprehended at night, no matter what might be the circumstances, no difference was made as to the cell in which he was placed. There was nothing but a wooden bench to lie or sit upon, and no bedding or covering from the cold, or any warm clothing in which to wrap a person who was conveyed from the lock-up to the hospital. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Grey) would turn his attention to the state of these lock-up cells, and see if something might not be done to provide some covering and shelter for persons who happened to be taken there in the situation of the deceased. In justice to the police themselves, as well as to the public, he thought it was desirable that further inquiry should be made into the case of this poor man, who, it appeared, had been left in the cell for eleven hours without food or proper care being taken of him.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would cause an inquiry to be made into the state of those cells, and he had no doubt that an inquiry had already been instituted into the particular case referred to by his hon. Friend; but as no notice of the question had been given him, he was not prepared to give any answer as to the details.

MR. FREWEN wished to know if the Government had taken, or when they would take, any steps for the appointment of a new chairman of Ways and Means, as he understood the House had lost the services of Mr. Bouvierie?

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had observed in an evening print, which was supposed to be a semi-official organ of the Government, the statement that Mr. James Kenneth Howard had been appointed to succeed Mr. Kennedy at the Woods and Forests. He wished to know if the statement were correct?

COLONEL BOLDERO believed the immediate question before the House was the housing of the troops. He recommended the adoption of a description of housing so constructed that the soldiers themselves could be taught to erect them, to take them down, and replace them in another position. He also recommended the Clerk of the Ordnance to provide the men with tools of every description that they were likely to require, and that they should be taught not only to make roads but to construct works and mines, make fascines and gabions, bake their own bread, and kill their own meat. When the troops were assembled in great numbers, there was an excellent opportunity of teaching them many things which were of the highest utility to an army in the field, but of which ninety-nine out of 100 of the troops who had been sent to the Crimea were perfectly ignorant.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, in answer to the question of the hon. Member for Ayr, had to state that the appointment of Mr. Howard to the Woods and Forests was to take place, and that, according to Act of Parliament, the appointment would be communicated to Parliament within twenty days afterwards. The appointment of a new Chairman of Ways and Means would be moved when the House met after the Easter holidays.

MR. CRAUFURD gave notice that, after the recess, he would call the attention of the House to the appointment of Mr. Howard.

Motion for the adjournment of the House

WILLS AND ADMINISTRATIONS.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the Jurisdiction of all the Ecclesiastical and Peculiar Courts in England and Wales respecting Wills and Administrations, to establish a distinct Court of Probate and Administration, and otherwise to amend the law in relation to matters testamentary. The hon. and learned Gentleman said, that in doing so, he was oppressed with the recollection of the many abortive attempts which had been made during the last thirty years to accomplish the object which he was now about to attempt to effect, and which he was sanguine enough to believe would now be attempted for the last time. The grievances to which he now hoped to put an end had been acknowledged, and had occupied the attention of successive Parliaments, for a period extending over that length of time. Such, however, had been the pertinacity with which every attempt to reform these courts had been resisted, and such had been the success of the efforts of the numerous persons interested in the maintenance of these testamentary courts, that he believed as many as ten or twelve successive Parliaments had been quite unable to accomplish a change, and that during that period about a dozen or fifteen Bills which had been introduced for the purpose of providing a remedy for the acknowledged abuses had failed. Something, perhaps, was to be attributed to the peculiar disposition of the people of England; for when any grievances complained of in their institutions were proposed to be reformed or amended, there was always very great difficulty in conquering the feeling which they entertained, and which particularly distinguished the people of this country—the feeling that the institutions under which they lived were the best possible for the purposes for which they were established, and that there was no necessity for altering them. That difficulty having been overcome—after the grievances had been pointed out and proved, and something in the way of remedy proposed—the people at once transferred their attention from the grievances to a criticism of the proposed remedy, and refused to entertain them unless they were satisfied that they were the best that could possibly be imagined; and accordingly every proposal which had been made to apply a remedy to the evil now complained of had been met by a great number of objections, and the Bills had been rejected. He was not so sanguine as to believe that his measure was not liable to a great number of objections; but he earnestly hoped that, as attention had been awakened to the absolute necessity of providing some measure calculated to put an end to the evils complained of, this measure would be accepted, although it might not exactly accord with the views of every individual who might entertain theoretical speculations of his own, and who might think that it was not the best adapted to provide a better system as a substitute for the present system of jurisdiction, which was acknowledged to be imperfect, and the grievances of which he would now attempt to describe. He would, however, under the circumstances in which the House was now placed, not attempt to detain them by enumerating the many evils which resulted from the jurisdiction of the present courts, and which imperatively demanded the interference of the Legislature, as that had been done on many former occasions; and the necessity for such interference had been acknowledged, as he had before observed, for a great period of time. But it would perhaps be well to look back for the purpose of ascertaining what had been done by the many Commissions which had been issued and the Committees that had been appointed, in order to ascertain what grievances had been acknowledged and exposed by the several inquiries into the subject. From the experience to be derived from these inquiries he now hoped to be able to devise for these evils other expedients, and to construct a measure which would include and comprehend within it, at all events, those things which the several Commissions and Committees had thought fit to recommend to the notice of the House.

It would be remembered that, in the year 1830 a Commission was issued to a great number of distinguished persons—eminent Judges, both of the courts of law, the courts of equity, and of the ecclesiastical courts, and with whom certain members of the right reverend bench and eminent statesmen were associated—in order to ascertain what remedies should be applied to the existing state of things regarding testamentary jurisdiction. The Commissioners made a report in the year 1832, and the result of their deliberations was, that they recommended the abolition of that numerous body of smaller ecclesiastical and peculiar jurisdictions which were spread over the whole face of the country; and that the whole of the testamentary jurisdiction should be consolidated into the two Prerogative Courts of Canterbury and York. But though they recommended the preservation of these two courts, yet they gave expression to a unanimous opinion that it would be still better if those two courts of Canterbury and York were united into one establishment, and made one metropolitan tribunal, as a court for disposing of the whole testamentary business of the country. Very shortly after this report was made—in the year 1833—the Real Property Commissioners made their fourth report to Parliament. In that report they recommended, in like manner, that all diocesan and peculiar jurisdictions should be absolutely abolished, and that one metropolitan court should, in like manner, be established for carrying on the business of those jurisdictions. These Commissioners differed, however, from the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in one particular, and the difference was well justified by a passage which was to be found in the report of the Commissioners themselves. In the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners it was stated that the jurisdiction of such a court had in it nothing of an ecclesiastical character, and they admitted that it was one of purely a civil nature; and, on this point, the Real Property Commissioners remarked, that it was a strange anomaly, and one which required to be put an end to without delay, that there should exist in this country courts of purely civil jurisdiction which they did not derive from the Crown, the fountain of justice, and which did not exercise their functions in the name of Her Majesty. The Real Property Commissioners recommended that the whole jurisdiction of these courts should be transferred to the Court of Chancery. Subsequently to that report, in the same year, a Select Committee was appointed by the House to consider the subject; and when they made their report, among many important and valuable suggestions, they stated that they concurred in the opinion expressed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that the whole of the jurisdiction should be centred in one tribunal, which should be locally situate in London; but the Committee recommended that the tribunal to be erected should not belong to the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and that it should be extended to include the whole testamentary business of the kingdom. Subsequent to that period, a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed, and they also arrived at the conclusion that there should be but one testamentary court, and they recommended an entire abolition of all the minor jurisdictions in the kingdom, and that all the jurisdictions, whether ordinary or contentious, should be centred in one tribunal in the metropolis. The result, then, of the whole examination of the subject and the authorities collected by all these numerous Committees, composed of men of great ability, political sagacity, and legal experience, was, that there should be but one single tribunal, and that established in the metropolis, for the purpose of disposing of all the testamentary business of the country, both ordinary and contentious, and that that tribunal should be a civil tribunal—that there was nothing either in the history or the origin of these courts, the nature of their jurisdiction, or the mode of its exercise, which could lead them to recommend that such jurisdiction should continue to be vested in an ecclesiastical tribunal. This he had endeavoured to accomplish as the first object of the Bill he was about to describe. But, besides the reports of the Committees and Commissioners to which he had referred, he must now call the attention of the House to another. It would be in the recollection of the House that, after the several reports mentioned had been presented, a report was made by the Chancery Commissioners at the end of 1837, and a second report of the Chancery Commission appointed in 1850 was made in 1852, in which their attention was expressly directed to testamentary jurisdiction. Those Commissioners were not entirely unanimous on the nature of the court to be established. Some of the Commissioners recommended that the present jurisdiction should be transferred to one central metropolitan tribunal, but that it should be a distinct court, with limited authority. In this respect the report of the Commissioners was not very harmonious with itself, for while they recommended a court with a limited authority and a prescribed course of action, they said it was expedient that that court should be armed with the fullest powers appertaining to a court of final construction and universal administration. They recommended that the court should be so constituted as to be able to entertain all the subjects belonging to an ordinary court of probate, and all those incidental to a court of equity. A Bill was brought in during the last Session of Parliament, which, to a certain extent, was founded on the recommendations of this Commission. The Bill proposed to transfer the testamentary jurisdiction of the present courts to the Court of Chancery, in conformity with the opinions expressed by some of the Commissioners, and in conformity to the opinion of the Real Property Commissioners of 1833. To that Bill, which was very little understood out of doors, great objections were raised, which he had recently seen repeated. It was said to be the intention to throw the whole of the business, including the proof of the wills and the grant of letters of administration, into the general mass of business of the Court of Chancery. Now, nothing of the kind was intended; but he confessed that the Bill was so expressed as actually to lead to that impression. The result, therefore, was, that from these and other causes that Bill could not be proceeded with; and, warned by the nature of the objections raised last year, he had now endeavoured in his Bill to avoid all those difficulties, and to render it impossible that any such misapprehensions should be again entertained.

The first thing he proposed to do by this Bill was to vest the whole jurisdiction in relation to wills and in relation to granting all letters of administration—that was, the authority to deal with all matters which might be called matters of testacy and intestacy, in one metropolitan and central court, deriving its authority from, and exercising its jurisdiction in, the name of the Crown. It would be a civil court—a distinct court for all purposes, which he would shortly explain to the House. It would be necessary, according to his view, that the tribunal should be constituted in a court which was already a court of construction and administration—that it should participate in the fullest powers of that court and be itself a portion of the court, in order that the duties incidental to a court of probate might be fully and efficiently discharged. He proposed that the court should be established in the Court of Chancery; but that it should be a distinct court, having a judge and officers, and clerks of its own, and to be called "Her Majesty's Testamentary Court." It would exercise a complete, though not exclusive, jurisdiction upon all subjects relating to the proving of wills and the granting of letters of administration. He proposed to attach to the court, and to be also locally situated in London, an office having large and comprehensive testamentary duties. He proposed also to abolish entirely the whole of the jurisdiction now vested in 380 or 400 peculiar and diocesan courts, which were scattered over the whole of the country, and which, if it were worth while to enter into a description, would present a most ludicrous and absurd spectacle of divided jurisdiction, and make hon. Members wonder how it was possible that they should exist in a civilised country. The testamentary office attached to the court would be open to all Her Majesty's subjects to come in and prove wills and obtain letters of administration, without the intervention of, and without the necessity of employing any solicitor, any proctor, or any agent whatever. It would be the duty of the officers, at the head of this office, to promote the means of giving information, and to explain and give every information to all persons who might think proper to come in person for the purpose of proving wills. In cases where persons resided in the country, and where it would not be possible for them to come to the office personally, for the purpose of proving wills, the solicitors throughout the country who were Commissioners of the Court of Chancery would be armed with authority to receive wills, and to administer oaths, and to supply information, and to obtain such evidence as might be required as necessary proof, and requisite for proving all wills. They would procure affidavits, and take depositions, which would afterwards be deposited in the Testamentary Office of Wills in London. The Bill was framed so as to render this practicable, and so that there should be no mistake upon the subject which was a very important one; and in order to show the efficiency and economy of the plan, he would describe the machinery which would be set at work by the Bill. He proposed that there should be issued to all Commissioners for taking affidavits in the Court of Chancery—who, probably many hon. Members of the House were aware, were persons in the profession of the law, who had been recommended to the Lord Chancellor especially, on account of their good conduct for the appointment—that there should be issued printed forms of instructions with regard to the mode in which they should proceed in the exercise of their new duties. They would be furnished with printed forms of affidavits for taking depositions and making declarations, in conformity with the provisions of the Act and with the various circumstances of the case. Printed declarations would also be issued to be signed by the parties applying for the proof of wills. In former times, and before the Act 1st Vict. c. 26, the probate of wills might be described as a mere process for authenticating the instrument; but since the passing of that Act—which herein perhaps might be thought not a very wise one—the duty partook of somewhat a judicial character and was no longer confined to what might be described as a mere matter of business. The duty of proving a will was now performed by officers to whom the ordinary business, which was technically called common-form business, had been assigned. Many duties were discharged by these officers which required a certain degree of attention, and which required also some skill on their part. When a document was produced to a solicitor or a proctor for the purpose of being proved as a will, it was the duty of that solicitor or proctor to examine the instrument to see whether it were duly attested, whether it appeared on the face of it to be signed in the manner required by the law, whether it bore any mark of interlineation or erasure, whether it consisted of one or more papers, whether there was a special nomination of executors or not, or whether there was a provision for a residuary bequest, and also to ascertain who the person was who appeared to be entitled by the terms of the instrument to have probate granted him. All these duties being as important in character as they were minute and numerous in detail, it was scarcely reasonable to expect that they should be performed with perfect and absolute accuracy by a person acting in an individual capacity in the country, unless his acts were subjected to the supervision and superintendence of the appointed officers in the General Office of Testamentary Jurisdiction in London. What he should propose, therefore, was, that the solicitor or proctor in the country should, after submitting the will to such an examination as he had described, send the document with all necessary accompanying documents up to London to the Testamentary Office; and when it was received there, it would be the duty of a registrar of that office to examine the papers so transmitted, in order to ascertain that the duties devolving on the agent in the country had been properly discharged. If any difficulty should arise, there should be a reference first to the registrar highest in authority, and then, if necessary, to a Judge sitting in chambers. If the will should be found to be in all respects a regular document, it would be at once admitted to probate, and letters to that effect might be transmitted without delay to the solicitor in the country; and thus all necessary arrangements would be both simplified and expedited.

And here he proposed to make an important and, as he thought, a most valuable alteration in the present law. He proposed that the simple process of printing should be at once resorted to—and that, instead of sending down the inconvenient old-fashioned and useless parchment copy engrossed by a lawyer's clerk, the documents, the moment they were proved in the Testamentary Office to be correct, should forthwith be printed; that some fifty or sixty copies—as convenience might dictate—should be struck off; that the proper stamp of the office should be affixed to one copy, and that there should be appended to all the others a seal representing the stamp affixed to the principal copy; and, finally, that the will, so proved, printed, and authenticated, should be forwarded to the executor or the agent of the executor. The advantage of this system had already been experienced in the Court of Chancery with regard to the printing of Bills; and there could be no doubt that it would work in an equally satisfactory manner when applied to the printing of wills. The question of expense was important; but he was happy to say that, in this respect, there would be no detriment, but rather benefit. At first sight it might be supposed that it would involve a material addition of expense—but this was not so; on the contrary, it would produce much greater economy. The present charge in the Prerogative Office for engrossing and making office copies of papers or documents was at the rate of 8d. per folio, which meant a sheet of ninety words. But then that charge was made for every copy, and as the same charge was made for entering it in the registry, scarcely any will was admitted to probate at a less cost than 1s. 4d. a folio; and as several office copies were usually required, it could scarcely be expected that under the present system the charge for copying a will admitted to probate could amount to less than from 2s. per folio, and the parties could only get one, or at most, two copies of the will. But the system which he proposed to introduce would occasion a great improvement in this respect; for, according to the most accurate estimate that could be formed, he found that the charge for printing and supplying 100 copies of a will would only be 9½d. per folio; so that the executor might receive any number of printed copies of a will that he required for a sum of money little more than one-half of what he had to pay for the cumbrous, perplexing, and misleading copy on parchment—he so characterised the parchment copy, because, from his experience in courts of justice, he was aware that many of the errors, misapprehensions, and mistakes made with regard to the meaning of testamentary documents arose from the difficulty which unlearned persons experienced in collecting the meaning of an instrument, when they had to read it in a written form, and more particularly in that form of writing known as "engrossing." The reading of a printed paper became so simple, and was so intelligible to the ordinary persons who wished to know the meaning of the will, that he hoped he might not be too sanguine in expecting that the introduction of a printed copy would facilitate the apprehension of the meaning of the instrument, and prevent much mistake, and, by preventing much mistake, prevent also much litigation. But there was another and an obvious advantage which he was sure the House would anticipate him in understanding. The great object which they had in view was to establish in the metropolis and in the country registries of documents which would be of use, not only for the people immediately interested, but which would be also of use for statistical purposes; and, without any additional expense, by printing the copies, a copy could be registered in the Testamentary office, another copy could be filed in the office of the registrar of births, deaths, and marriages, and thus those instruments when collected would form an important addition to our statistical information. And, by making one probate universal in the three kingdoms, they would be enabled to send a copy to Ireland or to Scotland, or to the registrar of the diocese, or to the clerk of the peace, or the parish in which the testator might have died. The instrument, when thus printed and sealed with the seal of the court, would be sent down to the executor, and he could afterwards have whatever copies he might require, instead of copies merely of extracts, as under the present system. This was the form in which he proposed that letters of probate should be sent to persons at a distance. For those who were willing to come to the Testamentary Office there would be officers ready to give every necessary information that could facilitate the proving of wills and to swear them to their affidavits. So much, therefore, with regard to the ordinary form of proving wills where no dispute or controversy occurred.

With regard to cases of dispute or controversy, he proposed that the mode of procedure should be of the simplest and most expeditious character. Caveats would be entered in the Testamentary-office in the same manner as they were now entered in the Perogative Court. If it were necessary to have a suit to determine the sanity of the testator, or any other matter touching the validity of the will, a suit should be commenced in the simplest and most summary form, by a simple claim in the Court of Probate wholly devoid of any legal technicalities. The claim would be filed in the court against the parties who were interested in the question. The suit would then proceed either by a viva voce examination of the parties—which was a power which he desired to give to the court, and which, he hoped, it would exercise in the fullest manner—or by written deposition, according to the nature of the case. There were various other provisions in the Bill which it would be beyond the present purpose to enumerate, but which were intended to make the proceedings under it easy, simple, speedy, and economical. Hon. Gentlemen present, who were familiar with the practice of the courts, were, no doubt, aware that a great alteration had been made in the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. His great object in fixing the Court of Probate in the Court of Chancery was to add to the former the functions of a court of administration in addition to those of a court of probate. This was a matter of such deep importance, and one which, sooner or later, must concern all, that he might perhaps be pardoned if he detained the House a few moments while he pointed out the great necessity of this provision. Under the present system, supposing there were a controversy about granting probate, or letters of administration, nothing could be done to collect or administer the property until that controversy were settled. The result, therefore, according to the present state of things, was that, if there was a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, it became necessary to have another suit in the Court of Chancery to enable the parties to obtain some authority to prevent the estate going to ruin, and to enable them to get legal power to collect and preserve the property. But at present, the jurisdiction of the court was very imperfect, and although it could give the parties authority to collect, they could not give authority to administer the property. The result was, that the whole of the affairs of an estate were suspended, to the great detriment of those who were interested in it, during the time that the will was in litigation in the Ecclesiastical Court. If, however, there were added to the ordinary functions of the court of probate the functions of a court of administration, there was no reason why the ordinary duties of administration should not be performed while the other questions were pending ; and it was accordingly proposed that the court which entertained the question of what person ought to be admitted to probate, or of the validity or invalidity of a will, should be empowered to receive, to collect, and to administer the estate up to the time when it was handed over to the person entitled to it. It was palpable, therefore, that as long as probate and administration were severed, the authority was insufficient, and the parties interested in the property were mocked in their desire to have one uniform tribunal capable of answering all the purposes of the case. Neither was it possible to have a comprehensive and complete remedy, unless resort were made to a court which could give probate and administration also. This was the reason why he was anxious that the court of probate should be a court with the power and authority belonging to that tribunal which, in the present day, was the only tribunal known to this country which could discharge at once the functions which belong to a court of construction and of administration. There was at present this absurdity in the existing system, that the Ecclesiastical Court had no power to construe a will except for the purpose of determining to whom the probate should be given, and the interpretation of that court was not binding upon the tribunal to which the will might afterwards be submitted for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of the parties interested under it. A court of probate which was not also a court of construction might put an interpretation upon a will which might be afterwards held to be incorrect by a court of final construction ; and it was plain, therefore, that if we wanted uniformity of jurisdiction, and not to drive persons first to one tribunal to get a small piece of justice, and then to another, and afterwards to a third ; and if we wished to put an end to the anomaly of the present state of things, we must give to the new court of probate all the power, all the authority, and all the functions which were necessary not only to enable it to discharge the functions of a court of probate, but of a court of jurisdiction also. These were the reasons which induced him to endeavour to make the new court one which would answer every purpose of the suitors resorting to it, and he believed he could best accomplish this object by connecting it with the Court of Chancery, a court of administration and construction, not to give it a separate and independent character. Various improvements had recently been made in that court with regard to the administration of estates. In former times when a person was left a legacy under the will of a testator, it was necessary for him to file a bill in chancery against the executor or administrator to recover the amount ; but under the present system he had only to go to the chambers of a judge, where he could get a summons for a few shillings, which he could serve on the executor or administrator, and by that means bring him within a day or two, before the court to answer why the debt or legacy was not paid. He knew repeated instances in which the parties had gone personally without the intervention of a solicitor, and obtained a summons ; and, when the executor had attended in obedience to the summons, the clerk said, "Why have you not paid the legacy or the debt ?" Sometimes the executor offered some excuse, and, if it were not satisfactory, the clerk said, "We must make an order for you to pay the money." This generally led the executor to pay, and thus in the course of a few days, the money was recovered at an outlay of a few shillings only. He, therefore, thought that the new court should be a part of a tribunal the procedure of which had been thus rendered simple, cheap, and inexpensive, and that he was not exposing this measure to any apprehensions, such as those which were entertained with respect to the Bill of last year, and which he had seen expressed in the ordinary journals of the day—that by transferring this jurisdiction to a court with the same procedure and powers as the Court of Chancery, the individuals who resorted to that court would be exposed to delay, expense, and those other kinds of objection which formerly might, with propriety, have been urged against the procedure of the Court of Chancery. So much for the manner in which he proposed that the new court should act in matters relating to wills of personal estate.

Many Members of the House would probably be aware that in the Reports of the Real Property Commissioners and the Chancery Commissioners, recommendations had been constantly made that there should be no distinction upon the subject of probate, between wills relating to personal estate and wills relating to real estate. Wills relating to the one or other were seldom found to be contained in separate instruments. It was rare to find that a man made a will relating to his personal estate, and another will relating to his real estate. He might do so legally; but hon. Members were probably aware that though the probate of the will was conclusive with regard to the personal estate—and great benefits and advantages had resulted from that rule of law—yet the probate of the will, granted as it was, after proof of the execution of the will, did not carry with it any evidence, or have any effect whatever with regard to the title to real estate. Our law, therefore, in the present state of things, produced this singular anomaly, that they required the same mode of execution, and the same attestation with regard to wills whether they related to personality or realty; yet, after the will had been established in the proper court as one of personality, the validity of the same instrument was not established as regarded real estate. Nay, there was still a stronger absurdity. One and the same will might give rise to half a dozen different and conflicting determinations. A man made a will with regard to his personal estate, and in the Ecclesiastical Court he was pronounced to be of sane mind and understanding, and probate was granted. Next day the heir-at-law brought an action against the devisee, and the court of law sat in judgment on the same question, and came to a different conclusion. Another devisee of another portion of the property might again contest the same question, and the court of law might come to a different conclusion from that of the first. The decision of the Prerogative Court might be carried by way of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, whose decision was final and irreversible. The decision in the other case might be taken to the House of Lords, whose decision was equally final and irreversible. Thus, they might have with respect to the same instrument two final and irreversible courts arriving at conclusions directly in the teeth of each other—the one pronouncing the will to be invalid and the testator insane, and the other pronouncing it valid, and that the testator was of sound and disposing mind, and of sufficient testamentary capacity. It was high time that this anomaly should be put an end to; and that there should be a power of arriving at some final conclusion with regard to the validity of wills of real estate. In the Bill of last year it was proposed that wills of real estate should be proved in the Court of Probate in like manner as wills of personal estate. That was a provision which excited great alarm—an alarm that was increased by the mere circumstance that the expressions used were, that such a Bill should be proved “in like manner as a will of personal estate.” Probably that alarm arose from the supposition that it was intended as the first step towards applying the probate duty to land; and, not being desirous of giving occasion to a similar apprehension, he had not incorporated in his Bill those clauses of the former measure relating to the proof of wills of real estate which had given rise to those terrors in the minds of some hon. Gentlemen, and induced the belief that there still existed in the procedure of our courts of equity those abuses which were at one time urged as a just and serious ground of complaint against that tribunal. There was, however, in existence in the Court of Chancery a procedure which would answer the same purpose, and would not afford the same grounds for apprehension and alarm. They had long been in the habit, in courts of equity, of entertaining bills for the purpose of establishing wills of real estate, and by declaring the residuary fund to be available for all purposes in reference to the establishment of the will. He proposed that, in the Court of Probate, any person interested in real estate under a will should have the power of bringing forward that will for the purpose of having it finally and conclusively established. In the present state of the law this evil existed—a will might be found, after the death of the testator, creating a variety of successive estates—estates in remainder—and the result was that the heir-at-law most probably entered on the possession of the property, and yet it was utterly impossible for him to say that he should ever have a conclusive title to that estate, or that the alleged incapacity of the testator should be considered as finally settled; for as each successive estate in remainder came into possession, the remainder-man had a right to try the question with the heir-at-law. Hon. Members might be aware that it was impossible that in cases of this kind the question of testamentary capacity or incapacity of the testator could be finally determined. He therefore proposed that, in the Court of Probate, these questions should be brought on claims or bills for establishing wills, or for pronouncing conclusively for the testacy or intestacy of an alleged testator, and the questions would be once for all determined in those cases. The result would be that the court would be enabled to pronounce either for the validity of the will or for the intestacy of the testator, and a title would be created by the decree, either fully establishing the will, or delivering to the heir-at-law a certificate of the intestacy of his ancestor, which would make his title secure. By this mode the object of granting probate of real estate would be accomplished, and an end would be put to a variety of evils which now required the application of some such effectual remedy. In effect, the new tribunal—if he had succeeded in conveying his meaning to the House—would be an exclusive court for all questions relating to the validity or invalidity of wills, whether of real or personal estate.

There was another object sought to be attained by the measure of which the House would at once see the advantage. According to the present state of the law the executor represented the testator, as regarded his personal property, and had most complete power over his personal estate; but with regard to real estate there was no person who so represented the testator. If it were necessary to sell a part of the real estate to pay debts or legacies, or to pay portions, or to raise money by way of mortgage—for all the purposes which arose in the course of the administration of an estate when the real estate was called on to be auxiliary to the personal estate—from the want of a person to deal with the real estate, neither of these objects, so useful and necessary, could be effected without resort to the Court of Chancery and the institution of a regular suit. He proposed that the Court of Probate should be enabled, in certain cases where it might seem necessary or expedient, to appoint, with respect to the real estate, a person whom he would describe as “the real representative,” and that he should have, for all purposes of administration, power and authority, with respect to the real estate, correspondent with the power and authority over personal estate vested in the executor. These were the means by which an efficient administration of real and personal estate would be accomplished by the power and authority which it was proposed to give to the Testamentary Court.

The next subject, which was of extreme importance, was, to consider how he proposed to deal with the numerous class of persons—the judges, the registrars, the officers, and the proctors—who would be thrown out of employment—who would be deprived of their offices by this sweeping and universal change. Before he spoke further on this subject, it would be necessary to remind the House of what had been done by former Parliaments on this subject, and in anticipation of the time when the reform—now, he hoped, about to be accomplished—would take place. By the Act of 6 & 7 Will. IV., c. 77, it was provided—

“That in case the office of judge, registrar, or other officer of the ecclesiastical courts of England and Wales, except the Prerogative Court, should become vacant during the period therein mentioned, the persons who should be appointed thereto should accept and take such offices subject to such regulations and alterations as thereafter might be made by Parliament; and should not, by reason of such appointment, acquire a vested interest in any office, or a title to any compensation in respect thereof, in case such office should thereafter be abolished by Parliament.”

The time specified was twelve months, or to the then next Session of Parliament. That Act had been continued by subsequent statutes, down to 10 & 11 Vict., c. 98, by which Act the enactment was renewed in rather more stringent terms. The words were—

“Every person who shall have been appointed after the passing of the first-recited Act, or who shall be appointed after the passing of this Act, to the office of judge, registrar, or other officer of any ecclesiastical court in England, shall hold the same subject to all the regulations and alterations affecting the same, which may hereafter be made by Parliament, and that he shall not acquire any claim or title to compensation in case the same shall be hereafter altered or abolished by Act of Parliament."

It perhaps might occur to some hon. Gentleman that advantage might be taken of this enactment; and he was not prepared to say that there might not be cases in which they might be justified in taking advantage of that enactment. In looking over the appointments made in the diocesan courts, he had been shocked and grieved with many instances which had fallen under his observation. He had met with an instance of a right rev. Prelate appointing his son to the office of registrar—a boy seventeen years of age—and other instances in which appointments had been made of persons of still tenderer years. He had seen other appointments not consistent with that moral sense of obligation which ought always to guide and direct the appointment of individuals to public offices. But, notwithstanding instances of this kind, he thought that, as a general rule, the House would agree with him that, as those statutes had not been acted upon at all, and had been treated as a species of dead letter by Parliament—for they had been renewed from year to year—it would not be wise or just, or in conformity with the feelings of hon. Gentlemen, that an appeal should be made to those statutes, for the purpose of setting them up against any reasonable claim to compensation which might be brought forward by officers who might be dispossessed of their offices by the present Bill. He had examined the subject with some care, in order to ascertain that, with still very great relief to the people of England, by continuing merely the fees which were now paid for some period of time, both an adequate and a fair compensation might be given to all persons who were now in the enjoyment of offices proposed to be abolished, without resorting to either of those enactments which prohibited such compensation. He would, in Committee, endeavour to make intelligible the whole of the figures on which his plan of compensation was based, and he trusted it would be found that the plan was well grounded, and that it was a merciful and compassionate plan; that it was one which would have this benefit—that it would contribute to effect this reform by disarming that opposition which for the last thirty years had been successful in battling and defeating it. He would now enumerate those persons who were entitled to compensation.

He was obliged to begin with an individual whose name was probably familiar to most hon. Gentlemen, and who certainly stood in a position not very encouraging to the feeling or temptation to give him the full amount of compensation which he (the Solicitor General) proposed. It appeared that there prevailed in the Prerogative Court the most reprehensible practice of granting the office of the registrar of the court during the life of the occupant of the office. He was sorry to say that that practice, not only appeared to have been continued by archbishop after archbishop, but that the particular mode of dealing with the office had received the sanction of the House in a manner which would make it idle and absurd for them to complain of the practice which had been adopted. He would state the facts from the Report of the Commissioners. The last grant to the office was made by Archbishop Moore, in 1799, to the Rev. George Moore, the Rev. Charles Moore, and the Rev. Robert Moore—three of the sons of the archbishop. The Rev. Robert Moore was now entitled to all the emoluments of the office. That gentleman had been blessed with a long life, and since the year 1799 he had been in the enjoyment of a most perfect sinecure, amounting to 8,000*l.* per annum. Fifty-six years' enjoyment of a sinecure of 8,000*l.* a year! In the year 1828, the Rev. Charles Moore being dead, the Rev. George Moore and the Rev. Robert Moore, being then the surviving grantees, declined to make the usual surrender to enable Archbishop Sutton to regrant the office, and a private Act of Parliament was passed, enabling the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being, with the confirmation of the dean and chapter, to appoint to the office of principal registrar notwithstanding any prior grant; so that, nevertheless, there should not be more than three lives in the office at one and the same time. How that Act passed—who were asleep at the time—he did not stop to inquire; but, to a certain extent, it certainly stopped the right of the House to complain of a practice which it had itself thus formally acquiesced in, however reprehensible it might be. In virtue of that act, Archbishop Sutton made a grant to his grandson, Viscount Canterbury, subject to the rights of the Rev. George and the Rev. Robert Moore. The Rev. George Moore was since dead, but the Rev. Robert Moore was now alive; and after the passing of the Act of the 10 & 11 of the Queen, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1849, had made a grant of the office to Robert George Moncrief Sumner, Esq. He (the Solicitor General) did not mean to include the name of that gentleman as a person entitled to compensation. The three lives now were the Rev. Robert Moore, Viscount Canterbury, and Mr. Sumner. The Rev. Robert Moore, it appeared, had a right also to the building in which the wills were kept; and, therefore, it would be necessary, during the few remaining years of his life, to give him, as compensation, 8,000*l.* a year. When a grant of an annuity of 3,000*l.* a year was made by Parliament to Viscount Canterbury, there was a provision inserted that that annuity should cease when he came into the emoluments of this office. Therefore, when that event occurred there would be a saving of 3,000*l.* a year to the country. The returns made to Parliament in 1833 comprised the whole amount of the fees and income received by the Judges, registrars, and various other officers of the different dioecesan, peculiar, and other courts now proposed to be abolished. It appeared from these returns that after deducting the proctors—to whom he would not then refer, except to say that they were well provided for—that the whole income receivable by Judges, registrars, and other officers was something less than 38,000*l.* He thought himself that it was some considerable sum less than that amount; but he was desirous of taking a large margin, and if he erred to err on the right side—the compensation to Mr. Moore would amount to 7,000*l.*, and the total sum requisite for the officers whose offices would be abolished would be 42,000*l.* The expenses of the Prerogative Office of Canterbury were 19,000*l.*; and, as it was now proposed to augment the Testamentary Office, and thereby considerably increase its expense, it would be safe to compute the cost of the new office at 38,000*l.* The present Dean of Arches of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury might possibly retire from office; his salary was 4,000*l.* The aggregate of the sums above enumerated was something less than 100,000*l.* per annum. Then there remained the question of the proctors. It was first proposed to give to these gentlemen a priority of business in the new court for some time: but that course was afterwards thought to be not fair towards those gentlemen. He had a great desire to meet, in a liberal spirit, the fair claims of all these gentlemen with regard to the probable loss in their professions; he believed, however, that their apprehensions of loss would turn out to be unfounded, and that when they emerged from the shade of Doctors' Commons into the light of day, and exercised their profession on a more extended arena; their experience, skill, and sagacity would enable them to compete successfully with solicitors now practising their profession in the courts of Westminster Hall. At the same time, they were entitled to some reasonable equivalent for the risk of loss of practice which they would, at least, at first have to incur. This Bill, therefore, proposed to secure to these gentlemen for life an annuity equal to one-half the clear income now received by each of them from the testamentary branch of their business. That allowance, if it erred at all, would do so on the side of liberality, because the junior class of those who would receive it would, in addition, have a larger field opened to their professional exertions by this measure, while the seniors of the body would receive a handsome retiring pension. The number of proctors in London did not exceed 120, whose own estimate of their professional incomes, derivable from all descriptions of business, did not average more than 700*l.* per annum for each. Computing the incomes of the country proctors at the same amount, though they could hardly be so high, the compensation, at the rate of one-half their incomes, to be provided for the entire body would be 52,150*l.* Adding this item to the other charges before-mentioned for the Testamentary Offices, allowances to officers of dioecesan and peculiar courts, compensation to Mr. Moore, &c., the whole would amount to 144,150*l.* To meet this charge the annexation of the business of all the minor courts to that of the Prerogative Court, and the continuance of the fees of the latter tribunal would, according to the returns, provide a fee fund of 74,740*l.* This would be the aggregate of the fees of this court. The great saving to the people at large by the change proposed would be in the fact of the public being only obliged to employ one legal man, and not, as heretofore, two—a proctor and a solicitor—which induced the payment of two bills of costs. In the fees of court he did not propose at present to make any material deduction, save in what was called the proctor's fee, which was now calculated on a per centage of the stamp on the letters of probate or administration; and as proctors were to be abolished that would of course entail the abolition of the proctor's fee. The substitute for this fee he proposed should be this. By a return made to the House, he found that the proctor's fee, if the property was sworn under 100*l.*, was 9*s. 2d.*, or within 10*d.* of the amount of the stamp, which was 10*s.* He proposed that in future 3 per cent should be charged on the stamp, so that the public, under the new Bill, when the property was under 100*l.*, would be relieved of the proctor's fee, but would have to pay 1*s. 6d.* on the stamp. When the property amounted to 8,000*l.* or 9,000*l.*, an approximation to the fee now paid to the proctor would be charged. The present fee now paid on such a sum was 3*l. 8s. 2d.*, and the proposed charge under the substituted per centage on an amount so large would be 3*l. 7s. 10d.*, so that the charge would be always found less than that now paid. So, too, where the estate was 600*l.*, the proctor's fee of 2*l. 4s. 10d.* would only be 1*l. 13s.* This substitute for the proctor's fee he proposed should be paid into the testamentary fund. The income that the proctors would derive from the per centage fee would amount to the sum of 87,953*l.*; and this, with other fees, would yield a total of 158,661*l.*, which might be taken as the sum likely to be paid yearly in future to the fee fund of the court. That sum of 158,661*l.* was what they would have in order to meet the current charges of 144,000*l.*; thus leaving a margin of 15,000*l.* for other purposes. And this would be effected without any increase in the stamp duty. It must not be considered that the 144,000*l.* would be a permanent charge against the fee fund—such would not be the case; and if the business of the court increased the fees would be augmented, and the fund would be increased proportionately. This fund would be raised without entailing any new burthen on the suitors of the court. He hoped this was a plan which all might support, because it did not burthen the public, or deal injuriously with vested interests. He must now be allowed to express his obligation to the Registrar of Deaths and Marriages for the information and assistance he had rendered; and he had been informed by him that there were at present ample fire-proof rooms for the reception of all wills which now existed or which were likely to exist, for many generations to come. With respect to the locality and security of documents, abundant means would be devised to secure those objects, and a great convenience would be obtained by the public.

There was another class of gentlemen yet to be considered, the advocates of Doctors' Commons. He proposed they should be admitted to all the advantages enjoyed by barristers-at-law, and, no doubt, in the case of the more eminent the Lord Chancellor would feel it his duty to confer the privilege of silk gowns. He had no doubt they would be gainers by the change. They also possessed valuable property in connection with the present courts; he proposed that they should have every facility for disposing of it, and that they should have every compensation to which they were fairly entitled. There was another tribunal he wished to deal with—the Court of Admiralty; but, as a proposal for changes in that court were still under consideration, he might say he hoped the result would be to throw it open to the bar at large—a result he much desired to see.

As it would not be right, in effecting a reform of this kind, to leave in existence matters which would interfere with the uniform character of the scheme, he had to inform the House that another important subject, the establishment of a tribunal for all matters relating to marriages, was under consideration. A Bill on the subject was very nearly prepared, and immediately after the Easter recess it would be brought into that or the other House of Parliament. Both measures, therefore, might be considered together, and both, after discussion, would, he hoped, be brought into such a shape as to admit of their being passed into law.

There was one provision which he regretted that he had not been able to introduce into the present Bill. In proposing to bring to a metropolitan tribunal the whole of the jurisdiction now exercised by courts of inferior jurisdiction in the country, he was aware of the extreme advantage of giving to persons in the country the benefit of local administration for small estates. Therefore, it had been his desire to confer on County Courts the power of administering to next of kin intestate property which did not exceed the value of 300*l.*, and also of adjudicating, on a remit for that purpose by the Court of Probate, on all contested matters where the estate to be administered did not exceed the like sum. Objections, however, were felt to this provision in quarters entitled to respect, on the ground that, however desirable such an enactment might be in the abstract, at present the condition of County Courts was not such as would enable them with benefit to exercise such jurisdiction. He was afraid that that objection might arise from the peculiar bias of a lawyer's mind, which was not satisfied in respect to any amendment of the law, unless a great amount of protection in the administration of justice was provided. A very high price for our advanced state of civilisation was paid in the great complexity and intricacy attending the administration of justice, but in reference to small estates he thought they might be satisfied with the administration of what might vulgarly be called rough and ready justice, sufficient for the purpose, and preferable to a costly administration, which, in case of small properties not able to support great expenses in law proceedings, amounted to a denial of justice. He should, therefore, be glad to invite attention to this subject, though he could not now introduce any provision with respect to it, in order that the House might consider whether it would object to make the experiment he had suggested.

These were the principal points which he now had to submit to the House, and, seeing the interest which existed on the subject out of doors, he hoped the House would forgive him for having trespassed so long on its time. The Bill contained a clause for rendering one probate universal for England, Scotland, and Ireland, but he had some misgivings as to the practical working of that particular provision in respect to Scotland, on account of the different systems of law that prevailed in the two countries; and if, on discussion, it was thought that it would not work with facility, its application to Scotland might be omitted from the Bill. In conclusion, the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the subject of the Church Discipline Act, with respect to which, he said, he had not now the authority of the Government to speak; but he had prepared a measure relating to it, which would be laid before the Government for their consideration. He would now move for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the Jurisdiction of all the Ecclesiastical and Peculiar Courts in England and Wales respecting Wills and Administrations, to establish a distinct Court of Probate and Administration, and otherwise amend the Law in relation to matters testamentary.

MR. NAPIER said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the introduction of the Bill, or to comment upon the details which had been brought forward so clearly and ably by the learned Solicitor General. What struck him as somewhat extraordinary in listening to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was, that he remembered that last Session, when a testamentary jurisdiction Bill was passed through the House of Lords, and had come down to the Commons, but no decision was come to upon the measure, the Lord Chancellor gave as his reason for not proceeding with the Bill, that it was necessary to consider the whole subject of the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, and that it would be idle to deal merely with the question of testamentary jurisdiction alone. The House appeared to him to be placed in a curious position, for last year the same Lord Chancellor, the law officers of the Crown being the same, made that statement, and now they were called upon, instead of dealing with the entire subject of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, to deal with only one branch of it—a testamentary jurisdiction Bill—a vague promise only being given that a marriage and divorce Bill was under consideration, and he believed that the hon. and learned Solicitor General had stated that there was some intention of considering the question of Church discipline. He did not deny that the proposed Bill might be, as far as related to testamentary jurisdiction alone, a very excellent Bill; but it was testamentary jurisdiction which mainly supported the staff of the ecclesiastical courts, and if that jurisdiction were removed from them, these courts would be left in a mutilated condition for other jurisdiction in matters of marriage divorce, and Church discipline. He perfectly agreed with the Lord Chancellor in the opinion he expressed last year, as to the propriety of legislating upon the whole subject, and in consequence he felt some difficulty in knowing how to give his support to the present instalment of reform. The Bill, as far he had been able to gather, differed from that of last year, inasmuch as it proposed, instead of transferring testamentary jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, to establish a Court of Probate to which that jurisdiction should be given. When that proposition was made last year the Lord Chancellor stated that in framing the Bill which he then introduced it was framed against the recommendation of the majority of the Commissioners, but that the recommendation of that Commission had been protested against by the Master of the Rolls, the Solicitor

General, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham); and yet the Solicitor General now proposed to contravene the principle of the Bill then introduced and to establish a new Court of Probate. The Bill introduced last Session passed through the House of Lords, and how could it be expected that a Bill entirely contravening that measure, even if passed by the House of Commons, would receive the assent of the other House of Parliament? It appeared to him that the course taken between the two Houses of Parliament, and by the same persons, was precisely that best adapted to secure the rejection of the Bill, and to defer an important measure of reform, which, however, ought to embrace the whole subject of the ecclesiastical courts. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not propose to enact any new system of Church discipline, and yet the present state of the law on that subject was most unsatisfactory, and there was a delay in the procedure which amounted to a denial of justice. The Lord Chancellor said it was important to have a reform of the ecclesiastical courts, and yet by this measure the ecclesiastical courts were to be left in a worse position than before. The hon. and learned Gentleman was proposing a testamentary Bill in direct contradiction to that which received the assent of the House of Lords. Now that this subject was being dealt with, would it not be easier and better to carry out a substantial measure of reform in every department of the ecclesiastical courts, to accompany this Bill concerning testamentary jurisdiction by a marriage Bill, and have, moreover, a Church discipline Bill? The present state of Church discipline, while it was disgraceful to the Church, was also most injurious to the interests of religion. There ought to be a tribunal which would claim and possess the confidence of members of the establishment, and which would exert authority as a court of appeal in matters of discipline. At present, even in the case of a delinquent clergyman, he believed the cause could not proceed without a kind of begging-box going round for funds to carry the case forward. Was this a decent state of things as regarded the Church? So far, however, from treating this matter as a whole, the hon. and learned Gentleman only took up a part of that large scheme of reform which was proposed last year. There ought properly to be a similar Bill for Ireland. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: "Hear!"] and the wise course would be to take the ecclesiastical courts of the two countries, and to deal with them, not by piecemeal, but as a whole, embracing in the measure the three subjects of testamentary jurisdiction, marriage and divorce, and Church discipline. If the Solicitor General did this he would have the support of both sides of the House, and every assistance would be given to him in order to carry out a perfect and complete reform of the ecclesiastical courts.

MR. MALINS said, he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill. The subject was one of the very greatest importance, and every proposition respecting it deserved the serious consideration of the House. To the Bill introduced last year into the House of Lords he had been prepared to offer his most determined opposition; but in the month of July the Government had thought proper to withdraw the measure. He congratulated the hon. and learned Gentleman on having now brought in a Bill so materially different from its predecessor; but he still objected to the proposal that the testamentary jurisdiction should be transferred to the Court of Chancery. The Commission of 1853, composed of men of the highest eminence, and free from any particular bias, had reported against adopting that course by a majority of ten to three, and had recommended the establishment of a Court having testamentary jurisdiction, but entirely unconnected with the Court of Chancery. The hon. and learned Gentleman now proposed to establish a distinct court which should be a branch of the Court of Chancery. Now he (Mr. Malins) confessed that he could not collect from the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend any reason why testamentary jurisdiction should be transferred to that Court. Last year he presented two petitions against the plan now proposed by the Solicitor General; one petition had also been presented, signed by the Lord Mayor and by 258 leading bankers and merchants of the City of London, who expressed their anxiety and alarm at the proposed transfer of the testamentary jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, and who bore testimony to the satisfactory manner in which the business was conducted in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, with accuracy, despatch, and security for the public interest; there was also another petition from professional men, from a body of solicitors, although against their own interest, since the measure which they opposed would have thrown open the testamentary business to the profession at large, instead of its belonging to an exclusive class of proctors; but they represented that, in their opinion, the mode of conducting the common form business in the Prerogative Court was very satisfactory, and that it could only be necessary to make some improvements, and a change of name, calling it the Court of Probate, instead of an Ecclesiastical Court; but they prayed that its business might still be conducted by the present body of practitioners in Doctors' Commons. By the present system there was never any difficulty in obtaining probate of a will in two or three days, and it was not even necessary to employ a solicitor. There was a very accurate registration of wills, and we might go and ask for the will of any person within the last two centuries, only giving his name and the year in which he died; we might see that will in a few minutes, or have it copied for a moderate fee; and every gentleman who had acted as an executor must be aware that it was not the proctor's Bill, but the Government stamp, which constituted the expense of proving a will. To show the extent of this business, in the year 1852-3, there were between 13,000 and 14,000 wills proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, representing property of more than 50,000,000*l.* sterling; and, in addition to those, 5,000 administrations were granted, making altogether about 18,000 grants of testamentary jurisdiction out of that Prerogative Court. Such was the common form business of the Court. The other part of its business was the contentious business; and how many of the wills proved in that year were opposed? Why, only forty; of which cases some were protracted and others not. Now, it was proposed to break up that business and transfer it to the Court of Chancery, and for this change the public would have to pay 42,000*l.* a year to compensate the proctors for the loss of their emoluments. The country would gain nothing, only this Court, instead of being called Her Majesty's Court of Probate or Testamentary Court, it would be called a testamentary branch of the Court of Chancery. What reason had his hon. and learned Friend assigned for transferring this business to the Court of Chancery? The only reason offered was, that sometimes, while a will was contested, the Court of Chancery was applied to for the protection of the property pendente lite; but in the Court of Vice Chancellor Stuart, where he (Mr. Malins) practised, there had not been a single motion of the kind for the last two years; and he believed that if the records of the Court were searched, there would not be found three applications for a receiver pendente lite. With regard to personal property, the testamentary courts now had power to grant limited probate, and if they had no power over real estate, neither would the proposed Court. According to the hon. and learned Gentleman, a great object of this Bill was to give the Testamentary Court the power of for ever settling the validity or invalidity of a will. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that for a long period the practice had been to allow an heir-at-law contesting a will to bring actions of ejectment, one after another, until he was stopped by a court of equity, but the hon. and learned Gentleman forgot that the Court of Chancery had recently decided that wherever a devisee claimed under a will, and the heir-at-law threatened litigation, he might file a bill against the heir-at-law, praying to have the will established against him. He quite agreed that the practice of the Court of Chancery had been immeasurably improved, and such a Bill would be a very simple matter, not occupying more than four or five printed pages. It would set out the will and pray to have it established against the heir-at-law. The heir-at-law must then either come in and contest it, in which event he would be entitled to try the question by an issue, or he must admit the validity of the will, and there would be an end of the matter. If that could be done now, there was no necessity to give as a new power what already existed. He thought on these grounds the hon. and learned Gentleman had failed to show any reason for abolishing the present Court. All were agreed that it ought to be a temporal and not an ecclesiastical court; and if it were a separate court now, by this measure the court would still be separate, though it went under the name of a branch of the Court of Chancery. It could not be said that the business was inefficiently performed, either by the Judge, the advocates, or the proctors. All the evidence was to the contrary, and more especially it went to show that it was a great protection to the public to have the business in the hands of a limited body of men of great respectability, whose experience easily detected any attempts at fraud. The existence of a body of men like the proctors, only 120 in number, most respectable practitioners immediately under the eye of the Judge, who were responsible for the accuracy of the documents they proposed for probate, was a very great safeguard; for if the solicitor who drew the will had been guilty of a fraud, he was bound to take it to the proctor, whose experienced eye would probably detect what was wrong. It was now proposed that, instead of a proctor, independent of him who drew the will, any country solicitor, who was a commissioner for administering oaths, should take a printed form of affidavit, and send it filled up, by post, to the officer of the court for examination. Upon such a transaction as that, the safeguard against any fraud was to depend. It was not likely that any salaried public officer would ever perform the duty with as great vigilance as a professional man like the proctor, whose reputation depended upon it. The security was so great now, that a forged will was almost a thing unknown; the public would lose that protection, but would gain no other advantage; and the Government would not gain anything, for the amount of the stamp would be the same. He admitted that many of the peculiar jurisdictions throughout the country had brought the present system into some disfavour; and he concurred as to the propriety of abolishing them; but why should the whole body of proctors—the Court which worked admirably, and the Judge who did his duty to the entire satisfaction of the public—be superseded by a new court with inexperienced practitioners? Why should 42,000*l.* a year be paid to a body of men as compensation for refraining from duties which they were anxious to perform, and which they had hitherto performed without any complaints being made against them? His hon. and learned Friend had said, as he understood, that it being impracticable to give testamentary jurisdiction to the County Courts, all will cases would be brought to one metropolitan tribunal. That was contrary to the legislation of late years, which brought justice to every man's door; and, contrary to the recommendations of the Commission, that in all cases of wills below a certain amount they should still be allowed to be proved in the country, and deposited there for inspection. What an expense it would be to oblige all those people to leave their homes and come to London for the purpose. He trusted the Government would take that seriously into their consideration. The Commissioners were perfectly satisfied that the duties were well performed, and that the officers could not be abolished without injury to the public; he therefore thought it advisable still to retain some of these small jurisdictions, as recommended by the Commissioners, for the deposit of wills of limited amount, where the cost of proving them would be small, and where they could be inspected at a moderate expense. He, therefore, saw no advantage in opening the business to the whole profession, at a cost of 40,000*l.* The Solicitor General had stated none beyond transferring the business to the Court of Chancery. The new jurisdiction could not advance a step until they had decided whether the instrument was a will or not; they would then have to determine who was entitled under it. Upon general principles, he thought that the Court of Chancery, being totally inexperienced, was not adapted to decide the question whether a testamentary document was a will or not. At present we had a vast establishment for this purpose, with extensive buildings, and more were required. How the Solicitor General was to find room in Lincoln's Inn, or out of it, for the new business, he could not conceive. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would thoroughly reconsider the matter, and would come to the conclusion that Doctors' Commons ought to be maintained, with its establishment of advocates and proctors. Of the latter there were about 120; it was not proposed to compensate the whole of those, but only those who were in good practice.

MR. KEOUGH said, that whatever might have been the preconceived opinions of gentlemen with respect to these tribunals, they must have listened with satisfaction to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Malins), because, though they might have been accustomed to think that the ecclesiastical courts were not the least expensive or cumbrous in the country, they had the assurance of the hon. and learned Gentleman that they were in every respect the most valuable courts that human ingenuity could devise, and that, amid their numerous merits—all of which he had not time in his short speech to enumerate—the most remarkable was that they cost the country scarcely anything. Everything that could be desired was, according to his hon. and learned Friend, to be found in Doctors' Commons, and the only regret was that the establishments there were not extensive enough, and the jurisdiction of the courts not sufficiently enlarged. All that his hon. and learned Friend seemed to think necessary for the perfection of Doctors' Commons was an increase of the establishments and an extension of the jurisdiction; and, holding this opinion, he was, of course, opposed to the Bill now before the House. He (Mr. Keogh) however, believed that notwithstanding all that had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford, the public were right in the view which they had long since taken of these courts, and of the course that ought to be pursued with regard to them—that was, that they were an abomination which ought to be instantly swept away. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier)—“why propose this partial reform, when you leave behind such great abuses.”—was the old argument used against every reform that had ever been brought forward. The right hon. Gentleman had asked, “Why don't you deal with the matrimonial jurisdiction? Why don't you deal with the Church discipline question?” Now he recollects that in the year 1850 he himself had introduced a Bill for the reform of the ecclesiastical courts in Ireland, which was subsequently referred to the consideration of a Select Committee of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member; but so far was he from taking the view of the question which he put forward on the present occasion, that the right hon. Gentleman had actually voted against almost every reform which was proposed in that Committee. Great injustice had been done to the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. As far, however, as he understood, that proposal was simply this—to transfer to a court in connection with and forming a part of the Court of Chancery, and therefore having all the powers of administration and construction that were vested in the Court of Chancery, the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) had, indeed, told the House that these courts were inexpensive, and their form of procedure very rapid. All he could say in reply was, that a Committee, on which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) had sat, in 1850, had come to the most opposite conclusion. The House might rest assured that the only possible way of reforming these courts was to copy the example set in Scotland some forty years ago, and sweep them away altogether and transfer their jurisdiction to the ordinary tribunals of the country. It was said that these courts entailed no expense on the country; but it was the opinion of a Committee that sat on the subject, that the expenses of the Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland—and they were not more expensive than the same courts in England—reached an amount out of all proportion to the property involved. Having such feelings on the subject, it was, therefore, a matter of the greatest satisfaction to him to be able to state that on the very first day after the Easter recess he would be able to lay upon the table a Bill proposing to do for the Irish courts what the Bill of his learned Friend proposed to do for England; and as for the question which had been addressed to his hon. and learned Friend, why have you not prepared a Bill with reference to the matrimonial jurisdiction and with reference to Church discipline? he was able to state that on the first subject his hon. Friend had already prepared a Bill; and with regard to the second a Bill had also been prepared, which, however, had not as yet received the sanction of the Cabinet.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, he was convinced of the necessity of severing the spiritual from the civil jurisdiction of these tribunals; but he would reserve his observations on the details of the measure before the House for the Committee. It must be remembered, however, that there really was an ecclesiastical jurisdiction properly so called, of these courts, which it was important to ameliorate and preserve. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier) asked why the Government did not deal with that jurisdiction and institute a proper appellate court in cases of ecclesiastical offences? But it would be found that a more difficult problem could not be proposed to Parliament. Hon. Gentlemen should bear in mind the difficulties of this question, as to the reform of the civil jurisdiction of these courts, and that this was the forty-fourth year since the first attempt was made to reform the testamentary courts by Lord Stowell in 1812, and that after that no attempt was made until Lord Grey's Government. Mr. Phillimore then enumerated the various Bills brought in by successive Governments up to the present time. He thought, however, that the Solicitor General, in attributing the opposition to any reform solely to the pertinacity of those who had vested interests in these courts, had given a most inadequate cause for such a continuing effect. With regard to the profession connected with the ecclesiastical courts in London, he would challenge contradiction when he said, that all the reports as well as all the evidence that had been taken on the subject had borne unvarying testimony to the great ability with which all persons connected with them had discharged their duties. The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Keogh) had spoken of the enormous expenses of these courts. He (Dr. Phillimore) could not give an opinion as to what these expenses might be in Ireland, but in England the fees would bear comparison with those of the common law courts and the courts of equity, and he recollects that in the Braintree case, the expense of the application for a prohibition had cost twice as much as both in the Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber, as it had cost in the Ecclesiastical Court. He thought that the compensation proposed to be given to those who would be injured by this act would afford those parties no good ground for complaint, seeing that it was the same in principle, though less in degree, as that which had been awarded by Parliament in the case of the reforms of the Common Law and of Chancery, and of the Consistorial Courts of Scotland; as far as he himself was concerned, he might be permitted to say that, his first speech in this House had been to declare his earnest readiness to reform the abuses of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and that during the short time in which he had enjoyed the honour of a seat in this House, that he had, by the indulgence of the House, been enabled to carry two measures through this House, one in the last Session for introducing civis vox evidence into the Ecclesiastical Courts, which had become law; another for abolishing their jurisdiction in suits for defamation, which he hoped was about to become law. He should certainly vote for the first reading of the Bill committing himself to this principle only—that it was high time that the House of Commons, acting upon its resolution so often expressed, should take away the civil jurisdiction from the spiritual courts, and that it was an anomaly not justified by reason or practice, or the state of religion, or the state of feeling in this country, to continue to the archbishops and bishops' courts the power of dealing with the administration of intestates' effects and testaments of persons of all religions and classes in this country.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON expressed his disappointment at being obliged to infer, from what had passed that night, that the Government intended to deal with only one branch of the important question of the reform of the ecclesiastical courts. The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Keogh) had misconceived the observation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member of Dublin University, when he imputed to him a sentiment of opposition to the plan of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier) merely expressed his regret, which was perfectly justified, that the Government had not availed themselves of that opportunity of settling the questions of church discipline and matrimonial jurisdiction simultaneously with that relating to testamentary matters. If the latter question were adjusted separately as now proposed, the two other branches of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, it was to be feared, would be left in a very unsatisfactory state. The Lord Chancellor, in the other House, in withdrawing the Bill of last Session on this subject, intimated that the Government would, during the recess, consider it, with a view to legislation on the whole subject. This was not a party question, but one on the necessity of settling which both sides of the House concurred; and it was therefore most desirable that the Government should grapple with it in all its bearings.

MR. HADFIELD thought the country much indebted to the Solicitor General for introducing this measure, as the improvement of testamentary jurisdiction was one of the most urgent of law reforms. The country now obtained a revenue of about 3,000,000*l.* annually from wills and intestacies, and, therefore, the legal processes incident to the distribution of property ought to be facilitated and cheapened as much as possible. Some doubt had been intimated whether the Bill would be applicable to Scotland; but he was glad to hear that it was intended to extend it to that country, where it was quite as much wanted as it was in England.

MR. BOWYER said, he differed from many of the opinions which had been expressed, but he thought the measure contained many valuable provisions; it would very much improve the law and simplify in a great degree the administration of justice in testamentary matters. But he thought some further simplification was requisite. He thought a separate exclusive court and jurisdiction for testamentary matters was unnecessary. In his opinion wills ought to be dealt with in the same manner as deeds and other instruments inter vivos. The Solicitor General proposed that there should be one branch of the Court of Chancery exclusively for probate of wills, but this must lead to the same inconvenience as if there were two separate and distinct courts, because that court would not be able to entertain questions relating to the construction of wills, which must be referred to the ordinary tribunals of the country; so that there would still be two separate courts having jurisdiction over these matters. The recommendations of the Real Property Commissioners avoided this difficulty by maintaining the principle which he now contended for—that the administration of wills did not differ in any essential respect from that of deeds, and should be dealt with by the same jurisdiction. The question of probate had not been grappled with, and was deserving the attention of his hon. and learned Friend. If probate was not necessary for real property; why should it be required for personal property? As for questions relating to capacity and the construction of wills, he regarded a separate and peculiar jurisdiction as wholly unnecessary for their decision. So also with questions of intestacy. The best plan to adopt would be to get rid of separate testamentary jurisdiction altogether, and allow these questions to be left to the ordinary court of law, to be decided in the ordinary course of the administration of justice. That was the course pursued with regard to wills of real estate, and it was supported by the practice of every other country in Europe, and by the doctrine of the civil law.

THE LORD ADVOCATE was ready to admit that uniformity of law between England and Scotland was a very desirable object, but apprehended that its attainment would be a matter of considerable difficulty. The important question of allowing probate in England to run in Scotland and confirmation in Scotland to suffice for England which was involved in the extension of this Bill to Scotland, would require very great consideration. It must be a reciprocal right, and great care would also have to be taken in adjusting the jurisdictions of the two countries on a fair and equal basis.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS (1855) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that two years ago a Bill was passed for the purpose of constituting a Board, and that certain powers were given to the Commissioners for the purpose of superintending and regulating the charities of the kingdom. Under that Act the Board consisted of a permanent Chief Commissioner, two other Commissioners—one permanent, and one appointed only for four years—two inspectors, and a secretary. There was also to be at the head of the Board a functionary who was not paid. The Board was constituted soon after the close of

Session 1853. Unfortunately for the interests of the public, the temporary member of the Board, a gentleman of considerable experience in these matters—Mr. Jones—had since died, and it was necessary to fill up the vacancy. The first object of this Bill would therefore be to give powers for the appointment of a new permanent Commissioner, because the business of the Commission had been found to be so great, that it would be impossible for the Government to get any competent person to accept the office for a period of merely two years from the present time. He had seen it stated in the public papers, that the Board had done nothing; but he could not admit that to be a fair representation of the fact. They had not done as much as could be wished, because they had not the powers which he was going to ask should be conferred by the present Bill; but they had done a great deal, as was evident from the Report, which had been some time in their Lordships' hands. They were only appointed in the autumn of 1853, and during the year 1854 they had received 1,100 applications for advice from persons connected with the administration of charities. In questions of a minor nature and involving matters of small pecuniary amount, the great object was to have the funds administered with tolerable discretion, if not in strict conformity with the trusts; and for that reason a clause was introduced into the Bill of 1853, by which trustees, doubting how they should administer charities, could ask the advice of the Commissioners, and, acting upon that advice—which in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred was not only discreet, but in conformity with the trusts—they were indemnified. That most beneficial and important power had been very largely exercised. Another power, which had also been exercised to a very considerable extent, and was also of a very useful character, was that which enabled the Board to give authority to trustees to lease land, not only on fair leases, but on building and mining leases, and in some cases even to alienate them. Many charities had been inquired into, and numerous had been the applications to the Board for permission to institute proceedings where abuses existed, which, accordingly as they thought themselves warranted, the Commissioners had either sanctioned or refused. There were a great many other minor matters in which the Commissioners had acted, and upon which they observed in their Report. The very useful power which enabled the Commissioners to call for distinct accounts of charities had not been complied with by anything like the whole of the charitable trusts of the kingdom. They had received returns only from about 10,000 out of 25,000 trusts, and it was obviously necessary that some legislative interference should take place in that matter. The Board, to a certain extent, had been efficient, and with more extensive powers could be rendered far more efficient. In the first instance, it was proposed by this Bill to sanction the appointment of a third permanent, instead of the late temporary, Commissioner, because the business was found to be more than had been contemplated, and no person who was competent would accept the office, to be turned out of it in a very short period. In the progress of the working of the Act, the Commissioners had discovered a number of minute matters, with respect to which they suggested that alterations would be expedient. They were of too trifling a nature to make it necessary for him to enter into details, and he would therefore confine himself to the more prominent alterations which he proposed. By the Act of 1853 the Commissioners could only recommend and authorise trustees to appeal either to the Court of Chancery or some local court for the purpose of doing certain acts, such as appointing new trustees or settling schemes for the administration of the Charity; but it was found that, in matters of small amount, the sanctioning an appeal to a Court of Justice was really refusing the trustees what they wanted, because they allowed the matter to drop rather than be involved in expense, vexation, and delay. In by far the larger number of cases which the Commissioners had sanctioned no application had been made, and, to obviate that difficulty, power was given by this Bill to the Commissioners to do the acts themselves, subject to an appeal to the Court of Chancery, in a summary way, if what they did were not satisfactory to the parties. Another case in which the Commissioners found they had no authority, and in which it would be of great advantage to the public if authority were given them, was that of charities appropriated to particular parishes, which parishes were divided; and the question was then raised how such charities were to be appropriated. This Bill would give the Commissioners power to apportion the parochial charities, subject, as in the other case, to an appeal to the Court of Chancery if their apportionment were disapproved. The Commissioners found that it would be in many cases a great saving of expense, if the legal estate, as lawyers called it, was vested in an official person; and this Bill would give facilities for vesting lands and other property in an official trustee, the management of the charity however would be left entirely in the hands of the previous trustees. The Act of 1853 was deficient in reference to enabling parties to make exchanges or partitions, and by this Bill that defect would be remedied. There was no power under the former Act of taxing costs, and it was proposed to enable that to be done by reference to a taxing Master of the Court of Chancery. In cases where Commissioners called for accounts under the authority either of this or the former Act, and their request was disobeyed, it was proposed to treat the default as a contempt of the Court of Chancery, as the most efficient means of compelling parties to comply with what the law enjoined them to do. The Bill also pointed out generally what were the accounts which the Commissioners from time to time were to call upon these parties to render, leaving them to enter into the details hereafter. This was the outline of the measure. There were a great number of smaller clauses, which it would be idle and useless to detail at any time, still less when there was so thin an attendance of their Lordships. There was, however, one matter of a more substantial nature. Under the Act of 1853, it was provided that the Commissioners should not, for two years after the passing of the Act, or from the end of the present Session of Parliament, interfere with Roman Catholic charities; it was now necessary to deal with that subject, which was not without difficulties. At first he had thought it better to deal with it in a separate Bill, but, upon consideration, he was inclined to make it a part of this measure. There was a difficulty in dealing with the subject, and the difficulty arose in this way. For a century and a half, charities for the benefit of Roman Catholics—for instance, for schools and for the maintenance of priests—had existed, though at the time they were constituted they were illegal; and in one sense they were, therefore, not constituted at all. In order to preserve the property appropriated to the support of these charities, a conveyance was made of it to secret trustees, who applied it to the purposes intended by the founders of the charities. These charities had existed illegally, for, as he had stated, a century and a half to the present time. With regard to a large portion of these charities—those which referred to the maintenance of Roman Catholic places of worship—if they had been constituted since the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, they would have been perfectly legal: He therefore saw not the least difficulty in dealing with them, any more than with property connected with Dissenters' chapels; the trust for which had also been constituted at a time when those purposes were illegal, Parliament had dealt with them by enacting, that if the chapels had been used for the purpose stated for twenty-five years no inquiry should take place; and that as the purpose had become legal, the trusts should continue. He saw no difficulty in dealing with the Roman Catholic chapels in the same manner; that was to say, that the trusts relating to anything now lawful, instead of being administered secretly, should be permitted to be exercised openly. But it could not be concealed that many of those secret trusts for Roman Catholic charities were now illegal, and came within the definition of what used to be called "superstitious uses," and which certainly could not be constituted at the present time. He had consulted with Roman Catholics, in order to ascertain what were their sentiments on the subject; and he thought that among rational Roman Catholics there would be no objection to the mode of dealing he proposed. There was no doubt that where the trust was made up of purposes partly legal and partly illegal, the whole of it would be dealt with, and that portion of it which was illegal would be considered as though an information had been filed by the Attorney General; but with regard to those Roman Catholic charities which were wholly illegal, he proposed to exempt them from the operation of the powers of the Commissioners, in order not to allow them to be interfered with, except by the Attorney General. These additional clauses he proposed to print and submit to the consideration of the House before he asked their Lordships to go into Committee on the Bill.

Moved. That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, the Bill was important, as it altered an Act which had been very carefully considered in Select Committee, and he thought that it should undergo a similar ordeal. He was not disposed to resist the Bill; on the contrary, he was inclined to think that in a great degree it was proper; but it required full consideration, especially the religious portion of it, which was one of great difficulty. It was now proposed to create a third paid Commissioner. Care must be taken lest a Board constituted in case of the subject did not become so cumbrous and costly that it would be a relief to remit the suitors to the Court of Chancery, from which this Act had taken them. He should move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE was glad to hear that the noble and learned Lord did not object to the second reading of the Bill, and could assure him that there would be no objection to the course proposed of referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MACKINNON said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) proposed to make any alteration with respect to Clause 103. He did not concur in the principle of vesting the whole power in vestries. There were also certain other clauses in the Bill which had reference to the power of raising money which required careful consideration.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought there could be no question that great credit was due to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Marylebone, for the labour he had bestowed upon the Bill, or that some measure of a similar character, though not precisely like that before the House, was desired by the whole of the inhabitants of the metropolis. For his own part, he considered that what was wanted was a Bill by which the existing Parliamentary boroughs, including Greenwich and the new borough, proposed in Lord John Russell's late Reform Bill, to be formed out of Kensington and Chelsea—in all, nine boroughs, should be incorporated. He thought that there ought also to be one central body, which he would make a very important one, and at the head of which he would place the Lord Mayor. The Bill of the right hon. Baronet did contain a provision similar to this, and he regarded it as a very valuable proposal. If the metropolis were divided into nine municipal corporations instead of thirty-six districts, all those public works which were to be executed by the local Government would be carried on with much greater harmony, economy, and effect, than would be the case under the present Bill. Nevertheless, the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, as it stood, was one calculated to confer great benefit upon the metropolis. Before, however, they were called upon to support the second reading, he thought that they ought to have more clearly defined the exact powers which it was proposed to give the central body under schedule D. He considered that the whole sewerage of the metropolis ought to be placed in that schedule in the same manner as it had been placed in the hands of the Metropolitan Commissioners since 1848. If that were done, then the central body ought to have sufficient borrowing powers to enable them to carry out a complete system of drainage, and the money so raised ought to be repaid in, say, fifty yearly instalments, for he did not think that the cost of the very expensive works that would be necessary ought to be thrown entirely upon the present owners of property. He did not think the powers given by the Bill to vestries were sufficiently defined. He objected also to the clause by which a 40*l.* qualification was required of members of the local boards. In some parts of the metropolis a 25*l.* house was quite equal to one of 40*l.* in other districts, and he was afraid the effect of the 40*l.* clause would be greatly to limit the inhabitants in their choice of men to fill the office. He knew that houses in several parts of the metropolis were depreciated greatly in value—to the extent of twenty-five or thirty per cent—in consequence of the defective state of the drainage. He would not offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill, and was ready to admit that the great body of the inhabitants of the metropolis were thankful to the right hon. Baronet for the elaborate pains he had bestowed on this measure.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he must appeal to the right hon. Baronet not to proceed with the second reading of the Bill in so thin a House, or, at all events, to refer the Bill, if read a second time, to a Select Committee. The inhabitants of Southwark, in a recent meeting, had expressed their opinion that the borough ought rather to be restored to its ancient influential position in the metropolis than cut up into a number of small districts. They thought that there ought to be two central bodies to manage the sewerage of London—one for the north and the other for the south of the river. At present the inhabitants of Southwark had some semblance of municipal institutions, and they had certainly no desire to part with their high bailiff. It was true the Bill would put an end to a number of self-elected coteries; but if Hobhouse's Act were adopted it would destroy all the open vestries, which were the safeguard of the country, so far as public discussion was concerned.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought the thinness of the House was easily accounted for. It was not every day that the Emperor and Empress of the French did us the honour to pay us a visit, and he only wished that the metropolis, both as regarded its buildings, its paving, and its drainage, was in a fitter state to receive those distinguished personages. At the same time he thought that if they had had an Act like this Bill in operation, they would have been able to do much. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) had expressed an opinion that it would be well to amalgamate the City of London with the rest of the metropolis; and, perhaps, it might be right to ask when they were to have the promised Corporation Reform Bill? Other corporations had been reformed long ago, and he wondered whether they would be able to get through Temple Bar this year? With respect to the Bill now before them, it appeared to contain provisions of a very despotic and arbitrary kind. The only thing that would make them tolerable was, that the powers proposed to be given would be administered upon the representative principle. In some of the parishes—St. Giles's and St. George's, Hanover Square, for instance—they would not give a farthing for the Bill, unless it adopted Hobhouse's Act. On the other hand, if they went a little further east, they would find other parishes—such as Clerkenwell, St. Luke's, and Islington, which rather objected to that Act. Nor was it hard to give a reason for this difference of opinion. Under Hobhouse's Act the qualification was 40*l.*, whereas in Islington it was 25*l.*, and in St. Luke's and Clerkenwell only 20*l.* Something should be done to meet this objection; in other respects he believed the Bill would give universal satisfaction.

MR. BUTLER said, that the Bill had been attentively considered by his constituents, and it was found that some of its clauses would not work well for the Tower Hamlets. He thought, however, that when some alterations were made in the Bill, which might be done in Committee, it might be passed, and he was willing to allow the second reading to be taken.

MR. BRADY said, he believed that the measure which had been introduced to the House would act beneficially in a sanitary point of view for the metropolis. He hoped the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Pellatt) would not press his objection, for he trusted that the Bill would not be delayed. Nothing could be worse than the state of the south portion of the metropolis.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the Bill, which he thought, with some few alterations, would be a most useful measure.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he should be very sorry if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee. The practical result of such a course would be, that the House would hear no more of it that Session, and they would be without any legislation for the improvement of the metropolis. It was not likely that this Session would be productive of many measures of improvement and amelioration; but he trusted they should have to boast that they had passed such a Bill as the present very judicious measure for the metropolis; and if they did so, they would effect a public object of no ordinary magnitude and value. It had been asked by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) whether it was the intention of the Government to propose any measure for the reform of the City Corporation during the present Session. He thought it most desirable, if such a Bill were to be proposed, that it should be introduced, and be before the House during the discussion of the Bill for the local Government of the metropolis at large, as there were many points which would of necessity be common to both the measures. He did not believe that they should be putting the Government of the metropolis on a satisfactory footing, if they did not at the same time deal with the City of London, properly so called. He could not blame the Government for having given precedence to the larger measure, but he hoped that no time would be lost in bringing forward the measure referring to the City of London. He entirely agreed with the principle of the Bill now before the House, though some of the details might require further consideration in Committee. He was not sure whether it would not be necessary to place some check on the power of these municipal bodies to tax the ratepayers, and also on their power of mortgaging the rates. But these were matters of detail, which would be best considered in Committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY: It is, Sir, the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose a Bill to Parliament during the present Session, for the reform of the corporation of the City of London. The public and the Government are, I am sure, deeply indebted to my right hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) and his colleagues, for the care and attention which they bestowed last year upon this matter, as Members of the Commission of inquiry. A Bill founded on their recommendation has been prepared; but it has been thought better that the Bill of my right hon. Friend (Sir B. Hall) should take precedence of it. If the House agrees to this Bill, we hope at an early period to have an opportunity of introducing the Bill for the reform of the corporation of the City of London.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that when he introduced this Bill, a month ago, he had stated that he was quite aware of the magnitude of the subject, and of the difficulties by which it was surrounded. But he was happy to find, from the present discussion, that the objections raised to the measure referred only to its details, and that its general principle had been approved by his Colleagues in the representation of the metropolis. Some hon. Members had been good enough to express their great approval of the manner in which he had framed and conducted the Bill. He had certainly taken much pains with the measure, which was aided materially by the very able report made by the Commissioners of Inquiry into the Corporation of London. He thought it much better to take their suggestions as the basis of his Bill. The hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) had objected to the vestry being the body in whom was vested the power of administering to the local affairs of the parish. Some gentlemen had a certain horror of the word "vestry," and therefore he called them "the local boards." They were in reality local boards, having the whole management of local affairs; and the business of the vestry would be a very small part of the business which they would have to transact. But if they were to have a local board separate from the vestry, that board would have to be elected by precisely the same mode of election as the vestry was elected; therefore it was much better to have only one body to administer the local affairs in each large parish. In smaller parishes, which were already formed into unions, the vestries would be elected under the same provisions as in the larger parishes, and from those vestries would be elected members to sit at the local board of the district, which would have the management of the local affairs of that union, in the same manner as single parishes not in union. It was not his intention to deviate at all from that proposition; the local board would be elected as proposed; and that board would have the management of the lighting, cleansing, and sewerage of the district. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) had said that his constituents, and he believed all the metropolis with the exception of Marylebone, were in favour of municipal corporations. He differed entirely from his hon. Friend. In 1851 a deputation from the metropolitan boroughs waited upon the Secretary of State, who stated that if he could be satisfied that there was a general desire on the part of the inhabitants of those boroughs in favour of corporations, he would be glad to pay every attention to any memorials which might exhibit that feeling; and from that time to this there had been no expression of opinion on the subject. Generally speaking, he believed the ratepayers did not desire to have all the paraphernalia and the expense connected with corporations. One of the principles of this Bill was, that there should be a representative body to manage the sewerage. That had been hitherto done by a central body, created by the Crown; all these bodies had failed in their management, and had only succeeded in adding to the debt. They could manage the great arterial drains well enough; but the local drainage ought to be placed under local authorities, as in Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and other large towns. The Bill fully provided for the borrowing and repayment of money for the improvement of the metropolis. It was said that the landlord should pay the sewer rate. He did so at present, unless it was expressly provided otherwise by agreement. The Bill proposed that the landlord should continue liable; it left him in precisely the same position as he was in at present. The objection which was entertained against Hobhouse's Act in some parishes would be remedied by a short Bill to be brought in to amend that Act. In Marylebone, for instance, only one polling-place was provided for 20,000 parochial electors. This was a point in which alteration was required; and there were other matters which would be included in the amending Bill if Members desired it. He objected to the proposal of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Pellatt), to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. It was a measure which required to be considered in Committee of the whole House. It was said that the borough of Southwark had its own officers, who managed their own affairs, and that they did not desire the machinery of this Bill. He (Sir B. Hall) must say, from his experience at the Board of Health, that no part of the metropolis was in so bad a state as some portions of the borough of Southwark. In the four weeks ending the 9th of September, 1854, no less than 1,010 persons died from cholera, in consequence, to a great extent, of the manner in which that part of the metropolis was kept, and in consequence of those offensive trades and those nuisances of which the hon. Member was the champion in that House. He hoped to mitigate those evils before the Session closed. It was further objected, that the Bill conferred arbitrary powers. These were only the same powers which were possessed by the City Commissioners of Sewers; the provision had been copied from that Act. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Butler) objected that 40*l.* was too high a qualification for a member of the local board; but in some parts of the Tower Hamlets the qualification of those who voted for vestrymen was almost as high as that. He hoped that the House would pass this Bill, and that in doing so they would be laying the foundation for a great and permanent improvement of the metropolis.

Bill read 2<sup>d</sup>.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL: I propose to take the Committee on this day fortnight.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee read.

SIR GEORGE GREY moved that the hon. Henry Fitzroy take the Chair in place of the hon. Edward Pleydell Bouverie, who has accepted the office of Vice President of the Board of Trade.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee of Supply.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding 154,952*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray, to the 31st day of March, 1855, the Expense of Maintenance and Repairs of Royal Palaces and Public Buildings."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he rose to protest against these Estimates being proceeded with in such a thin House, and without due notice having been given that they were to come on that night. He felt so strongly on the subject that he should move that the Chairman report progress. Those Estimates had gone on increasing year after year to a most enormous extent. Under the Tory Administration of the Duke of Wellington they only amounted to 1,900,000*l.*, while last year they reached to 5,290,000*l.* It was, therefore, most unfair to attempt to smuggle these Estimates through the Committee, involving, as they did, so large an amount of the public money. There were many items in the Vote highly objectionable, and which called loudly for explanation—thus, he found a sum of 12,000*l.* inserted on account of the Palace of Hampton Court—a palace which, in all probability, Her Majesty had never even seen, but which was kept up for the benefit of the pauper members of the aristocracy. Upon that palace and park, and the adjoining park of Bushey, a sum of 200,000*l.* had been expended since the accession of Her Majesty to the Throne. Again, there was a sum of 1,665*l.* demanded for the repairs of the Duke of Cambridge's apartments in St. James's Palace. Now, he could not see why that should be. Parliament had voted an annual grant of 12,000*l.* for the maintenance of the Royal Duke, besides which he was colonel of the Coldstream Guards, and enjoyed other emoluments. The late Duke, his Royal father, had provided himself with a residence, and had never come to Parliament for a single shilling on that account. Why, then, should the present Duke be differently treated? The late Chancellor of the Exchequer had given a promise that the expenditure upon the different public parks and palaces would be annually brought under the revision of Parliament. Now, the present Estimates were brought forward in a manner that directly violated the compact thus entered into. The fact was, everything had been placed before the House in a state of the utmost confusion, and it was quite apparent that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Commissioner of Works was enabled to expend vast sums of money without any accountability whatever. He regretted very much that he was precluded by the forms of the House from moving the postponement of the Committee altogether. What he would do, therefore, was to move that the Chairman report progress.

MR. WILSON said, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his Amendment, for full and due notice had been given before the recess of the intention of the Government to proceed with these Estimates on that evening. His hon. Friend was of opinion that the proper course would be to refer these Estimates to a Select Committee, but that would be a most inconvenient proceeding, and, if referred to at all, ought to be adopted at a very early period of the Session, when a Committee would have full time for inquiring into the subject. If a Committee were now appointed to inquire into these Estimates they could not possibly report until the close of the Session. He must remind his hon. Friend that, in consequence of the inquiries that had been made on the subject of the Estimates within the last few years, many charges which used to fall upon the Consolidated Fund were now voted in the Estimates. The Fees of Courts and other public establishments were now paid directly into the Exchequer, and the expenses of those establishments were defrayed by annual Votes, in order that they might come under the revision of Parliament. The consequent increase of the Estimates had been enormous, and he believed the increase in this particular department of the Estimates for the present year was not less than 1,000,000*l.*, owing to the charges which had been removed from the Consolidated Fund and placed upon the Estimates.

MR. SPOONER said, he fully concurred in the representation of the hon. Member for Lambeth, that if they proceeded that evening, in so thin a House, to vote these Estimates they would be voting away the public money without proper consideration. It was only on Thursday last that they had been placed in the hands of Members, while, in former years, the custom had been to have them printed and delivered to Members before breaking up for the Easter recess.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he also agreed that it would be quite improper to proceed with the Committee on that the first night of their meeting after the recess. For his part, he believed it would be attended with a great saving of time and expense, if, at the commencement of every Session, a Standing Committee were appointed to consider these Estimates previous to their coming before the House. He certainly would support the Motion for reporting progress.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he was most anxious to give every explanation in his power with regard to the Vote. With respect to the palaces entirely in the occupation of Her Majesty, those partly in her occupation, and those not in her occupation, there was a diminution of expenditure in the Estimates of the present year as compared with last year. There was a diminution of 1,312*l.* in the expenditure on the palaces in the occupation of Her Majesty. There was an item of 750*l.* for a new carriage entrance for the convenience of Her Majesty from the end of Grosvenor Place. There was also an item of 1,000*l.* for gas meters and additional mains in connection with the new buildings at Buckingham Palace. There was a sum of 5,558*l.* for Windsor Castle, the greater part of which was for ordinary repairs, and considering the large area covered by that building, he did not think the sum was a large one. There was a diminution of 595*l.* in the estimate for St. James's. His hon. Friend (Mr. W. Williams) said that there was an expenditure of 1,665*l.* for the repair of the Duke of Cambridge's residence. That was a mistake. The sum required for the repairs of his Royal Highness's residence was only 75*l.* The Estimate for Hampton Court was not 12,000*l.* but 8,000*l.*, of which 2,800*l.* was for supplying the palace with water in case of fire. Hampton Court was a handsome palace, and it should not be allowed to fall into decay.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to call attention to a subject which had created much inconvenience in the neighbourhood of Pimlico. He referred to the present formation of the road from Buckingham Gate. Last year, when the Vote was taken in connection with this subject, it was stated that the street was to run directly leading to Birdcage Walk, and was to pass through the Gun Tavern. The people of Pimlico were much annoyed at seeing a different kind of road formed. He wished to know whether any deviation from the original plan laid down had been ordered.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, it was the intention of the Government to carry on the street in a straight line through the Gun Tavern. They could not, however, legally obtain possession of the building till next year. In the meantime as much of the road as could be proceeded with had been formed, so as to lose as little time as possible.

MR. AYSHFORD WISE said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the item of furniture for the public offices. In five years the expense of furniture had amounted to 107,634*l.*—a sum which he thought enormous for such a purpose. He had heard of an anecdote connected with a piece of furniture in one of those offices that reminded him very much of what had been going on lately at Balaclava. One of the officials wanted a book-case that had been put away in some department or other, and in order to get it a requisition was necessary to bring it from the office in which it was placed; a second requisition was wanted for a porter, a third requisition for a joiner, a fourth for a person to clean it, and a fifth was required for some one to put up the books. With regard to the accounts generally, he might state that the Auditors in their last Report complained that they were kept in such a manner that a faithful and complete comparison could not be instituted between the expenditure and the Votes of Parliament. The Commissioners were required by Act of Parliament to classify the accounts and submit them to that House; but they had not the means of satisfactorily discharging their duty, for certain of the accounts, examined by a set of gentlemen called "professional examiners," attached to the Board of Works, were not properly laid before them. Now, if it were required by an Act of Parliament that certain accounts should be submitted to the Board of Audit, that House should not be satisfied with their being passed merely by professional examiners belonging to the Board of Works, whose very accounts were to be controlled.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that in reference to the hon. Member's remarks relating to furniture, at the commencement of every financial year the Board of Works directed their officers to examine the different offices, and supply any deficiency in the ordinary amount of furniture. For this purpose there was an excess of 6,000*l.* over the sum required last year, a great portion of which was occasioned by furnishing the new Stationary Office and the new Record Office. But, independently of the ordinary furnishing of offices, there had been created a new Department of War, which had taken possession of the house formerly occupied by the Copyhold Commission. The expense occasioned by the new department, the necessity also of finding a new residence and furniture for the Copyhold Commission, and various other similar items had caused an expenditure of 24,842*l.* With respect to the Board of Audit, which had been referred to, he had to observe that there were certain works executed under the superintendence of the Office of Works, and for the examination of these accounts persons especially acquainted with their nature were required. The Treasury Committee appointed last year stated that those professional examiners exercised a check over the details of the accounts such as none but professional persons could supply. Their examination, therefore, to a great extent superseded the examination by the Audit Office, which, if these accounts were sent there, would only have to do the same duty over again.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he thought the Committee ought to feel indebted to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. A. Wise) for having called attention to the Report of the Commissioners of Audit, who, not for the first, but for the third time, had complained of the want of information in reference to these accounts. If Parliament required the Commissioners to perform their duty, they ought to have the means of properly discharging it. To know that the money voted was properly applied was even of more importance than cavilling about the amount to be granted. He had, on a former occasion, called the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the accounts of the Commissariat, and he was told that he need not trouble himself about them, as they would go before the auditors, who would supply all proper check. He must say, however, that he was not so well satisfied with this check, for the auditors said that the form in which certain accounts were laid before them rendered it impossible for them fairly to set the expense of the year against the Votes of the year. The result of this mode of stating the accounts, and of having balances hanging over for two or three years, or even longer, was to give a power of transferring charges from one year to another, thus leading to great insecurity and uncertainty as to the Votes which Parliament was called on to give. The point for which the Treasury contended was that, as these accounts had been audited by the officials of the department, there was no need for sending them to the Commissioners of Audit; but this was certainly not in accordance with the constitutional functions of the Commissioners of Audit, who had been appointed by Parliament to control the expenditure of money, just as the Controller of the Exchequer controlled its issue. The practice might perhaps be cheaper if it were adopted as a general principle, and if every department had auditors of its own, but that certainly was not a mode of auditing the public accounts which he should recommend the House to sanction.

MR. WILSON said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Baronet that it would be a great improvement if the same practice were adopted with regard to the Civil Service Estimates as prevailed in reference to the Army and Navy Estimates—that of closing the accounts each year, and not allowing balances to hang over from one year to another. That, however, would be impossible until an entire change took place in the principle on which these Civil Service Estimates were voted. In the first place, it would be necessary that all these Estimates should be voted by the 31st of March, and if Parliament were to continue to meet at the commencement of February, as usual, and there were a press of business, that could scarcely be done. With regard to these accounts, it must be remembered that they consisted, in a great measure, of the accounts of masons and other artificers employed by the Board of Works, which the Commissioners of Audit had neither the means nor the ability to audit. It was, therefore, more convenient that they should first be audited by professional men—servants of the board, who understood such accounts—and that the Commissioners of Audit having received their vouchers should then make a general audit.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, the explanation of his hon. Friend was not satisfactory to him. It was quite true that this practice had gone on for some time, but the same might be said of the army accounts. He believed it to be possible, though it might be difficult, to do with these Estimates exactly what was done with respect to the Army and Navy Estimates. There were works connected with the Admiralty as large as those in the present Estimate, and there was no such difficulty as the hon. Gentleman seemed to apprehend in having them audited by the Audit Board.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know what were the intentions of the Government. Did they mean to give the Audit Office the go-by? There were certainly difficulties in the way, but they should have been stated when the Audit Commissioners had appealed to the Treasury. He should like to hear the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon that point. No branch of the public service required the audit more than the Woods and Forests.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the Audit Board at present acted under the authority of several Acts of Parliament. Those Acts were of the most conflicting nature, and the heads of departments were anxious that they should be consolidated, so that they might know how to perform their duties. He wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he had any objection to bring in a Bill for the consolidation of the Acts?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was an entire mistake of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham to suppose that the accounts of the Board of Works were not as much subject to audit as those of the Admiralty, or the Ordnance. They were thoroughly examined and passed by auditors, and went through precisely the same process as the accounts of any other public department. The only difference between the two related to a species of sub-audit which the accounts for certain works executed under the superintendence of the Board of Works now underwent. It had been found convenient in practice that the surveyors and other officers of the Board of Works should themselves examine the measurements of brickwork performed and other details connected with the labour of the artificers employed in their own department. They therefore audited this separate class of items and then sent the aggregate accounts to the Board of Audit for its examination. It might be a fair question for consideration whether this special audit should not be conducted by the Board of Audit rather than by the officers of the Board of Works ; but certainly those officers possessed the knowledge which fitted them for the duty, and, moreover, they could have no interest in concealing the errors of the persons employed. However, the subject having been started, the Government would have it investigated, to ascertain whether any change in the existing practice would be advantageous. With regard to the various Acts relating to the Audit Board, our present legislation in that respect, no doubt, was not in the most satisfactory state. The subject had already been brought under the consideration of the Government, and though it would be premature now to give any distinct promise as to the introduction of a measure upon it, yet the series of Acts in question would be examined with the view of effecting an improvement or consolidation of them.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was quite aware that great difficulties existed, but on the whole believed the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be very satisfactory.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Commissioner of Works to the charge of 464*l.* set down in the Estimates for the repair of the stud-house and paddock in Hampton Court Park. Last year he was informed by the right hon. Gentleman, that the Vote then proposed would be the last; but to his surprise he found it again among the Votes, although it was well known that the produce of the stud of horses which were annually sold amounted to a large sum of money. What he wished to know was, whether a regular debtor and creditor account was kept of the sums so received, which, at all events, might be applied in keeping up the buildings instead of taxing the public to do so ?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he had nothing whatever to do with the stud, that the money required was for the repair of certain buildings at Hampton Court, and he really knew nothing of the produce of these horses alluded to by his hon. Friend.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he

thought an account ought to be given of the sums received for the sale of these horses ; but he believed many of them were used in Her Majesty's carriages, and, as such, were the property of the Crown.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, the hon. Baronet had evidently misunderstood him. The horses he alluded to were regularly thorough-bred, and sold for racing purposes. The sum realised in that way was, he believed, very considerable.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, were it not a case of absolute necessity. What he desired was, that the Miscellaneous Estimates should be postponed in order that members might have an opportunity of considering them, and he also thought that the Government should supply the House with the materials requisite for instituting a comparison between the Votes for the present year and those for the past three years. They had already voted upwards of 40,000,000*l.* for the army and navy, with scarcely a single objection ; and afterwards the Estimates of another department, amounting to nearly 4,000,000*l.*, were brought forward surreptitiously at midnight, and agreed to without an observation. There was a sum of 12,357*l.* in the present estimate which he wished to have explained. One item of 4062*l.* was for repairing Hampton Court Palace ; and to lay down mains for the purpose of procuring water in case of fire, there was a sum of 5000*l.* additional. Then there was, for the gardens, 82*l.* ; 464*l.* for the paddock, alluded to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir J. Shelley) ; and next followed 2159*l.* for Hampton Court Great Park, and for pleasure-gardens 590*l.*, the whole making a sum of 12,357*l.* Now, he wished to know what necessity there was for laying down pipes to convey water to this old palace, built over 300 years ago, and upon which he believed as much had been unnecessarily expended as it cost Cardinal Wolsey to divert the river from its original bed in order to convey water to the palace ? It was only on his return to town a day or two ago that the Miscellaneous Estimates were put into his hands. No time had been given for their examination, and he certainly did not expect that the Committee would be asked to proceed with them that night. He should, therefore, press his motion that the Chairman do now report progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-

QUER said, he must beg to remind the hon. Gentleman that, on the last night before the recess, he expressly stated that the House would go into Committee on these Estimates after the second reading of his hon. Friend's (Sir B. Hall's) Bill, respecting the local government of the metropolis, had been disposed of. The Estimates themselves were delivered some days ago, just as they had always been annually, and there could, therefore, be no difficulty in a gentleman of his hon. Friend's experience, in two or three hours on any morning, making himself master of the subject. Great complaints had been made of the Revenue Estimates being brought in by his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury at midnight; but the fact was, that he had been compelled to do so against his own inclination, and the notices on going into Supply were so numerous, that he was prevented from giving the necessary explanation. Happily, however, there were few obstacles on that evening, and as his hon. Friend's Local Management of the Metropolis Bill was disposed of in a short time, the Government would be prepared to give any explanation that might be required. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee would at once proceed with the Votes on the paper.

Mr. FRENCH said, he considered that the explanation given by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury, with respect to the Estimates brought forward at midnight, was anything but satisfactory. He also wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Commissioner of Works, whether he had taken any measures to protect the magnificent trees in the park, at Hampton Court, from being injured or destroyed?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he was informed that no injury had been done to those trees; and if any danger arose, he would take measures to protect them.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he thought that, at a period when there was a deficiency in the revenue, and an increased expenditure, it was not decent in the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to propose any Estimates until he stated his budget to the House. For his own part, he had seen so much carelessness and apathy displayed in voting away large sums of the public money in that House, that if his hon.

Friend the Member for Lambeth divided the Committee, he would support him.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 3; Noes 126: Majority 123.

Original Question put, and agreed to.
(2.) 69,544*l.* Royal Parks, Palaces, and Pleasure Grounds.

MR. W. EWART said, there was a house in Hyde Park belonging either to the Ranger or Deputy Ranger, with extensive grounds attached. He wished to know whether those grounds could not be thrown open to the public?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he had no control over the matter, but he would make inquiries.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he had, on former occasions, urged the right hon. Gentleman to restore the Diana fountain at the beautiful piece of water in Bushy Park; he hoped it had not escaped his attention.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, it had not; and a Vote for the restoration of the fountain would be found in the present Estimate.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that, after the late division, he would not again divide the Committee; but he thought some items called for remark. He wished, for instance, to know whether Windsor Park cost any money to the public last year. There was no item for it in this year's or last year's Estimate, though, in the accounts of Woods and Forests, it would seem to have cost 18,000*l.*

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH was understood to say that he had nothing to do with any other parks and pleasure-grounds than those mentioned in the Vote, and therefore was unable to give the information desired.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that from the year ending March, 1854, there was a receipt from Crown lands of 387,000*l.*, and an expenditure of 131,000*l.*, and he should like to know why that Vote had not been brought under the consideration of the Committee. He hoped that there was some Member of the Government who could answer him.

MR. WILSON said, he thought he could answer the hon. Member. The matter was under consideration last year, and in connection with the measure then brought forward the land revenues of the Crown became the subject of discussion, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer then thought that he should not be justified in altering the form that had been followed in these accounts, as the public had no interest in the property except during the life of the Sovereign, it having been exchanged for life only, in consideration of the Civil List. He could assure his hon. Friend that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had maturely considered the matter before he had come to his decision.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was of opinion that the property of the Crown, during the assignment of it in consideration of the Civil List, was as much the property of the public during the assignment as any property was, and ought to be dealt with as such. 131,000*l.* had been squandered, and there were now Votes of 69,544*l.* for these parks, besides an enormous amount for the royal palaces, although Her Majesty had a civil list of 385,000*l.* a year.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he had no wish to limit the magnificence or convenience of the royal palaces, but if they went back to the time of the building of Versailles (Louis XIV.), they would find that three times as much had been spent in this country as in France, and the whole history of jobbing and recklessness could not equal what might be found in connection with the royal palaces.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he doubted whether the present was a fitting opportunity for raising questions respecting the expenditure of the Woods and Forests. He admitted that the subject was a very important one, but he thought that within the last few years there had been a great improvement in the management of these accounts by the Woods and Forests. He (Sir H. Willoughby) claimed the right of discussing every item in the Votes for the management of the Crown property which came before the House of Commons; and he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Williams) would not be daunted by the division on his Motion from inquiry into the subject if he saw fit.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he only wanted to know how it was that Windsor Park was not included in the Vote. 18,000*l.* had been expended upon that Park last year, and he wished to know whether there was to be any outlay upon it in the present year? The Government had not fulfilled the engagement of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, who promised that 6,000,000*l.*, which had formerly been spent in silence, should be brought to light, and placed under the cognisance of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the present Government had punctually and exactly fulfilled the engagements of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. He undertook to bring the revenue service under the cognisance of the House, and not that that expenditure should be paid into the Exchequer before any Vote should be taken in the House. It had been already stated that it was not his intention to place the expenditure of managing the land revenue of the Crown upon the Estimates, and that intention also had been adhered to. With regard to the parks, they had been originally the property of the Crown, but had been gratuitously granted by the Crown to the public for their benefit and pleasure. Windsor Park was in the occupancy of the Crown itself, and so was put upon the expenses of the land revenue. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams), had, apparently in his eye, an Act which transferred certain charges upon the Consolidated Fund, and which therefore were paid by the Exchequer without any annual Vote of that House. They were included, every one, in the Miscellaneous Estimates, which had been and would be laid on the table.

MR. EWART said, he thought there should be a greater number of seats provided in the Parks. He also objected to the carrying away of quantities of gravel for the purpose of making roads, and then filling up the spaces left with filthy street sweepings, so as to create a kind of artificial swamp.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that a greater number of seats should be provided, and that the taking away of the gravel should be discontinued.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he thought that the wooden railing in Rotten Row should give place to a handsome iron one.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that a Vote would be proposed this year for completing the iron railing which had been already begun in Rotten Row.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) 122,209*l.*, New Houses of Parliament.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished for some information as to the total amount to be required for the building. The original estimate was 750,000*l.*, and there had already been spent more than 1,700,000*l.* Three years ago he had raised the question, and Sir Charles Barry had given an approximation within 500,000*l.* He wished to know also, whether any decision had been come to as to the Commission of Sir Charles Barry, as it would cost an enormous sum if he was to be paid a per-centage on the expenditure. He believed 2,000,000*l.* at the very least would be expended, before the buildings were completed.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, that last year a promise had been given by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Commissioner of Works that a plan of the entire building which it was proposed to erect should be submitted to Parliament, and it was most important that that promise should be adhered to. From the nature of the new bridge which was to be constructed, it was evident that the houses at the north side of the Palace-yard would have to be purchased, and he presumed that it was proposed to erect some new buildings on that side, and if so the House ought to be informed what the nature of those buildings was. He perceived also an item for the payment of a sum of money to Mr. Cope, and he wished to know if he was the same gentleman who had painted the fresco of "the First Investiture of the Garter" in the House of Lords? because, if he were the same, that fresco appeared to him and also to others to be, in its drawing, disgraceful to the present state of art in this country, and he should be inclined to oppose any further grant for decoration to the same artist.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that it was quite true that last year he had made a promise to the House that he would endeavour to obtain a statement from Sir Charles Barry of the works which he wished to execute, and of their probable cost; and he had obtained a full report on that subject. On the 31st of March, 1854, Sir Charles Barry estimated that to complete the works which had been already sanctioned would require a sum of 280,000*l.* Last year a sum of 107,000*l.* was voted, and this year 85,000*l.* was asked for, so that there would remain a sum of 88,000*l.*, which would have to be voted in following years. In addition to the works which had been already sanctioned, he had asked Sir Charles Barry to give him an estimate of all the works which he thought ought to be executed to complete the Houses of Parliament, and then he took that estimate and ascertained what was the value of the land necessary to carry out those works, and his estimate was that a further sum of about 651,000*l.* would be required. There had been expended up to March, 1854, 1,583,000*l.*, the sum voted last year was 107,000*l.*, making 1,690,000*l.*, and that with the present vote would give 1,812,000*l.* odd; but if all the views of Sir Charles Barry should be carried out 651,000*l.* more would be required, making a total of about 2,500,000*l.* With regard to those works which had been considered necessary by Sir Charles Barry, but which had not yet been sanctioned, he could only say that they were under the consideration of the Treasury. With regard to the other question of the hon. Gentleman, he had to state that the decoration of the Houses of Parliament did not come under the control of his department, but were under the superintendence of the Commissioners of Fine Arts, and therefore he could give no answer as to that matter.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he thought that the right hon. baronet had promised to lay before the House the plans of Sir Charles Barry with regard to the new buildings which he proposed to erect.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he thought that the Committee was under an obligation to the right hon. baronet for having ascertained what the ultimate cost of the buildings would be, but he hoped that the Treasury would not permit one single shilling to be expended before the plans of the new buildings proposed had been laid before the House.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to know if any agreement existed as to the amount of remuneration which was to be paid to Sir Charles Barry? He thought that, if the suggestions of that Gentleman were followed, the total expense of the buildings would far exceed 2,500,000*l.*

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he hoped that the First Commissioner of the Board of Works would keep Sir Charles Barry in subjection. The present building was, to his mind, a monument of extravagance.

MR. BAILLIE said, he wished to enquire what was to be done with the Courts of Law? Was it intended that they should be replaced? It was impossible that they could remain in their present state, and he should like to know if the cost of their alteration or replacement was included in the expenditure now before the House?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that Sir Charles Barry did propose to remove the Courts of Law, but that removal was not included in the works already sanctioned by the House, and this estimate of £650,000*l.* would not include the expense of building new Courts.

MR. WILSON said, the Committee would probably be aware that Sir Charles Barry's commission had been a matter of serious dispute between that gentleman and successive Boards of the Treasury, and until within the last twelve months his claims had not even been brought into the shape of an account. The original agreement with Sir Charles Barry was made by Lord Besborough, who was the First Commissioner of Works when the palace was commenced, and by it the architect was to receive a sum of £25,000*l.* in full for his commission upon the building as then contemplated, though Sir Charles Barry protested that he never quite assented to this agreement. He (Mr. Wilson) might here mention that the original expenditure of £700,000*l.* then contemplated was never intended to finish this building, but only included the shell. As far as he could make out, the calculation upon which Lord Besborough based this agreement was of something like 3 per cent. upon the whole expenditure. The usual commission paid to architects was 5 per cent.; but in this case, where the cost of measurement—which was a very serious item—was defrayed by the public, the commission allowed was 3 per cent. It appeared to the Treasury, therefore, that it would be an equitable arrangement to adopt the principle upon which Lord Besborough appeared to have acted—although Sir Charles Barry said he never assented to it, while admitting that he had acted upon it—and to pay the architect a commission at the same rate as that originally contemplated. Sir Charles Barry protested against that decision; a correspondence had gone on upon the subject from that day to the present; the Treasury had kept their payments to him within that amount of 3 per cent. upon the actual outlay on the building; and, with regard to the question of measurement, as Sir Charles Barry stated that he had incurred considerable expenditure of his own under this head, that matter was at present under consideration until the facts were discovered. In a very short time a final decision, he hoped, would be come to—a decision which might not satisfy Sir Charles Barry perhaps, but which would be, he thought, a just one as between that Gentleman and the public.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, that a commission of 3 per cent. upon the expenditure would produce a sum of £4,000*l.*, and he wished to know whether the Treasury meant to resist any further claim, and to confine Sir Charles Barry's remuneration to 3 per cent. upon the actual outlay?

MR. LLOYD DAVIES said, he begged to ask whether the 3 per cent. commission was charged upon the decorations of the interior as well as upon the building generally?

MR. WILSON replied that the commission was charged upon the entire outlay, including decorations, and that the Government were prepared to resist any further claims beyond the 3 per cent., though they would of course replace any private expense incurred by Sir Charles Barry with regard to measurement.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he wished to ask if, in addition to decorations, the commission was charged upon repairs, because as alterations and repairs appeared never to be finished, the percentage upon them would furnish Sir Charles Barry with a perpetual annuity.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that Government was prepared to resist any further charge beyond the 3 per cent., which was the usual amount paid to architects for public works, including decorations and other similar matters.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, a proposition ought to have been made to Sir Charles Barry to this effect, that if he did not choose to afford his services on certain terms, they would be dispensed with.

MR. PERCY said, he noticed that there was in these Estimates a sum of £6,000*l.* charged for warming and ventilating the Houses of Parliament. The Committee ought to know whether this was to be a regular annual charge.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that with respect to the ventilation of the House, the sum of £6,000*l.* was proposed in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee which had been appointed to consider that matter. A portion of that expense had been already incurred, when Mr. Gurney was employed on the recommendation of the Committee. For his own part, he must say that he thought the improvement which had taken place in the ventilation of the House was worth the expense, but for the future he anticipated considerable reductions.

MR. PIGOTT said, considerable dissatisfaction already prevailed on this matter, and it would be increased if it went forth as it now stood, without some explanation having been given, without which he considered the House ought not to have this expenditure hanging over it year after year.

Vote agreed to; as were also—

(4.) 6,000*l.*, General Repository for Records.

(5.) 122,841*l.*, Holyhead Harbour.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he wished to inquire the depth of water at neap tides in the harbour of refuge and the roadstead of Holyhead; and whether the works recommended by the Admiralty had been sanctioned by Parliament?

MR. BAILLIE said, he also begged to ask whether the original plans had not been altered, so as to reduce the area of the breakwater?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, he must refer the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Scobell) to the report of Captain Skinner and Mr. Rendell on the subject. The object of bringing the Estimate forward was to obtain the sanction of Parliament for the expenditure, the proposal being to enlarge Holyhead Harbour, and afford greater security than hitherto, a measure which was justified by the large increase in the number of vessels that resorted to it. He believed there had been some alteration in the original plans.

Vote agreed to; as were the following Votes—

(6.) 234,000*l.*, Harbours of Refuge.

(8.) 30,963*l.*, Public Buildings (Ireland).

(10.) 82,140*l.*, Two Houses of Parliament.

(19.) 21,595*l.*, Office of Works and Public Buildings.

(20.) 21,862*l.*, Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to call attention to the large expenditure required for the maintenance of the establishment in Ireland as compared with that in England. Last year the cost in Ireland was 40,794*l.*, while in England it was only 35,728*l.*, and in Ireland eighty-nine persons were employed upon the establishment, the number employed in England being only sixty-six. He wished to know if the Government could give any assurance that the establishment in Ireland would be reduced so as to be more upon a footing with that in England?

MR. WILSON said, every effort was being made to reduce the expenditure connected with the administration of the Poor Laws in Ireland. Last year the amount asked for was reduced from 48,000*l.* to 40,000*l.*, and this year there was a further reduction to 34,000*l.*, making altogether a reduction of 14,000*l.* in two years.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the late Secretary for Ireland promised last year that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the whole system of the Poor Laws in Ireland, and he hoped to have a renewal of that promise from the present Secretary.

MR. DISRAELI said, the hon. Gentleman's reply could hardly be considered satisfactory to the hon. Member who had just put the question. What the hon. Gentleman wanted to know, and what Irish Members also desired to know, was, whether steps had been taken to reduce the expenditure connected with the administration of the poor law in Ireland. He did not understand that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilson) had given a satisfactory answer to the question.

MR. WILSON said, it would be seen that the Irish expenditure had been reduced this year by a sum of 6,200*l.* This reduction was caused by the abolition of the secretary of the Poor Law Board; by the abolition of one assistant secretary, whose duty was done by the senior clerks; and by inspectors and auditors, amounting together to ten persons, whose united salaries amounted to 5,600*l.* He trusted that this would show to Irish Members that what Government had previously promised on this subject had been in progress of performance.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished English Members to be aware of the difference of expenditure on account of the Poor Laws in England and Ireland. The expenditure was at the rate of 1*4d.* in England and 9*½d.* in Ireland. He could see no valid reason why this discrepancy should exist.

MR. DISRAELI said, what he and the Irish Members wanted to know was, whether any prospect existed of such a reduction in the poor law expenditure for Ireland as would make that expenditure conformable to the expenditure in England. The matter afforded a fair subject for inquiry. He understood that the number of persons employed in Ireland in the administration of the poor law was greater than the number of persons employed in England, while the whole amount of the poor law funds for Ireland did not amount to one-seventh of the aggregate amount for England. No assurance had as yet been given that a suitable reduction in the Irish expenditure would occur, and it was, therefore, desirable to know whether any considerable reduction was in contemplation which would be likely to bring the two expenditures to an equality.

MR. WILSON said, it was true there were eighty-nine persons employed in Ireland in reference to the poor law, and but sixty-six in England. But hon. Members must be aware that the reason of this difference was that more work was done by the central body in Ireland than was the case in England, where the greater portion of labour was done by local authorities. There was a Bill in progress for altering the poor law of Ireland, with the view of extending local authority and taking away the powers of the central body; and it would be seen that every step in this direction would have the effect of reducing the expenditure, and of course of bringing the expenditure of both countries to a comparative equality.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the Bill in question contained a clause against which he had already protested, as it contemplated the giving away of 160 places of 500*l.* a year each, by the Board of Commissioners. What he wanted was that, in conformity with the promise given by Government last year, the question should be thoroughly investigated by a Select Committee.

Mr. Wilson

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes—

(23.) 38,222*l.*, Mint.

(24.) 15,530*l.*, Inspectors of Factories.

(26.) 6,431*l.*, Household of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(27.) 17,032*l.*, Chief Secretary for Ireland.

(28.) 6,889*l.*, Paymaster of Civil Services Department (Ireland).

(29.) 22,789*l.*, Board of Public Works (Ireland).

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to know whether the recommendations in the Report of the Commissioners had been carried out with respect to public works as well as with respect to the poor law.

MR. WILSON said, that the Commission intrusted to Messrs. Bromley and Stephenson had not cost the country a single shilling beyond the travelling expenses of those gentlemen, who were public servants of great eminence. Their Reports with regard to the Board of Works, made about two years ago, had been entirely carried out. Their Report with respect to the Poor Law Board, however, had not been acted upon; for that Report was made upon the assumption that the then existing establishment would be maintained, whereas on the discussion of the Estimates in Parliament a very large reduction was made in those establishments. The Report, therefore, which was made upon a very different establishment, could not now be carried out, but so far as it applied to the portion of the establishment that was maintained it would be acted upon.

(30.) 46,421*l.*, Commissioners of Audit Department.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must complain that the Civil Service Estimates were submitted to the House in dribs and drabs, instead of being presented in a complete form, and he must also reiterate his objection to proceeding with the Estimates on the first day of meeting after the recess.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as it was necessary the general Estimates should be voted before the commencement of the financial year, it had been the common practice to commence the Miscellaneous Estimates after the Easter recess. Full notice had been given by the Government of their intention to proceed with these estimates that night, and he saw no reason for complaining of what had been the established practice.

MR. DISRAELI said, he did not think the Committee had any right to complain of the course pursued by the Government. He believed the Estimates had been for some time in the hands of Members, and there had certainly been an understanding before the recess that the Miscellaneous Estimates should be brought forward on the reassembling of the House. He thought it of great importance and advantage that the Estimates should always be fully in the hands of Members, but he must protest against the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) that no business of importance should be brought forward on the first night of the meeting of the House after a recess. He (Mr. Disraeli) considered that the first night after a recess was exactly the occasion when, with renewed energies, they ought to give their consideration to any important business. If the principle were once admitted that the House met on the first night after a holiday merely as a matter of course, they virtually prolonged the holiday, and introduced a lax mode of carrying on business, which, if it were once adopted, would be found to work most unsatisfactorily. The late recess had exceeded the usual limits, yet the hon. Member for Lambeth complained, on the first night of the reassembling of Parliament, and when apparently they had scarcely sufficient business before them, that they should be asked to consider the Estimates. He fully agreed with that hon. Gentleman that it was of the utmost importance that the Estimates should be placed in the hands of hon. Members at such a period as to afford full time for their consideration, but he (Mr. Disraeli) was not aware that an opportunity had not been afforded of giving these Estimates fair consideration. He had received the Miscellaneous Estimates some days ago, and due notice had been given before the recess that those Estimates would be considered on the day that the House reassembled.

MR. SPOONER said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the House ought to proceed to business on the first night of their reassembling instead of prolonging the holidays; but what he complained of was that the Miscellaneous Estimates had not been placed in the hands of hon. Members at an earlier period.

MR. WILSON said, the practice which had existed for many years had been followed in this case—the Estimates had been printed in the earlier days of the recess, and had been delivered to Members several days before the reassembling of Parliament.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, for his part, he objected to voting Estimates while they were in ignorance of the intentions of the Government with regard to the Ways and Means.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following—

(31.) 16,270*l.*, Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, &c.

(32.) 12,190*l.*, Imprest Expenses under Inclosure and Drainage Acts.

(33.) 42,500*l.*, General Register Office, England and Wales.

(34.) 3,768*l.*, Ditto, Dublin.

(36.) 14,986*l.*, National Debt Office.

(40) 3,000*l.* Metropolitan Buildings Office.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he considered that no Act contained so much of injustice and inconvenience as the Metropolitan Buildings Act. Instead of tending to secure the safety of houses, it often tended to endanger them, while, instead of tending to good drainage, it tended to just the contrary. There were two official referees under the Act, one a lawyer, the other an architect; but they so little agreed with each other that they would not sit in the same room together. Now, before they passed this Vote, they ought to have some pledge that a Bill would be brought in to remedy this disgraceful state of things.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he had already obtained leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Metropolitan Buildings Act; and in that Bill he proposed to deal with the question of referees.

(41.) 984*l.*, General Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales.

(42.) 1,610*l.*, Registrar of Friendly Societies Department.

(43.) 32,000*l.*, Secret Services.

(45.) 100,000*l.* Public Education, on account.

MR. WILSON said, he proposed to take the next Vote out of its usual course. It was the Education Vote, but if the Committee objected to pass the Vote without discussion, perhaps they would allow him to take a sum on account.

MR. DISRAELI: Why not have the discussion now?

MR. WILSON said, he did not think it would be convenient to take the discussion now. The Vote was 381,000*l.*; would the Committee allow him to take a Vote on account for 200,000*l.*?

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought it would be much better to postpone the Vote until it could be introduced by a statement from the Minister.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, a Vote on account was required for the sake of carrying out pressing arrangements. A statement would be made before the balance was moved.

MR. DISRAELI: Cannot you take a smaller sum?

MR. WILSON: Yes, 100,000*l.*

A Vote on account for 100,000*l.* was then agreed to.

House resumed.
The House adjourned at half-after Nine o'clock.

CHURCH-RATES—PETITIONS.

EARL GREY having presented petitions praying for the abolition of church-rates, stated that he could not concur in their prayer, because he did not consider, now that it had been decided that the minority of a vestry could not make a valid church-rate, that there was any substantial grievance in the law. Bills had lately passed giving to town councils and vestries power to make rates for public libraries; the support of the fabrics of our churches was surely, to say the least, as important an object; and he could not see that there was any grievance in a similar power for that purpose. However it might be in large towns, certainly in most parishes its abolition would lead to great injury, and practically to deprive the poor of church accommodation. He should, therefore, deeply regret to find the law so altered as to enable a few malcontent persons to withhold a church-rate against the will of the majority, nor could there be any injustice in allowing the majority of the vestry to impose a church-rate.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he had heard with great gratification the sentiments expressed by the noble Earl; but ventured to suggest that he was mistaken in supposing that the case in question (the Braintree church-rate case) at all had altered the law, or left it less the duty of the vestry to raise a church-rate when required for the support of the church; or that the decision of the House of Lords established that it was wholly left to the option of the vestry to grant or refuse a rate when so required. He appealed to the Lord Chancellor whether this was so. The only result of the decision was, that the minority of a vestry could not make a valid rate. But it was still the duty of the parishioners to make a rate when it was required, and almost every one of the Judges expressly said that the duty of the vestries to maintain the churches remained the same as before.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the right rev. Prelate was substantially accurate in what he had stated; no doubt, it was still the duty of the vestries to keep the churches in repair, and supply the articles necessary for Divine service. But the difficulty was as to the means of enforcing the duty. In ancient times it was excommunication, or interdict; but the very mention of these would be considered trifling, as they had been disused since the Reformation; and although it was one of the matters referred to Archbiishop Cranmer, at that era, to provide a substitute for the ancient remedy of excommunication it was not done. Notwithstanding, therefore, the old regal maxim, ubi jus ibi remedium, there really was no remedium for the enforcement of the duty of the vestry to raise a rate for the repair of a church. When the question arose as to the refusal of a rate, some years ago, the late Lord Chief Justice Tindal threw out a suggestion that possibly the rate made by a minority of the vestry might be valid. The hint was acted upon in the case of the Braintree church-rate case; such a rate was made and contested; held to be valid by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but finally, held invalid by the House of Lords. When, therefore, it was said that it was the duty of the vestry to make a rate when necessary, it must be borne in mind that practically there was no means of enforcing the performance of that obligation ; still, however, it remained, and such in fact appeared to have been the state of the law from the time of the Reformation to the present day.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, there had fallen from the noble and learned Lord something which had astonished him, and as to which he could not help expressing the astonishment he felt. The noble and learned Lord said that from the period of the Reformation there had been no remedy for the refusal to raise rates to repair churches when necessary. Why it was notorious that (as stated in the Report laid before Parliament in 1832) there had been constantly proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts against persons for not performing their common law duty to concur in a rate for the repair of their parish church. The noble and learned Lord said that there was no power to compel a majority to make a church-rate. It was true that no one would think of interdicts or excommunication in such a case in these days. Interdicts, indeed, were quite obsolete. No, but excommunication was not, and had continued to be pronounced in such cases up to the time he had referred to. The proceeding indeed, was not excommunication in the first instance, but monition, the ultimate sentence being excommunication. Every person who concurred in refusing a church-rate when it was necessary was liable to monition in the ecclesiastical courts. If the monition was disregarded, then, in case of contumacy, sentence of excommunication issued. And so lately as 1812 an Act of Parliament passed recognising the validity of excommunication, and providing a substitute for it in the infliction of six months' imprisonment in lieu of the old writ de contumace capiendo, which is sued at common law upon sentence of excommunication in the ecclesiastical courts, added to the civil disabilities it imposed upon a writ of significavit to the courts of law. This state of the law had certainly produced an effect, for churchmen would not disregard a sentence of excommunication, and the threat of proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts had in many instances induced parties to alter their course and concur in a rate. He should regret to see the sentence of excommunication followed by imprisonment, and desired that no civil consequences should follow such a sentence, and that it should be left to its moral effect on the consciences of churchmen. But the law was so, and it had a practical effect which made it incorrect to say that the duty to raise a rate for the maintenance of the church was one which could not be enforced.

EARL GREY said, that it had been pointed out to him that the petition applied to a Bill which was now before the other House of Parliament, and that it could not formally be received by their Lordships ; and he should therefore withdraw it. He understood the law on the subject to be precisely as had been stated by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, that legally and technically there was such a duty, but practically it could not be enforced ; and it came to an optional power of raising a rate. Nor did he see anything to regret in that state of the law on the one side or the other ; on the one hand it would be improper, in his opinion, to inflict a church-rate against the will of the majority of the ratepayers ; and, on the other hand, as he had already said, he should deeply regret if it should be in the power of any person to prevent a rate being levied with the consent of the majority for the repair of their parish church. He considered that it would be a matter greatly to be regretted if in this way there should be any risk that the churches might be allowed to fall out of repair ; those churches in which the humbler classes had rights which it would be a national injury to deprive them of.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

OFFICERS WOUNDED IN THE CRIMEA, INCOME TAX—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for war whether any decision had been come to in regard to the deductions of the income tax from the amount awarded as gratuity for wounds to those gallant officers who have returned home mutilated from the Crimea ?

MR. F. PEEL in reply said, that, in the first instance, the income tax had been deducted, but, on consideration, it had been decided that it should not be charged on these gratuities, and, in consequence of that determination, instructions had been given that the tax should not be deducted.

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in the absence of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, he wished to ask the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure during the present Session for altering the constitution of the Committee of Council on Education, so as to ensure a direct representation of that department in the House of Commons?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he presumed that the object which the right hon. Baronet had in asking the question was in accordance with the opinion which he had expressed on a previous occasion—that the duties which were now performed by the Committee of Council on Education should be transferred to a responsible Minister; that that department of the Government should be represented by a Minister sitting in the House of Lords, and if not in the House of Lords, by a subordinate Minister sitting in that House. He had no doubt that, if such an office was created, the duties would be sufficiently grave and onerous for such a responsible Minister. There were besides education other matters connected with it, such as those appertaining to the department of art and science now under the Board of Trade, which might be included among the duties of such an office. At the time when the Committee of Council on Education was established it was considered better to constitute it as at present, but he was not prepared to affirm that the time was not come when under the altered circumstances a better arrangement might not be made. Without, therefore, expressing a final opinion on the subject, he might say that the question engaged the attention of the Government, but he was not prepared to promise that in the present Session of Parliament any alteration would be proposed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would now beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he could inform the House when the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department would return to this country?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I believe that the noble Lord will leave Vienna in the course of the present week—at the end of the week; and from the latest information received, I have reason to believe that he will be in England on the 27th or 28th of the present month.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENTS—(ARMY AND NAVY.)

COLONEL BOLDERO said, that in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the state of the medical departments in each of the two services, he felt glad that he had not had a previous opportunity of bringing forward the subject, because the evidence already taken before the Sebastopol Committee had furnished two subjects worthy of remark. It appeared from that evidence that the speeches which had been made in that House by hon. Members who had been eye-witnesses of the state of affairs in the East, and also the graphic, interesting, and intelligent statements of the private correspondents of the London journals, had, so far from being exaggerated, fallen below the actual state of the case. The cause of that state of things and of many of the calamities which had occurred was the deficient state of the medical department, and last year a Cabinet Minister had had the honesty to acknowledge the existence of that deficiency, which he attributed to having commenced a war upon a peace establishment and without a medical staff. The war was commenced by sending a small detachment of 10,000 men to Malta, and the medical department was called upon to furnish the medical assistance requisite for that force, and that task they performed, he believed, without any complaint being made, but when that force was augmented in the first instance to 25,000 men, it was found that, instead of the Government of this country having acted in a manner similar to the Emperor of Russia, and made every preparation for war, the means provided by them in every department were inadequate to meet the emergency, and more especially so in the medical department. When it became necessary to establish a hospital at Scutari, deficiencies were found to exist in every branch of the medical department. There was a deficiency of medical men, of medical stores, of means of transport, of apothecaries, of ambulances, of orderly sergeants—in short of everything that was required. He did not wish the House to be led into a belief that the medical men did not perform their duty, for, on the contrary, there was abundant testimony to prove that, whether in the field or in the hospital, they had done so faithfully and nobly, and that in arduous and dangerous circumstances they had displayed great firmness and determination. They were not accountable for the disasters which occurred, it was the Government who were to blame for the whole mismanagement. With regard to the conveyance of stores, there commendations of Dr. Andrew Smith had not been attended to, and, instead of medical stores being sent in one ship under a supercargo, some were sent in one vessel, some in another, and they were never to be found when wanted. If the description of the manner in which the Prince was laden was a fair criterion of the general management in despatching stores, could any one wonder at the confusion which prevailed at Varna and Scutari? and on account of that confusion and the impossibility of procuring what was requisite, thousands of valuable lives had been lost. Then, with regard to the appointment of a purveyor, a most important officer, it appeared that a medical board had reported that a purveyor had been appointed who was old, incompetent, and obstinate. The apothecaries who were first sent out were quite incompetent to perform their duties, and were also too few in number, as were also the orderly sergeants, a set of men who ought to be chosen from the same class of persons from which schoolmasters were ordinarily selected. Then, again, pensioners were selected for the ambulance corps in spite of the entreaties of Dr. Andrew Smith, who gave as the result of his experience that these men were worn out by disease, by climate, and dissipation, and that they would be quite incompetent for the duties which would devolve upon them. Dr. Smith stated that he was at the head of an establishment with no actual power, that he had five masters and was interfered with at every turn; and he (Colonel Boldero) maintained, therefore, that no responsibility could rest with the head of a department so constituted. Did not this furnish a sufficient reason why the House should grant a Committee to direct their energies to this subject, receive evidence from persons able to guide their judgment, and see whether they could not propose some remedy for such a state of things? Without going into details, he thought every one would acknowledge that evidence enough had been taken before the Committee now sitting, to show the necessity of a change in the whole medical department. The medical officers themselves complained that they were not fairly treated; they said neither their pay nor their pensions were equal to those of other branches of the army, while honours and rewards were withheld from them. Now, in proof of this alleged ill-treatment, let them compare the position of a medical officer in the Queen's and Company's service. In the latter, after the expiration of seventeen years, the medical officer was enabled to retire upon 200*l.* a year, direct pension, with 300*l.* a year in addition from the medical fund; together an allowance of 500*l.* a year. On the other hand, the medical officer in the Queen's service, after serving twenty-five years, received but 1*l.* 5*s.* per day, while his retiring allowance was only 13*s.* a day. Again, place his case beside that of an officer in the line. The officer of the line, who might have entered the army a boy of sixteen, was allowed to retire upon full pay after a service of twenty-one years, be his rank what it might. So that, although the medical officer must necessarily join the service at a considerably later period of life on account of the time taken up by his professional studies, his retirement could not take place until four years later than that of the officer of the line, add to which you require twenty-four years' service from the medical officers. With regard to the navy, he had but little to say beyond this, that, bad as was the treatment which the medical officers of the army had received from the hands of the Government, still it differed in a marked manner from that which had been evinced to the officers of the navy. Indeed, towards those gentlemen there had been a display of obstinacy, of prejudice, and of blindness, which it seemed impossible to exaggerate, and which it seemed useless to remonstrate against. And here let him point the attention of the House to this circumstance, the qualifications for an assistant surgeon in the navy were less than those required in an assistant surgeon in the army. Now he would ask why that should be? Was not the value of the lives of men fighting the battles of the country, the one on land the other on sea equal, and ought not, therefore, the country to have equal care of both? Indeed, if a preference were shown, it ought to be in the direction of the sailor, who was the more skilful of the two, and for whose training a longer time was required. The fact was, there ought to be no difference whatever in the treatment of the two classes of medical officers, both ought to be under the direction of a general medical board, and on their becoming candidates for employment, they ought to be allowed to choose the service to which they should be attached, either the army or navy. There was, however, no reason why any distinction should exist either in the standard of qualification or in the pay of military and naval surgeons. He saw some time since in the newspapers a list of sixty-three ships deficient in medical men, and he felt justified in saying, that two months ago there were 100 vacancies which they could not fill up. If in a ship destitute of the proper medical attendants the surgeon fell ill, and the ship went into action, might not the result be that a number of men would be wounded without having any person on board who could treat them properly. The gentlemen who were selected in the navy were generally between eighteen and twenty years of age, instead of being between twenty-two and twenty-four, and though they might be theoretically well trained at Edinburgh and Dublin, practically they knew nothing of the duties required of them until they became thoroughly acquainted with the system under which they were called upon to act. With regard to the militia, that might at present be almost said to form part of the regular army, and if a Committee were granted, the medical department connected with that service might perhaps form a subject of inquiry. There was but one objection that could be raised to the motion. He might be told that it was intended to make an alteration, and that a plan had already been proposed. Probably the force of public opinion might have induced the Government to endeavour to effect a change, but had the plan which had been proposed received the sanction of the medical officers of the army? Certainly not, for Dr. Andrew Smith expressly stated in his evidence that he had seen the proposed plan, and he did not hesitate to say, that he for one would not remain one hour in the service if it were carried into execution. It might be said that great improvements had taken place in the hospitals in the East. True, there had been improvements, but to whom were they indebted for those improvements? Not to the Government, but to The Times commissioner, the charity of individuals, and more particularly to the heroic exertions of that amiable woman, Miss Nightingale. He trusted that the Government would not refuse to accede to his motion, and he could assure the House that in the course he had taken he was actuated solely by the desire of benefiting his fellow-men.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE, in seconding the Motion, said he had had some experience of medical practice connected with the military service in former years, and he much lamented to see that latterly it had greatly deteriorated. If a Committee were appointed the origin of this deterioration might be traced to the right causes, and he hoped he should not be told by the hon. Gentleman who represented the War Department in that House that the Committee now sitting to inquire into the conduct of the war in the Crimea embraced in their inquiry this branch of the subject. No doubt they did, incidentally; but still he thought that a general Committee appointed to consider how the war had been carried on would not go so fully into the causes of the evils described by his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Boldero) as a special Committee appointed solely to inquire into the state of the medical departments of the army and navy. He thought the origin of the evils of which his hon. and gallant Friend complained might be traced to the system which had been pursued of late years. In former years there existed an Army Medical Board, but that board had been abolished in order to save the public money, though assuredly not for the advantage of the public service. The duties of the Army Medical Board had since devolved upon one individual, and in asking for a Committee it behoved his hon. and gallant Friend and himself to show how the power thus vested in a single individual had been exercised. At present the Medical Director General of the army had the absolute power of appointing all the staff surgeons of the army and Ordnance, with the exception of the household troops, and he had the power of placing them in any part of the world where our Colonies were situated, with the single exception of Sierra Leone, to which Colony the medical men were allowed to volunteer. Now, he did not mean to say that favouritism had been shown by Dr. Andrew Smith in the exercise of his patronage or in the selection of the posts to which the medical officers had been appointed, but he thought it ought not to be in the power of any man to say that such a thing was even possible. If an Army Medical Board existed, whose duty it would be to sit upon the appointments which were made, there could be, at all events, no charge of favouritism or partiality. With regard to the service which had been principally adverted to by his hon. and gallant Friend—namely, the present service in the East—he thought there ought to be an inquiry, first of all, whether the Medical Director General of the army had secured for himself the most adequate and able men upon whom he could lay his hands. He (Sir J. Trollope) happened to hold in his hand some letters addressed to his right hon. Friend the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert) by a most eminent member of the medical profession, who had been inspector of hospitals, who was a gentleman of great experience, and whose name, he was sure, would be received with the highest respect: he alluded to the brother of the illustrious Sir Humphrey Davy. Dr. John Davy was a retired army medical inspector of hospitals, a man of ample private means, who had seen a great deal of service, and when the expedition to the East was first talked of he wrote to the right hon. Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert) to volunteer his services. In 1839, Dr. Davy was sent out by the present Prime Minister, who was then Foreign Secretary, to establish hospitals at Constantinople, under the orders of the Turkish Government. Dr. Davy remained nearly two years in Turkey, but his mission was unsuccessful, owing to the corruption which prevailed in the Turkish Government. He was, however, enabled to acquire extensive knowledge of Eastern affairs, of the peculiarities of the climate, and of the resources of the country, and he was unquestionably one of the most proper persons to be intrusted with the charge of the medical departments of the army in the East. On the 25th of March last year, Dr. Davy addressed a letter to the Secretary at War, tendering his services. Dr. Davy had served in all parts of the world, and it might be said that he was of too advanced age to be employed, but the Secretary at War never took the slightest notice of his letter. On the 11th of April, Dr. Davy renewed his offer of service to the right hon. Gentleman with a similar result—he received no answer whatever. Time went on; an alteration took place in the War Department; the Duke of Newcastle became Minister of War, and on the 27th of November, Dr. Davy addressed a letter to the noble Duke, tendering his services, mentioning the previous applications he had made, and stating that no reply had been vouchsafed to him. The following was the answer he received from Dr. Andrew Smith—

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th instant, addressed to the Duke of Newcastle, and the copy of a communication to the Secretary at War which accompanied it. In reply, I beg to inform you that I do not feel myself warranted to recommend your being restored to full pay for service with the army in the East."

Now, Dr. Davy did not ask to be restored to full pay. He was a man of perfectly independent means; he was residing in happy retirement, after his long professional services, in the lake district of Cumberland; but, feeling that he might be useful, he tendered his services to the Government, and this was the manner in which he was treated. There was, perhaps, a reason for the brusque style in which Dr. Andrew Smith wrote to this gentleman. Dr. Smith was taken from a lower grade of the profession; he was never anything but staff surgeon, and he had been hoisted over the heads of all his seniors, who were men of far greater professional acquirements. Dr. Smith had been at the hospital of Fort Pitt, at Chatham, under the command of Dr. Davy, who had thought fit to report him for want of attention to his duties, and this was, doubtless, a reason for the animus which Dr. Smith displayed in his letter. There was, therefore, a personal feeling in the matter; but the House would see, from this case, how the public service was conducted when it was left in the hands of individuals. He would ask the House to consider in what manner young men who received medical appointments in the army were treated. The practice for forty years had been to send them to Fort Pitt, at Chatham, where there were no lectures to which they could have access, but where they might remain for six or nine months before they received regimental appointments, hanging about a mixed garrison and seaport town, and exposed to all the temptations to dissipation which existed in such places. He (Sir J. Trollope) thought it would be greatly conducive to the public interests if the military hospital at Fort Pitt were removed, and were brought within such a distance of the metropolis as would afford the medical officers of the army an opportunity of attending the metropolitan hospitals, lecture rooms, and libraries. His reason for seconding the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend was, because he thought the deterioration of the medical service of the army was a subject well worthy of inquiry. When he (Sir J. Trollope) held a commission in the service immediately after the close of the great war, every regimental medical officer was a man of experience with respect to the diseases incidental to camps, and more especially the treatment of the wounded. He believed if they had had men of sufficient experience to choose proper places for hospitals in the East, that the great barrack of Scutari would never have been devoted to that purpose. In a building where such a tainted atmosphere existed, there was little hope of the recovery either of the sick or wounded. He thought sufficient ground had been shown for a special inquiry, with the view of elevating a profession upon which the health and comfort of our brave troops so materially depended. Comparisons had been drawn between our own medical service and that of our gallant Allies, which were not at all favourable to the system adopted in the British army. He could only attribute this difference to the circumstance that the French service was not tied down by such a miserably close system of routine as our own. Since the time of the Emperor Napoleon I., when men of genius and ability had been found they had been brought forward, they had been led to act upon their own responsibility, and they had not been obliged to write to a director-general for everything they wanted. He considered that they ought to follow the example of Napoleon I., who gave Baron Larrey, the distinguished surgeon-general of his forces, power to do anything he pleased for the relief of the army. Baron Larrey created the ambulance system, which we had not only been obliged to imitate, but we had been obliged actually to borrow the ambulances volantes of our Allies to convey our sick and wounded troops. Our own military service, he was happy to say, had already afforded two noble examples of bravery and devotion on the part of medical officers. Assistant-surgeon Wilson, at the battle of Inkermann, went bravely into action like a private soldier; and all would recollect the touching case of Surgeon Thompson, of the 44th Regiment, who remained upon the field of battle, at the hazard of his life, solely to succour and assist the wounded of the enemy. He was sure it would be admitted that men who performed such noble acts deserved every encouragement at the hands of their country. To show how the medical service of our army was tied down, he would read a few extracts from a work on the subject, which showed the duties of a regimental surgeon:—

"In addition to the proper duties of attendance upon the sick of his regiment or station, and to the prevention or removal of the causes of disease, the medical officer is also required to act as dispenser of medicines, as hospital steward, and as clerk. In the course of the duties of this latter office he has the charge of at least fourteen sets of elaborate books and forms, the keeping, filling, and transmitting of which would, if accurately done, occupy the greater part of the time of a skilful and laborious accountant. It is prudently provided that, should these archives 'accumulate to an unwieldy bulk'—should they exceed the capabilities of transport by ship or rail—the director general is to be applied to, and he may be expected in the plenitude of his wisdom and power to find a remedy—'he will give orders for their disposal.'"

The fact was, that entries were required to be made of every case of trifling sickness in huge folio volumes, which could neither be transported by ship nor by rail. He (Sir J. Trollope) thought the best thing that could be done with these useless volumes would be to burn them in the barrack square. So much unnecessary duty was thus thrown upon the regimental surgeons, that they were obliged to obtain the assistance of hospital sergeants, who were men taken from the ranks, without any medical knowledge. The article from which he had before quoted said—

"The hospital sergeant illicitly performs the part of steward and dispenser, while the surgeon devotes his time and thoughts to the prevention and cure of disease, and to the consideration of such necessary measures for the improvement of the health and vigour of the soldiers with whom he is associated as he can recommend to the commanding officer. But why should a snare be laid to entrap him into a technical breach of orders? Throughout, our military surgeon is in all cases bound and trammelled by regulations; he can scarcely stir without a reference to the director general. When he goes forth, and when he returns, he is to report his movements to the director general. If his regiment changes quarters, he is to transmit to the director general a copy of the route. He must not expend more than £5. in getting his instruments sharpened, without obtaining the director general's leave. He is to perform no capital operation in Great Britain without the previous consent of the director general, who lies perdu in his office in St. James's Place, while the patient may linger in the barracks of Cork."

There had been frequent instances of the disadvantages of this system. Every man, medical or non-medical, must know that frequent cases occurred where life or death might depend on the promptitude of operations, and yet he had heard, in reference to a soldier, that not very long back three weeks elapsed before the order for an amputation was sent. These things ought not to occur, and they only occurred because everything was placed under the control of a director-general sitting in London, who must be referred to for every minute particular, and a great and honourable profession was treated as if it was unworthy of the slightest credit for judgment and capacity. This was a disgrace to the medical profession and to the army, and to render the service what it ought to be they must raise the position of the medical men, and give them something more than the ordinary rewards of their profession, in order to induce individuals who had devoted their time to the acquirement of a proper medical knowledge to enter the service and remain in it. He believed that an inquiry by a Committee of that House into these matters would lead to such a result as would leave no one sceptical as to the justness of the position which his hon. and gallant Friend had taken up.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the Medical Departments of each of the two Services, Army and Navy."

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Boldero) as to the motives which induced him to bring forward the present Motion, no one could doubt that his only object was to promote the advantage of the service, and to make the military branch of the medical service such as it ought to be, so that the medical men of this country might enter into it with the feeling that it offered prizes and prospects as promising as any that could be contemplated in private practice, or by attendance in the large civil hospitals of this country. He (Mr. Peel) should confine his observations to that portion of the Motion which related to the army, leaving his hon. and gallant Friend near him (Admiral Berkeley) to deal with the naval part of the question. He saw no reason whatever why the medical department of the army should not have advantages and prizes such as would draw into it the ablest of the young medical men of the country, and he quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that the merit of the members of the profession in this country entitled them to the kindest and most liberal treatment from the Government.

It had been said that Dr. Andrew Smith had stated that he had been nursed in the persuasion that it was his duty rather to save money than to spend it, and that medical officers were trammelled by forms, and had duties devolved on them not comprised within their proper sphere of service. He (Mr. Peel) was glad to say that these inconveniences had in a great measure disappeared under the pressure of actual service, and, looking to the great necessity of now obtaining soldiers, and sending them abroad well drilled, and in a state of efficiency, he believed, setting aside every other motive, that it would be both good policy and economy in the end for the Government to bestow every care on the proper treatment of the men; so that they might feel convinced that if they fell sick or received wounds they would be treated in a manner worthy of the advanced state of medical science in this country. He would most heartily join with his hon. and gallant Friend in any measure likely to tend to such a result; but he thought that there were reasons why, at the present time, the proposed inquiry by a Committee would not be desirable or even opportune. His hon. and gallant Friend had laid great stress on the evidence taken before the Sebastopol Committee, but it should be observed that that evidence did not bear so much on the faults of the system followed in our service as on those of individuals, many of whom, as the purveyors, were old men. The disgraceful state of the hospitals, so much complained of at one time, had in a great measure ceased to exist, and the Sebastopol Committee was at the present time inquiring into this very matter. One-half of the evidence contained in the blue book presented to the House had reference to the deficiencies of the medical department; and that very day one of the Commissioners of Inquiry who had been sent to the East had been examined in reference to the state of the hospitals. There would, therefore, be great inconvenience in having another Committee appointed to investigate precisely the same subject. The state of the medical department, if not the special subject of the inquiry of the Sebastopol Committee, was nevertheless embraced within the scope of its investigation, and he had no doubt that the Government would derive great advantage from the conclusions at which that Committee might arrive on the subject. The present Motion had been based on the evidence given before the Sebastopol Committee, and it certainly would be somewhat novel and anomalous to appoint the Committee now proposed in order to report what conclusions ought to be drawn from evidence taken before another Committee, whose inquiries were not yet concluded. Let the labours of the Sebastopol Committee be finished, and then, if that inquiry should be found incomplete, it would be time enough to appoint another Committee for the purpose of considering this question. Another reason why he felt that the appointment of the proposed Committee would be inexpedient was, that this subject was not only under the consideration of the Government, but was being dealt with by them at the present moment. The Government were taking steps to re-organise and reconstitute the medical department of the service. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Trollope), who seconded the Motion, said that a contrast had been drawn between the French and English medical service, disparaging to the latter; but it should be borne in mind that a Commission, which had been appointed to proceed to Paris to inquire into the constitution of the office of the Minister of War there, had made its Report, and much of that Report was devoted to the state of the constitution of the medical department. He had no doubt that the Government would obtain many valuable hints from that Report. Of course the first subject which the proposed Committee would have to inquire into would be the constitution and direction of the medical department of the army. The right hon. Baronet had found fault with the arbitrary and despotic powers possessed by Dr. Andrew Smith, who, as the head of the medical department, determined the conditions on which medical students should be admitted into the army, the nature and sphere of their duties, and recommended them for advancements and promotions; and yet, on the other hand, Dr. Andrew Smith complained of having five masters, and of being trammelled on all points—on a question of expense being obliged to go to the War Office, to the Horse Guards on a question of promotion, in reference to supplies for the hospitals to the Ordnance, and to the Admiralty in reference to conveyance of stores. The remedy for that was the concentration of the authorities of the army, and that had in a great measure been already effected by the creation of the office of Secretary of State for War. That officer had now a power over all the other authorities which controlled the movements of the army, not before possessed by any single functionary, and all the evils of division and rivalry of authority were, he hoped, in the course of removal. Then, again, the Government proposed to make further changes with respect to the direction of the medical department itself. The office of Secretary of State for War was brought into more immediate connection with the medical department than any other office hitherto had been, and the Government proposed besides to make changes in the constitution of the medical department itself. Complaint had been made of the large power vested in one officer, particularly in reference to military surgeons, the possession of which subjected that officer to the imputation of such motives as had been mentioned in the case of Dr. Davy. It was, however, the intention of the Government to appoint a civilian as a member of the medical board, who, in conjunction with the person filling the office of Director General, would regulate the operations of the department—an alteration which it was to be hoped would prove satisfactory to the profession and to the country. In addition to that, a change would also be made in the persons to constitute this board. The hon. and gallant mover had supposed that Dr. Andrew Smith retired from the medical department because he disapproved the alterations that were taking place. Now, the truth was, that Dr. Andrew Smith, who deserved to be mentioned with honour, inasmuch as he had performed his duties zealously and with a sense of his responsibility to the public, had now been employed in the medical service for nearly forty years; and it was not to be wondered at that, after such a period, he should be desirous of retiring from active life. But, further than this, he was not unnaturally reluctant to share with others that control over a department which he had so long held undivided. Another subject which would fall under the inquiry of the proposed Committee would be the constitution of the medical staff itself. The hon. and gallant mover complained that the surgeons of our army were denied certain advantages which were enjoyed by the profession in other services; in India, for instance, a surgeon was allowed to retire upon half-pay after seventeen years' service; whereas, in the Queen's service he had to serve twenty-five years before he could do so. Now, it should be remembered that service in India was considered, from the climate or other causes, to be more onerous than it was under other circumstances. However, if there were any injustice done to the surgeons in this matter, as possibly there was, it could easily be redressed, and would indeed probably be dealt with by the new board. The right hon. seconder of this Motion said the system of admission to the medical service was very bad, and objected that surgeons were first required to go through a course of practical training at Chatham, where they had inadequate means for qualifying themselves. Now, here again the measures that had been taken by the Government would supersede the necessity for appointing this Committee, because the House had recently voted a sum for establishing professorships of military surgery at London, Edinburgh, and Dublin; and it would therefore be possible to impose attendance at lectures on candidates as a condition previous to their admission, and also by competition to raise the standard of the acquirements possessed by medical students. With respect to the system of appointing orderlies from the different regiments to perform hospital duty, the effect had been that the discipline of these men as soldiers had been destroyed, while their services as nurses were perfectly useless. But this was another of the evils which the Government were about to remedy, because the sanction of the Crown had already been given to the formation of a regular hospital corps, which was, in fact, now being raised as fast as possible. It was intended that there should be persons employed to act as ward-masters, in maintaining discipline in the hospitals, and seeing that the prescriptions of the doctors were properly made up and administered; there would also be a class of officers to cook the food and take charge of the clothes of the invalids; and thus all the inconveniences which had been complained of in regard to those particulars would be obviated. As to the relations between the purveyor and the chief medical officer, great misconception had existed. Whatever had been the doubts raised by the purveying department, it was clear that the purveyor was under the orders of the medical officer in charge for the time being; and whatever the medical officer required he was authorised by the War Office to obtain from the purveyor, and to insist on his supplying. Then, with regard to transport, the Transport Board that had been constituted would remove much of the difficulty that existed when the medical department was dependent on the Commissariat for the conveyance of its stores. These, then, were the principal subjects into which the proposed Committee would have to inquire, and it would be seen that in relation to the whole of them the Government were at this moment taking active steps. With regard to the other topics which it was suggested by that Motion to make the subject of investigation, the proposed inquiry would undoubtedly clash with that now being prosecuted by the Sebastopol Committee. The most convenient course would, therefore, be for the House to suspend its judgment until that Committee had concluded its labours. If its Report should be considered incomplete, and the recommendations of Her Majesty's Ministers should also fail to give satisfaction to the House, then they might rely upon it that the Government would make no objection to the fullest investigation of this subject. Under these circumstances, and with this assurance from the Government, it was to be hoped that his hon. and gallant Friend would not deem it necessary to persist in his present Motion.

MR. BRADY said, he thought that, after the able and convincing arguments of the mover and seconder of the Motion, the House must be persuaded of the necessity for speedily settling this important question. Indeed, the admissions just made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) in resisting the Motion, were sufficient of themselves to establish that proposition. At the present moment the public mind was excited, and called loudly for inquiry into the management of all our departments. It was the constitutional right and duty of that House, when a general impression prevailed that great abuses had existed in a department of the State, to have the matter fairly investigated; and this question was not to be restricted to such narrow grounds as the mere advantage or disadvantage of the surgeons of the army and navy. Hitherto this question of the medical department had been considered as if there were only two parties who had anything to say on it—namely, the public medical officers on the one hand, and the Horse Guards and the Admiralty on the other; but he trusted the time was now come when that House would assert its rights, and would institute an inquiry with a view of making the medical institutions connected with the public service efficient for the great objects for which they were intended. The hon. and gallant Member who had introduced the Motion had shown how inefficient were the medical departments connected with the army, and he (Mr. Brady) would show that this was also the case with respect to the navy. That such was the state of things in the navy was proved by the fact that the Government at the present moment had been compelled to obtain the services of upwards of 100 unqualified young men to act as surgeons on board one of the largest and most powerful fleets which had ever left England. These inexperienced and ignorant young men, who were only hospital dressers, who did not know an artery from a nerve, and who would not be allowed to assist in the most simple operations in the hospitals at home, had been intrusted with the care of the lives of the captains, officers, and men in the naval service. He actually shuddered at the idea of an engagement taking place while these unpractised youths were acting as surgeons. The reason that capable and efficient men would not enter the service was because, if they did so, they became degraded in their social position, and if the present system were continued it would be most injurious to the public service and the nation at large, and would ultimately lead to the most serious consequences to the country. He would call the attention of the hon. and gallant Member (Admiral Berkeley) to what their future prospects were by stating that he (Mr. Brady) had, a short time since, presided over one of the most important meetings—in a medical sense—ever held in the country; deputations were sent to it from the various colleges, and there were upwards of 4,000 medical men and students present. The young men on this occasion came forward and pledged themselves never to enter the service of the navy so long as the present degrading regulations existed. On the 17th of February, 1854, the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Boldero), brought forward his Motion relative to the assistant surgeons in the navy, and he then asked where the Government would be able to obtain the assistance of surgeons from, when all who entered the service were compelled to remain in the cockpit for three years. He then said that if qualified surgeons could not be obtained, the Admiralty would deteriorate the article, and take surgeons who would act under a boatswain's warrant. There had been no truer prophecy

than this, for the Admiralty had been forced to deteriorate the article, otherwise they would not have been able to obtain a sufficient number of men to act as surgeons. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), who, he regretted to see was not in his place, had, in answer to the hon. and gallant Colonel, said—

"At this moment there is no deficiency in this branch of the service. We have no complaint to make of the want of a sufficient number of assistant surgeons in the navy; and, we have every reason to be satisfied with the competency and the abilities of the Gentlemen selected for the office. I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend that if I had the slightest apprehension that the crews of Her Majesty's ships were exposed to the treatment of ignorant and empirical practitioners, there is no effort that I would not make to remedy so great an evil." [3 Hansard, xxx. 822.]

Such were the words of the right hon. Baronet on the occasion alluded to, and he (Mr. Brady) now called on the hon. and gallant Admiral to support the words of his former colleague, and to remedy an evil which now undoubtedly existed. He accused the hon. and gallant Admiral of being the chief cause of the degraded position of the surgeons in the navy, and he had been told that the hon. and gallant Admiral had resolved that they should remain in their present position, and that he was a man of firmness, who would not depart from his resolution. If the hon. and gallant Admiral had not been in office two years ago men of inferior education would not have been taken into the service, as there were plenty of able men ready to enter it as soon as the present system was abolished.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, he should not have risen on the present occasion, had it not been for the unwarranted personal attack which had been made upon him by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He had been charged with being a man of firmness and resolution. These were qualities he hoped he had displayed throughout his life, and had employed them in taking care of the lives of the seamen in Her Majesty's service, and of the credit of the navy. It had been stated that assistant surgeons were unwilling to come forward, and one of the reasons which had been assigned for their unwillingness was, that the necessary qualification was lower than that which was required in the army. The fact was that a higher qualification than that of the army had been demanded, but it was thought right that the standard of qualification of assistant surgeons should be assimilated to that of the army. The hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had asserted that they were obliged to put up with men who had scarcely any qualification, and that a set of dressers were employed to perform the duties of assistant surgeons. That was not the fact. He did not think that the resolutions adopted by the meeting to which the hon. Gentleman had referred did any credit to the Gentlemen who had agreed to them; they almost resembled the endeavour which had been made by operatives to dictate to their masters, and exhibited a singular lack of patriotism. If they looked to what had taken place before Sebastopol, they would find that the health of our men had been better looked after than that of almost any other troops in the world, and it had been truly stated that, out of 1,000 seamen, who had been landed, only twelve were on the sick list. It had been asserted that they were unable to obtain assistant surgeons, but only last year forty-nine had entered the navy. He also begged to assure the House that, so far from the ships in the Baltic and Black Sea being deficient in assistant surgeons, there was not one vacancy in them, and, moreover, that every ship in Her Majesty's service was now provided with one-third more medical attendants than had been supplied during the great battles of the last war. The hon. Gentleman said that so degraded were the assistant surgeons by being compelled to serve in the cockpit that properly qualified men would not enter the service, but after the eminent men whom the cockpit had produced he thought they need not be ashamed if they were obliged to live in that place.

COLONEL NORTH said, it was impossible to give too much credit to the medical officers of the army for the kindness and ability with which they discharged their duties. What he wished to call the attention of the House particularly to was, as to the impossibility of the Committee up stairs investigating in a satisfactory manner the working of the general and regimental hospitals in the Crimea. There was one point of great importance connected with this subject. From the deductions which were made from the pay of soldiers confined in hospital for the comforts supplied them, it was at present almost impossible that he could leave it otherwise than in debt. He (Colonel North) also agreed that the amount of correspondence imposed upon medical officers was too great. He did not think the officers were any better treated. In the West Indies some years since ensigns on 5s. 3d. a day had to pay for leeches themselves, when in yellow fever, when leeches were very dear. He did not consider the removable position of the medical officer a satisfactory one. He would vote for the Motion, because he thought every regiment should have a regular and complete medical establishment, thoroughly trained in all its parts, from the hospital surgeons upward. He thought a system of providing linen and other similar conveniences for the military hospitals should be adopted the same as in the naval hospitals. And he finally begged to call the attention of the Government to the serious condition of officers returned invalided from the Crimea; and would suggest that as they had no allowance, an hospital should be established for their use, or houses should be hired for the same purpose. He would vote for the Motion because, as he had previously stated, he thought the Committee up stairs could not investigate all these points, or inquire into the whole question.

MR. ELLICE said, he quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Member who had introduced the Motion, that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the state of the army medical department. The Committee upstairs was doing its best to unravel much of the confusion in which this establishment was at present involved, with a view of enabling the Government and that House to make such reforms as were essentially necessary for the efficiency of the service and the credit of the country, and he would leave it therefore to the discretion of the House whether a second Committee should be appointed to sit at the same time on the same subject. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Brady) had mixed up the questions of the military and naval establishments, but, so far as the medical establishment of the navy had come before the Committee upstairs, he was bound to say that it afforded a very agreeable contrast as regarded results to the medical service of the army in the East. In the naval hospital in the East there did not appear to have been any want of medical appliances or comforts or of medical assistance, and the naval detachment before Sebastopol appeared to have suffered a very trifling loss in comparison with the army. The question now under discussion would he thought be found, when examined in all its bearings, to be one very much of the remuneration which ought to be given to medical officers in the army. The Gentleman who preceded Dr. Andrew Smith in the office of Director-General of the Medical Department received a salary of from 2,000*l.* to 2,500*l.* a year, but when Dr. Andrew Smith took the office the salary was reduced to 1,200*l.*—a sum very far inferior to that which a person of eminence could obtain from private practice. In like manner, the superintendent of the hospitals at Scutari, with 5,000 patients to look after, and the labours of Hercules thrown on his shoulders, was paid at the rate of about twenty-two shillings a-day. Certainly some allowance ought to be made for the difficulties in which that Gentleman was involved from the numerous functions which he had to perform. He had to superintend the hospitals on the spot; to receive all the sick and wounded sent down from the Crimea; to provide accommodation for them; to receive all the reports sent in by the medical staff, and to despatch duplicate reports of the condition of the hospital to headquarters in the Crimea and to England; to act as president of the boards before which all officers applying for leave of absence on account of their wounds or of ill health had to pass; and, in addition, he had himself personally to perform some of the most important operations which took place in the hospital. Certainly, these were labours too great for any one man to undertake, and this gentleman would most probably have appeared to better advantage before the Committee and before the public if he had boldly stated so, instead of endeavouring to assign reasons why he had not properly discharged all these various functions. What was wanted was a military commanding officer able to control the whole management of the hospital, and to see that the wants of the patients were properly attended to, with power sufficient to put a stop to all the petty quarrels about conflicting authorities, and summarily to dismiss such medical men as did not perform their own duties and impeded others in the performance of theirs. It was from the want of such an authority, and the attempt to substitute another authority in its place, that the greater part of the evils of which the country had so great a right to complain had arisen.

Mr. Ellice

With regard to the appointment of a Committee, though he should leave it to the discretion of the House to decide upon the question, he was of opinion that, on the whole, it would be better to wait for the termination of the inquiry which was at present going on, and which must soon be brought to a close, when the whole subject would be fully before the House, with the additional advantage of knowing what were the propositions of the Government with reference to it.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was perfectly at a loss to understand either the principle or the policy of the Government in opposing this inquiry, when the public had such strong grounds for believing that all the Government departments were badly managed. It appeared to be only a question of expense; but why should there not be two Committees sitting? The first Committee was a Committee to do everything; the other would be a Committee to do only one thing. He could not help thinking that the Government were showing a great want of discretion in resisting a demand of this sort merely on the ground of expense, when so much had recently occurred to show the absolute necessity of such an inquiry.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he could not help remembering that the public interests had perished through delay and procrastination, and now the Government were about to procrastinate again. He was prepared to vote for this Motion. It was said that there were no complaints from the medical officers of the navy, and the hon. and gallant Member (Admiral Berkeley) told the House that the Admiralty were able to get as many properly qualified medical men as they wanted. But in private society it was well known that the medical officers of the navy were constantly complaining, while the most distinguished members of the medical profession on shore were crying out against the treatment of medical men in the navy. Let the House reflect upon the situation of the Baltic fleet, and the probable number of wounded men if that fleet went into action, and then let them inquire why the Admiralty were sending out pupils to act as surgeons! Now was the time to act, before the mischief occurred. He understood that 100 young men now occupied a subordinate position as dressers in the Baltic fleet, who were simply pupils, and who were consequently quite ignorant of their profession. There was no doubt an objection on the part of highly qualified medical men to enter the Royal navy. He would give his vote without hesitation for the appointment of another Committee of Inquiry, and the sooner they entered upon their labours the better.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had assumed that the Government opposed any inquiry into the state of the medical departments of the army and navy. But was that a proper explanation of the course taken by the Government? His hon. Friend (Mr. Peel) had stated the reasons which led the Government to the conclusion that it was inexpedient that the Committee now proposed to be appointed should sit while an inquiry was already going on upstairs embracing this among other subjects of inquiry. His hon. Friend had also stated that it was admitted abuses existed, and that the proposal for inquiry by a separate Committee would meet with the willing concurrence of the Government if the House thought it desirable, after the inquiry now going on had been concluded and the Committee had made their Report. A great portion of the time and attention of the Committee now sitting upon the state of the army before Sebastopol, had been devoted to the medical department of the army, and the more useful and proper course, he considered, would be to wait until this subject had been fully inquired into by them. The only Member of the Committee who had addressed the House (Mr. Ellice) had taken this view, and had also stated that very shortly the Report of that Committee would be laid before the House. The Government were anxious that these departments should be placed in an efficient state. Motives of humanity and policy alike guided them in this desire, and the Government would be very thankful for any assistance which a Committee of that House could give them in improving the efficiency of these departments. But the Government thought there ought to be some regularity in the proceedings of the House, and that the House should wait and see what one Committee recommended before they appointed another. If eventually the House should think it desirable to refer this subject to a separate Committee, it would be an advantage to that Committee to have the evidence before them now being taken by the present Committee. The question affecting the naval branch of the profession was a mere question of detail as compared with the other. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. M. Chambers) had mentioned as a proof of the indisposition of medical men to enter the navy, that there was now with the Baltic fleet a number of very incompetent men, who were pupils. But the House ought to understand that there had been a certain number of pupils appointed to do duty with that fleet, but that they were supernumeraries, and not subordinates acting as surgeons or assistant surgeons. The full complement of surgeons and assistant surgeons existed in the Baltic fleet, and these dressers who were sent out might hereafter become assistant surgeons, when they had seen sufficient practice and acquired sufficient skill. He trusted the hon. and gallant Member who brought this Motion forward would consent to withdraw it, and bring it forward at a future period.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, that if the Motion had been limited to the army he might have been content to wait for the Report of the Sebastopol Committee, but after the speech of the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady), as to the treatment of medical men in the navy, he would not refuse to give his vote in favour of this inquiry? He regretted, however, that the hon. Gentleman had thought it necessary to speak with a tone of asperity respecting the conduct of the hon. and gallant Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley), who, it would be found, had made great exertions with regard to the equipment of the navy.

COLONEL BOLDERO, in reply, said, that he had had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons for many years, and that he never remembered a Motion to have been received with so much favour as that which he had had the honour of submitting that evening. It had been supported by both sides of the House, and even Members of the Government had made use of arguments in its favour. The Sebastopol Committee had concluded their evidence upon the medical part of the case, and he saw no reason why the inquiry which he proposed should be put off until their labours were completed, which might not be until the close of the Session. The present, therefore, was the best time for inquiry, and under the circumstances he could not consent to withdraw his Motion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 73: Majority 4.

SUNDAY TRADING (METROPOLIS) BILL.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR moved for leave to bring in a Bill to put further restrictions upon Sunday trading in the metropolis. He said the growing evils of Sunday trading had frequently occupied the attention of both sides of the House, and the inquiries that had been voted always resulted in a Report that the present state of the law was insufficient, and that further legislation was necessary. Therefore he did not expect that his Motion would meet with much opposition. It might be said that it was inexpedient at the present moment to renew an effort that had already been made several times without success, but his reply to that was, that the subject had never been brought under the consideration of the present Parliament. A former measure, introduced by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Wilkinson), had failed, but then the difficulties in the way of getting a Member's Bill through the House were almost insurmountable. He himself once proposed a small Bill, of three clauses in length, and it took him three Sessions to get it passed. The hon. Member for Lambeth also had had his Bill referred to a Select Committee, who so altered it as to render it, in the opinion of those who proposed it, entirely inoperative. He hoped he should have better luck. He had no intention of referring his Bill to a Select Committee, and the three hon. Gentlemen who were the strongest opponents of the Bill of the hon. Member for Lambeth had ceased to be Members of the House. He should go into the details of his Bill when it came to a second reading.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he begged to second the Motion. On religious grounds he believed that the measure was one of urgent necessity, inasmuch as those persons most conversant with statistics of crime bore testimony to the evil effects of Sabbath breaking as the commencement frequently of a vicious career. It was also desirable, inasmuch as it would give to many persons that rest of body and mind for the enjoyment of which the Sabbath was originally appointed. He supported the measure also upon economical grounds, because, so far from believing that a restriction upon Sunday trading would be injurious to the interests of the labouring classes, he thought that the practical effect of such trading was to compel a certain class of persons to do seven days' work for six days' profit.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent Trading on Sunday within the Metropolitan District and City of London and Liberties thereof."

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he was anxious to give every support in his power to a Bill for the prevention of unnecessary Sunday trading in the metropolis, but he should have liked to have heard a little explanation about it on the present occasion.

Motion agreed to. Leave given; Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord ROBERT GROSVENOR, Viscount EBRINGTON, and Mr. MONTAGU CHAMBERS.

EDUCATION OF PAUPER CHILDREN
BILL.

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the education of the children of poor persons in the receipt of out-door relief. His Bill was but a continuance of a system already in force, and might be considered as but supplementary to what had been already done. There were three Bills on the subject of education already before the House, but the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies and others had advised him to persevere. If the Bills at present before the House should receive their sanction, his Bill would be swallowed up and included in them. The object of his Bill was to enable the guardians of the poor to grant relief to the poor persons receiving relief out of the workhouses to enable them to provide education for their children, such education not being proposed to be made a condition of relief; the guardians not to compel attendance at any school to which the parents should object; the cost of this relief to be charged to the same accounts as other charges for the relief of paupers. He should have been glad to have introduced a clause charging a part of the expense to the Consolidated Fund, but the state of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's funds at the present time forbade him to think of any such proposal.

Leave given; Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. EVELYN DENISON, Mr. LABOUCHERE, and Mr. WILSON PATTEN.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

The Report of the Committee of Supply was brought up and read.

On the announcement of the Education Vote of 100,000*l.*,

MR. HADFIELD said, he was dissatisfied that so large a sum should be left in the care and management, which were so generally complained of, of the governmental departments. He objected to the principle of Government interfering with education at all. Education Votes were no more than moral poison to prevent the healthy action of the public spirit of the country. The voluntary system had done an enormous amount of good in respect of education. It was not the voluntary system that had failed in the country; it was the compulsory system that had done the mischief. Since the repeal of the Test Act there had been shown an amount of energy in the education of the people among the partisans of the voluntary system such as had not been surpassed in any part of the world at any time. Pouring out upon education money derived from the taxes of the country was giving a premium for the discontinuance of that mighty energy which had been shown during the last few years. During the last twenty-three years there had been at work that mighty influence which had attained the result of giving instruction to one in every eight, a result which the highest authorities some time ago declared would be highly satisfactory if it could be attained. One in seven of the population of the country were also in the course of moral and religious instruction in Sunday and night schools, by 318,000 ladies and gentlemen, a result which never could have been got from Government. He begged to move that the Vote of 100,000*l.* be disallowed.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that had the hon. Gentleman been in his place the preceding evening he would have understood that it was agreed to defer the discussion on the Education Vote till that Vote was formally brought before the House. The present was only a Vote on account to defray existing claims of a pressing nature.

ADVANCES TO THE GOVERNMENT OF MONTEVIDEO—QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he begged to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury, whether a sum of 46,896*l.*, advanced to the Government of Monte Video in the year 1848, from the grant of civil contingencies, had been repaid; and, if so, at what period?

MR. WILSON said, that in the years 1845 and 1846, during the time of the combined operations of the English and French squadrons, a certain amount had been advanced by the English Consul to the Montevidean Government. He found that the whole amount of the advances made by this country was 63,023*l.*, of which 35,000*l.*, had been repaid, leaving a balance of 28,023*l.* of the advances yet unpaid. He was sorry that longer notice had not been given of the question, in order that he might have referred to the Foreign Office to ascertain whether any steps had been lately taken to recover the balance.

INTESTACY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DUNLOP, in moving the second reading of the Bill said, that its object was substantially to assimilate the law which now prevailed with regard to the property of intestates in Scotland with that in England and Ireland. In England, if one of a family predeceased his father, his brother or sister, the children of the deceased would take their father's share; but in Scotland that was not the case. The present state of the law was considered a great hardship, and the change would be hailed as a great boon. There was one provision of the Scotch law which he did not wish to alter. In England, if an intestate left both real and personal property, the heir was allowed both to take the real estate and to share in the personality. In Scotland the heir was allowed the option either of taking the realty alone, or of collating; or, in other words, of adding the realty to the personality, and sharing with the rest. He thought that that was the fairer rule, and he did not propose to make any change in that portion of the law. He had proposed, however, to make heritable bonds, which were almost identical with English mortgages, likewise divisible amongst the younger children; but, as that was a subject which ought perhaps to be taken up by the Government itself, he was willing to strike the clause out of the Bill, and to leave it to the House to declare by a separate enactment what should and what should not be regarded as real property.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not allow a change of so much importance in the law of Scotland to be made without making a few observations on the subject. He was glad the hon. and learned Gentleman had turned his attention to this subject, which was one of great importance and surrounded with difficulties. Lord Campbell had some years ago introduced a measure of a similar nature, and two years ago he (the Lord Advocate) had been pressed to bring in a Bill dealing with the question. On looking carefully into it, he found that it so branched out, and was so full of intricacies, that he asked the learned body to which he belonged to appoint a Committee to consider the provisions that would be desirable to carry it into law. He had sat on that Committee, and many of the principles contained in the Bill now before the House were approved by that Committee. Under these circumstances, although he objected to some of the details and propositions of the measure proposed by the hon. and learned Member, he did not mean to object to the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read 2°.

SEA COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'MAHON, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, the object of it was to assimilate the fishery laws of Ireland to those of England. He particularly desired hon. Members to consider that this Bill did not form a necessary part of another Bill which stood for second reading, the Inland Fisheries (Ireland) Bill. They were totally unconnected, and their objects were altogether different. At present there was one law for the east and another for the west coast of the Irish Channel, and this anomaly also applied to different parts of Ireland itself, there being one law for Dublin Bay and another for Galway Bay. He would, therefore, revert to the ancient wisdom of our ancestors, and make the laws on this subject uniform. He considered that this diversity of law produced a very prejudicial effect upon the fishery trade of Ireland. In order that hon. gentlemen from England and Scotland might be made aware of the declining state of the Irish sea-coast fisheries, he would bring to their notice the fact that between 1848 and 1853 the number of fishermen had decreased from 70,000 to 38,000, while the number of boats had fallen from 15,000 to 11,000. Now, the complaints which his Bill proposed to remedy were these. In the first place by the Act of 1842, no one could catch a herring on the coast of Ireland in the daytime, without forfeiture of his net, and rendering himself liable to a fine of 5*l.* Again, no one could catch herrings in any other than a seine net; so that the poor fishermen upon the coast of Kerry were actually prohibited from attempting to take a single herring, although there might be a shoal of them in sight—unless he did so with what was termed a seine net. Well, he asked the House to repeal both of these prohibitions. Another provision of the existing law was this; that no one could use a trawling net upon the coast of Ireland, unless with the permission of the Fishery Commissioners; although upon the opposite coast of Pembroke, no such restriction existed—or ever had existed from time immemorial. And to show the injurious effect of such an enactment upon the fishing trade of Ireland, he would mention that one-third of the fish brought to Billingsgate Market were caught by trawling nets, by boats belonging to the port of London, the owners of which paid no less than 10,000*l.* a year for bait. He found, on searching into the question, that the Bill enacting this prohibitory provision was carried through this and the other House of Parliament in 1842 without a single comment; but he now appealed to English and Scotch representatives no longer to tolerate such exceptional legislation for Ireland. For be it observed, all other nations—the French, the Belgian, the Dutch—might come and trawl upon the coast of Ireland, yet the Irish fisherman was prohibited from doing so. Now the course pursued by the Irish Fishery Commissioners themselves supplied an argument in favour of the repeal of this last restriction; for what had they done to revive the almost extinct fisheries of Galway? Why they actually proposed to encourage trawling there; a practice which was stringently prohibited in the opposite bay of Dublin. Another provision of his Bill had reference to trammel nets, which were allowed in England, allowed in Scotland, but restricted in Ireland. The trammel nets were large nets formerly used by the poor fishermen—and were set during the lull of a storm to catch fish. Now, what did the House think was the real objection to the use of these nets? Why, the fear was that salmon might be taken by them. During the year of the famine the Society of Friends furnished the people of Pring on the coast of Ireland with nets to enable them to obtain a livelihood, but trains of those nets were forfeited every year during the famine, because they were not taken out of the water before the sun had risen. The object of the Bill was to give to the people of Ireland the right to fish on their own coasts to the same extent as that right was enjoyed by English fishermen, and by French and Belgians under the Convention Act of 1843. The next object of his Bill was to repeal certain bye-laws enacted by the Fishery Commissioners. The Commissioners ordered that no one should fish with nets at the mouths of bays or estuaries. Now, that regulation amounted in many parts of the coast to an actual prohibition to catch fish at all, for several descriptions of fish—the mullet, for instance, could only be taken in such spots with nets—so the consequence was the fish departing from the shores of Ireland were captured on the coasts of England and Scotland. And if hon. Gentlemen objected to the Bill curtailing the prohibiting powers of the Fishery Commissioners, he would remind them that in England there was no board in any way corresponding to the Fishery Board of Ireland, while in Scotland—where 14,000*l.* a year was expended by Government for the promotion of the deep-sea fisheries—although a Fishery Board did exist, yet it never attempted to impose restrictions upon the people. The two remaining clauses of the Bill had for their object—the first to revive an old clause of the Act of Charles I., securing to fishermen the right to go on the shores of the sea for drying their nets and hawling fish ashore; the second to re-enact the provision of the Act of George III., also repealed in 1842; and which enacted that all subjects of the Realm should have perfect liberty, without let or hindrance, to fish upon all the sea coasts of Ireland. That was a provision which he was sure would recommend his measure to the consideration of English and Scottish representatives; and he would sit down earnestly imploring them to support him in this attempt to assimilate the fishery laws of the three kingdoms.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. NAPIER said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, and he thought he would have very little difficulty in proving to English and Scotch representatives in whom the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. M'Mahon) seemed to have much more confidence than in Members from Ireland, that they ought to join in rejecting this measure, as well as the second Bill having reference to the inland fisheries. The two Bills were vitally and essentially connected, and had previously been kept together; but this Session the Bills were separated. Now, the effect of passing this Bill, to say nothing of the subsequent one, would be simply this—that whereas a bye-law at present existed which affected the river Slaney, which was in the county of Wexford, represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. M'Mahon)—now up that river a tideway or estuary went for a considerable distance—but by a bye-law passed in 1854, the fishermen on the Slaney were restrained from fishing with seine nets during the close seasons between certain points on the river. Well, the effect would be that that portion of the river would be exposed to the operations of constituents of the hon. and learned Member. Indeed, he might lay it down as a general rule with reference to these Irish Fishery Bills, which were brought in year after year, that if one were made acquainted with the particular restrictions or customs prevailing in the locality represented by the mover, a pretty correct conjecture might be formed as to what would be the main clauses and principal points of any Bill. He believed no one would be disposed to deny that the salmon fisheries of Ireland were beginning to flourish, and that the code of laws framed to regulate the Irish fisheries were at last working most beneficial effects. From every locality in Ireland testimony was offered to that fact, and yet they were now asked to repeal the Act of 1842 and subsequent Acts, under which all that good had been effected, and to derange the vested rights acquired. Let the House, at the same time, observe that the Bill now before them applied not merely to the sea coast, but to harbours and estuaries, which might be termed the very nursery of the fisheries, where the fish were most exposed, and where, therefore, it was most necessary they should be protected. He was assured from many quarters, that by an attention to that fact, and by affording to the fish that protection, the result had been that both public and private rights had been largely benefited by the increase in the supply of fish. And this matter was of the greatest moment to Ireland, inasmuch as this country was indebted to Ireland, in a great measure, for the supply of salmon. So far from it being considered generally desirable that the fishery laws of Ireland should be assimilated to England, it was actually a fact that applications had been made from many quarters in England to have their laws assimilated to those of Ireland. As for the law of Scotland, it was well known that it was surrounded by strong guards. He owned to feeling very strongly on the subject; so much so that, immediately on the present Bill making its appearance, he had called on the noble Lord at the head of the Government to take his stand in opposition to it. The effect of these annual attempts upon the fishery laws of Ireland, as expressed in the petition of the Limerick conservators, was to keep the people of that country in a continued state of nervous anxiety, and to prevent the investment and application of capital to the fisheries. The present Bill proposed to sweep away all the Acts down to 1851, and to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England. Now, did the hon. and learned Gentleman suppose that regulations introduced with reference to the Severn and the Thames would be applicable to the Slaney and other Irish rivers? The haunts of the fish no more than the habits of the people of the two countries were alike. As for the ground of complaint that the Fishery Commissioners possessed the power of making bye-laws, the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be unaware that the Commissioners for Scotland possessed a similar power; while, with regard to the prohibition to fish for herrings by day, he believed that nowhere was herring fishing carried on otherwise than by night. Again, with respect to trawling, those bye-laws only extended to six or seven places northward of the bay of Dublin; while to the south of it—including the coast of Wexford, where the fisheries were in a worse state than any other part of Ireland—no restrictions existed. And, let it be further observed, these prohibitions as to trawling were enacted on the application of the fishermen themselves. All the Reports recently presented show a vast increase in the amount of salmon captured, and in the production of the fish. This improvement was almost entirely owing to the Act of 1848, introduced by the right hon. Member for Canterbury (Sir W. Somerville). If they repealed the Acts referred to they would be taking away all those protective measures which regulated the practice of fishing in estuaries, and disturbing all those vested rights that had heretofore been recognised. It was owing to the existing system and the existing laws that the fisheries had improved so wonderfully of late years, and it would be a narrow-sighted policy to kill the goose for the purpose of obtaining the golden egg. The proposed Bill, instead of doing good, would materially injure the trade itself. This was by no means a wise or a fair way of dealing with the subject. As to the licensing system, if there be any hardship arising out of it, he would be most happy to give his best assistance in the way of improving it. The amount of money, however, demanded under this system was in his mind but a small sum to pay for the liberty of fishing in rivers so wisely protected by those laws. As to the objections urged against the wording of those laws, he would remind the House that the Common Law Procedure Act of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) got rid of all the old jargon of the Statutes of Charles. But the hon. and learned Member for Wexford said that there were no such regulations existing in connection with the fisheries of England and Scotland. If the hon. and learned Member had but looked into the Report upon the Irish fisheries presented to the House in 1852, he would find that there were similar regulations made for the English and Scotch fisheries. He need only point to the Convention Act with Scotland, and the old Statute of the 13th & 14th Charles II. to prove the legality of those regulations. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, proposes to give indiscriminate power to break through all the existing regulations upon the subject in Ireland; and this he calls a mode for assimilating the fisheries of Ireland to those of England and Scotland. By the repeal of the provisions of the Act 59th George III., all the regulations now in force, and which had been found excellently adapted to promote the interests of the Irish as well as the Scottish and English fisheries, would be abolished. He (Mr. Napier) appealed to the House generally not to assent to such a proposition. It was most important that all those rights of property should be placed under proper regulations. The Act of 1851 established local boards of conservators for the protection of the salmon fisheries. There was a large fund created for the purpose of paying water bailiffs to protect the rivers. The result has been the greatest improvement in the production of spawn and of fish; so that there has been of late years a vast increase in the quantity of salmon brought to market. That trade was now in as hopeful a state as any other trade in Ireland. He had always taken a warm interest in this question, and since he entered Parliament he had endeavoured to improve the fisheries of Ireland by every means in his power. He had heard several most unfounded statements made upon the subject. The late Member for Youghal, for instance, at one time stated that there was no such thing as a several salmon fishery in Ireland. The case, however, of the Duke of Devonshire, which was a remarkable one, established the existence of several fisheries. What makes the peculiarity in Ireland? The mixed and varied rights over the rivers. There were public as well as private rights to be protected. It was the duty of the Legislature to watch over the interests of all parties, and to secure a proper and a cheap supply of fish, for the markets. As regards the River Slaney, in Ireland, one of the bye-laws regulating the fishery stated, that during the close season for salmon, the use of nets was not permitted. Now the hon. and learned Member wished to abolish all those bye-laws and regulations in regard to estuaries. Why the hon. and learned Gentleman, by doing so, would be greatly injuring the very interests which he professed so much anxiety to serve. He (Mr. Napier) found many intelligent persons who were loud in their complaints against those laws so late as 1849, but who were now perfectly satisfied that their working was most advantageous. What was the fact? Why, during the last year the supply of salmon had been doubled—a result which he attributed to the great increase in their production, occasioned by the employment of conservators. He was rejoiced to see the improved habits of the country generally, and the improvement which was gradually going on within the last few years. He certainly thought it would be desirable if those laws relating to the Irish fisheries were consolidated and properly amended. With regard to the fines and penalties, they were originally intended to form a fund for the payment of the watermen; but they were now diverted from that object. Some alteration in respect to this part of the subject might be made with advantage. He believed that nothing more was wanted in Ireland than the improvement of the people by education—the encouragement of trade—the introduction of capital, and the increased intercourse of the two countries. By measures that would carry out these objects, he believed that Ireland would gradually advance to a high pitch of improvement. The want of a sufficient number of curing-houses for fish was much felt; but he believed that the Society of Friends had effected a vast deal of good by enabling the people of Ireland to establish these curing-houses. The rivers of Ireland were well stocked; and it was a sad thing to think that so many persons should have suffered from the want of food during the existence of the famine while there was an abundance of fish to be had in those rivers. The English fishermen, who periodically come over, were enabled to take away large quantities of fish, while the Irish people themselves appeared to be doing nothing. There was the Shannon, a noble and a splendid river—a mine of wealth in the way of fish. It was just at the moment when the conservators reported the most encouraging facts as to the Irish fisheries that the House was called upon to pass a Bill repealing all those laws and regulations under which the trade had so wonderfully increased. He hoped that these annual attempts to disturb the existing code of laws would be now given up, and that no further impediment would be thrown in the way of the improvement that was gradually going on. Such a measure as the present would, in effect, confiscate and disturb the existing vested rights. He, therefore, felt it his duty to interpose his opposition at this early period, from a conviction that nothing more disastrous to Ireland could occur than to pass either of the Bills proposed by the hon. and learned Member, or even to leave the impression upon the people of Ireland that there was a possibility of any such Bills being passed by the British Parliament. Within the last few days he had met with a work upon the subject of the Irish fisheries, written by Dr. Davy, in which the author expressed an opinion favourable to the extension of the Irish Acts to England. Whatever amendment was to be made in those laws, he thought that it ought to be made quietly, and to be of a practical character. The salmon fishery was now progressing most satisfactorily. The artificial propagation of the fish by Mr. Phillips, although at present only an experiment, was likely to turn out to the greatest advantage. He hoped that they would hear no more of those Bills—and if defeated now, the result would not be like the inquest that had sat lately upon the body of a boy in Ireland, which was abruptly stopped in its investigation by the circumstance of the boy coming to life and proving the uselessness of its labours.

MR. WHITESIDE seconded the amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. DUFFY said, he was sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) should have thought it necessary to impute personal motives to the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) in connection with these Bills. It was within his own knowledge that long before the hon. and learned Gentleman was Member for Wexford, he had taken the same identical views which those Bills meant to establish in an article, which had been often quoted, in the Dublin Review. Before the Committee which sat in 1849, that hon. and learned Member was a material witness, and in his evidence maintained the same opinions. He (Mr. Duffy) trusted that those facts would be taken as a sufficient answer to the charge made against the hon. and learned Member of personal motives. He would also remind the House that the hon. and learned Gentleman had that day presented a petition, numerously signed, from the captains and crews of vessels engaged in the trade with Dublin and elsewhere in favour of these Bills. Such persons could not have any special interest in the River Slaney. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin did not really apply himself to the question raised by those Bills. The question was this—whether the people of Ireland were entitled to catch their own fish upon the same terms as the people of England, of Scotland, of France, or of Belgium. It seemed to him to be a rare piece of inconsistency for the House of Commons to refuse the people of Ireland those English laws when they asked for them. Here was a law which had existed only twelve years, which no one but the proprietors of salmon weirs approved of, and which all persons connected with the trade of the country complained of. Was this law, then, to stand in the way of the justice of that House? If Irish fish were aliens in blood and nature, as had once been said of the Irish people, there might be some reason for dealing with them in a special manner; but this was not pretended by any one. He thought that a most irresistible and overwhelming case had been made out in favour of these Bills.

MR. GEORGE said, in rising to support the Amendment, he felt that if he attempted to enter at any length into the subject he would be only weakening, instead of strengthening, the plain and unanswerable arguments advanced against the Bills by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier). Although he represented the same county as the hon. and learned Gentleman who had introduced the Bills, he took a different view altogether as to the policy of such measures. He denied the right of his hon. and learned Colleague to call those Bills measures for assimilating the laws of England to Ireland. They might, he thought, be more aptly called measures to annihilate and destroy all the laws relating to fisheries in Ireland. During the last few years there had been a manifest and extraordinary improvement in the fisheries of the rivers of Ireland, and the quantity of salmon that had been taken there had been trebled or quadrupled. He therefore, thought, that the time was most ill chosen to attempt to alter those laws which were found to be of such practical benefit to the country. Believing that the repeal of those laws would prove most injurious to the poor fishermen themselves, he was there to prevent, as far as he could, the adoption of those measures. The effect of the measures would be to prevent the salmon going up the rivers for the purpose of spawning, and any that did get up would be destroyed in their passage down the rivers to the sea. The junction of the estuary with the sea was the most critical spot of all, and the one where it was most needful to afford protection; yet this was the precise point at which it was now proposed that protection should stop, and the fish should be abandoned to the

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he had understood, although he hoped he was in error, that Irishmen were in many instances deprived of the privilege of fishing in their own seas, and that they did not even enjoy the privileges that were possessed by Englishmen. The Act 6 & 7 Vict., cap. 79, gave British and French fishermen the general right of fishery at and beyond a distance of three miles from low watermark, while the 5 & 6 Vict., cap. 106, sec. 7, prohibited Irishmen from fishing upon their own coasts with particular descriptions of nets, the construction of which was cheap, and which were worked very inexpensively. He thought, then, that if greater restrictions were imposed upon Irish fishermen than existed with regard to English fishermen in Irish waters, it was the duty of the House to interpose. If their object was to give the Irish poor that most valuable possession, self-respect, they must give them the means of labour. Wherever the Irish had work to do they were ready to do it, and it was useless for the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) to call, "Educate, educate, educate!" while the people of Ireland were asking for "Bread, bread, bread!" and the means of earning a livelihood. He (Mr. Chambers) trusted that the House would, by passing this Bill, so far contribute towards affording the poor population of Ireland a means of subsistence. He believed the adoption of the measure would do much to encourage and extend the coasting trade, which had in former days been a nursery for the navy. If they threw open the seas of Ireland to the industrious exertions of her fishermen, they would at once have a new race of seamen springing up. A large number of boys would enter into the fishery trade, and, becoming practised sailors, would volunteer into the navy, and by declaring the freedom of the Irish fisheries they would create a strong force of seamen available for any emergency.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he must deny that under the law as it now stood French and English fishermen enjoyed privileges not possessed by the Irish as to the taking of fish. The Act 6 & 7 Vict. gave the Privy Council the power to suspend the operation of the Act 5 & 6 Vict., and to make such regulations as they deemed fit for the management of the fisheries on the coast of Ireland, so long as they were carried on only by subjects of Her Majesty. Now he (Mr. Whiteside) had never seen a French fisherman on the coast of Ireland, but he had seen Cornish men engaged in the herring and pilchard fishery, and last year he was informed that 200 boats from the English coast had caught fish to the value of 40,000*l.*, or 200*l.* each boat, on the Irish coasts—on those very coasts on which, according to some hon. Members, there was now no fish. Again, it was no doubt true that by the 5 & 6 Vict., Irish fishermen were precluded from using certain nets, such as seine and trawl nets, by night; but that was also modified by the 7 & 8 Vict., which gave an appeal to the Privy Council against the regulations which the Fishery Commissioners might make on this point. And so far from the regulations that were actually in existence being injurious to the fishermen, they tended to their protection, by preventing the adoption of methods of fishing which were destructive to the fish. So far had the Acts at present in force been from checking the employment either of men or of capital in the Irish fishery that he found the number of boats, and men and boys employed, were as follows—

	Boats.	Men and Boys.
1844	... ... 17,955	... ... 84,708
1845	... ... 19,863	... ... 93,078
1848	... ... 15,932	... ... 70,011

The reason of the decrease in the latter period—at least of men and boys—was, that they were not, he was sorry to say, in the country. Such had been the rise in the rate of remuneration in Ireland that Mr. Dargan told him the other day that good workmen were not now to be had at 10*s.* a week, while he (Mr. Whiteside) recollects the time when 4*d.* and 6*d.* a day were the ordinary wages. Under those circumstances, it was not surprising that so many persons were not engaged in the fisheries. He certainly wished that the men were there, for if the Irish population had not been so materially diminished he thought we should have beaten our enemies, the Russians, more quickly than we now seemed to be doing.

MR. KEOGH said, the Act for carrying out the French convention only applied to the fishing of foreigners more than three miles from the coast. Now, the Act of which the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) complained related to restrictions imposed upon fishing within three miles from the coast. It was true that the Fishery Commissioners could make regulations for the ordering of the fishery within those limits, but they had not despotic power in this matter, for before they could enforce any bye-laws they must give public notice of them, and any one who objected to them might appeal against them to the Lord Lieutenant. These bye-laws must, moreover, be considered by the Privy Council and the law officers of the Crown, and must be approved by them before they could be put in operation. He therefore denied that any of these bye-laws restricted the deep-sea fishery. They all, without exception, related to fishing between particular head lands on the coast. He believed that the provisions of the existing Acts, enabling the Fishery Commissioners to regulate the mode of fishing, were of the greatest possible advantage to the poor, because they protected their interests, guarded them against poachers, and tended to the increase of fish. He had seen a letter addressed to an hon. Member of that House from a man who described himself as a member of the guild of the snap-net fishers of the Shannon, stating emphatically that the Bill proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford would be injurious to the interests of his class, as tending to promote poaching, and to cause a great diminution of fish. It was not the fact, as seemed to have been assumed, that these restrictions upon fishing were peculiar to Ireland. Similar regulations were in force in England and Scotland, and with a similarly beneficial effect in increasing the produce of the fisheries.

MR. M'MAHON, in reply, said that the Bill had no connection whatever with the inland fisheries of Ireland, but solely related to the question whether Irishmen were to have the same privilege on their own coasts as they would have on the coasts of England, France, America, or any other country, or as the people of those countries would have on the coasts of Ireland.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, after listening to the debate, he had come to the conclusion that no answer had been given to the arguments used by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon), who had charge of this measure. The argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) against the measure was, that the sea-coast fisheries of Ireland ought not to be encouraged in the way proposed by the Bill, because their being so might inflict some injury on the vested interests of the proprietors of salmon fisheries in the rivers of Ireland. But it was notorious that those sea-coast fisheries in Ireland some time ago afforded employment for a large portion of the people of Ireland, while latterly, though the coast abounded with fish, the fishery had been almost put an end to, in consequence of the ridiculous restrictions which had been imposed. The object, therefore, was to place these coast fisheries on a proper footing, in order that they might afford a means of living for a large portion of the population, as well as be a sort of nursery for seamen for the navy; for it was well known that, in consequence of the deterioration of the Irish fisheries, but few seamen were contributed by that country to the navy. If it was the case that the measure now proposed would injure the inland fisheries, which he did not believe, then let those parties whose interests it would interfere with be compensated, rather than allow this legitimate and profitable source of industry to be shut up from the people.

MR. KENNEDY said, all that was wanted was to assimilate the law of Ireland in relation to fisheries to that of England, the circumstances of the case in both countries being the same. It seemed, however, to be a feature in all legislation for Ireland to assimilate the law of Ireland with that of England, where the circumstances were totally different, and to disimilate it where the circumstances were exactly the same.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 19; Nocs 145: Majority 126.

INLAND FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'MAHON said, he did not mean to enter into details with regard to this Bill, which also stood for a second reading; but he would just state that it had for its object, not as had been said, the destruction of the salmon fry, but its protection. For the present he should withdraw the Bill; but as long as he had a seat in that House he should never rest contented until both as regarded the inland fisheries and the sea-coast fisheries his constituents and the whole population of Ireland were placed in the same position that they would occupy if they resided in England or in America.

Order for second reading discharged.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, it was too late (half-past four o'clock) then to discuss the principle or the details of the measure, but he appealed to hon. Gentlemen to consider whether, when almost every word of the Bill had received the assent of the House, after long discussion, and an inquiry by a Select Committee, it would be reasonable to oppose the second reading. He appealed to hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House whether it would not facilitate a proper settlement of the question to allow the Bill to be read a second time that evening, reserving all discussion until the Motion for going into Committee was made, and he likewise appealed to the Government whether, considering the peculiar circumstances in which he had been placed by the discussion that day it would not be possible to give him a Government night. The present Bill differed very little from that which received the assent of Lord Aberdeen's Government in that House, and did not differ materially from the Bills introduced by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) when he was Attorney General for Ireland under Lord Derby's Government.

MR. HORSMAN said, that on the part of the Government, he fully admitted the importance of the measure, it being an embodiment of two measures which had already received the sanction of that House. He thought, therefore, that the House ought to give every facility to the hon. and learned Member in proceeding with the measure. As to the Government giving a day for the discussion of it, the next Government night was set apart for the Budget, and after that the Newspaper Stamps Bill would come on, so that until these important questions were got through, and which would no doubt occupy the House for some time, no other business could be allowed to interfere. But after those questions were disposed of, he should think that Government would be disposed to give every facility for proceeding with the measure. He would not give any pledge on the subject, but he had no doubt such would be the case. So far as the Government were concerned there could be no objection to have the Bill read a second time now, and take the discussion on its going into Committee.

MR. NAPIER said, he wished to explain to the House how the case stood in respect of this Bill. Some time ago he had put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government as to what was the intention of the Government respecting it; but to that question he had got no satisfactory answer. The measure was composed partly of his (Mr. Napier's) Bill of last Session, the Leasing Powers Bill, and partly of Sir John Young's Tenants' Compensation Bill, which latter measure, after being considered by a Select Committee of the House of Lords, was rejected by that Committee with the full concurrence of the Members of the late Government, many of whom were also Members of the present Government. Now, the question he wanted to be answered was, whether Ministers meant to support the present Bill, brought in by the hon. and learned Serjeant in all its entirety. The experience of last Session convinced him that the two Bills which came down from the House of Lords—namely, the Leasing Powers Bill and the Landlord and Tenant Bill—constituted as large a measure on this subject as the most sanguine could hope to pass through Parliament; but both of those Bills were most unexpectedly abandoned by Sir John Young, because he was pressed to do so by those Irish Members who placed confidence in the Government, and, as he (Mr. Napier) did not happen to be among that number, he was thrown overboard. Well, the hon. and learned Serjeant in framing his present measure did not take the two Bills which passed the House of Lords last Session, but he took a Bill which had been rejected by the House of Lords, and tied it to another which had passed the House of Lords, and thus compounded the present measure. Again, he wished to inquire whether those Members of the Government who assented to the rejection of the Tenants' Compensation Bill in the House of Lords were now prepared to support the present measure. In his opinion, the Bill was nothing but a delusion, because it could not be expected that it would ever pass through Parliament; and he certainly would be no party to a delusion on the people of Ireland. Would the Government support the Bill as it stood in all its integrity, in both Houses of Parliament, and, if not, what course did they propose to take when the Bill got into Committee.

MR. KEOGH said, he did not complain of the right hon. and learned Gentleman availing himself of this opportunity of stating his objections against the measure, but he did think his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland had some reason to complain of his conduct. They were now arrived at within five minutes to five o'clock, and the time for discussion was, therefore, necessarily short. It was well known that the noble Lord at the head of the Government could not be present, as he was at Windsor, and he was sure every one would rejoice at the cause of his absence. Well, then, what had occurred? The House had been engaged for four hours most unprofitably, as he considered, in discussing a measure which had been rejected, and the promoter and author of which, being a warm supporter of the measure now before the House, it might have been supposed would have given way for the discussion of this important measure. That, however, he had not done, and it had not, therefore, been the fault of the Government that time had not been given for the discussion of this measure. Well, then, when it was brought on towards the close of the sitting, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the measure, seeing there was not time for the discussion of it, put it to the Government whether they would not give him a day for the discussion of it. In that appeal he was met by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland, who stated that he could not pledge himself now that a day would be given, but that he would use every exertion in his power, and give every facility for having the measure proceeded with. With that assurance the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny seemed perfectly satisfied. Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin rose and asked what were the intentions of Government respecting the measure. Why did he not do so previous to his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Horsman) rising? If he had done so, he would have been told what the intentions of Government were on the subject when the question came properly before the House — it would then be quite time enough for the Government to say what they would do with the measure in that House, as well as in the other.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he did not think they ought to be satisfied with the attempt at explanation by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, but that they ought to consider whether they would allow the interests of Ireland to be systematically trifled with by an imbecile Ministry. The noble lord at the head of the Government was a member of the Committee which sat on this subject, and was the person who proposed the rejection of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny. (Mr. Serjeant Shee.) The Bill had been styled mischievous and absurd by Members of the Government in the other House, but now the House had been told that the Government would support its second reading. The hon. and learned Serjeant, in introducing the present measure, plainly intimated to the noble lord at the head of the Government that if he voted for it he should remain Prime Minister; but if not, "I belong," significantly observed the hon. and learned Serjeant, "to a party on whom the fate of Ministries depend." He believed that the noble lord had taken counsel with the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Hayter) as to the number of votes which might be acquired for the Government by taking a certain course, and was now, as far as the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland could be understood, prepared, in order to strengthen his ricketty Administration, to support provisions which he had formerly opposed. He asked Irish Members whether they believed in the sincerity of the Government, in their promise to support the measure, and whether the Government were not practising on the country a delusion and a sham. He emphatically denounced the conduct of the Government as an imposture. But the Bill could not pass the present House of Lords, and he asked whether the hon. and learned Serjeant believed in the sincerity of the noble lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) and conceived that that noble lord would advise Her Majesty to create peers for the purpose of passing a measure which would enable tenants to demand compensation for what had been done in the time of their grandfathers. He had actually been informed by an attorney that this Bill, if passed, would apply to all estates purchased under the Encumbered Estates Act. If that was the case they would have petitions from every purchaser under this Act against ex post facto legislation of so iniquitous a character. Allusion had been made to the conduct of the Government of the Earl of Derby on this subject. He might tell the House that when Lord Derby was asked, on the day on which the opinion of the House was to be taken on the Budget of his Government, whether he would support the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, that noble lord answered plainly that he would not; upon which a gentleman said to him (Mr. Whiteside) that that was a foolish answer, because it had lost Lord Derby twenty votes. It was, however, a declaration in accordance with the spirit of the English people, who liked straightforward and candid conduct, and very different from the language held by the present Ministers, whose purpose appeared to be to cajole the Irish and Liberal members of that House, and in the event of a dissolution to get up an election cry for Ireland. He protested against dilly-dallying with a measure of this kind in that House, and which if sent up to the other House, would assuredly be opposed and rejected. They ought to know distinctly what Government meant to do with the Bill. Let a day be fixed for the discussion, and they would appeal to the House to put an end to a system of delusion which was bringing discredit on Parliament, and which would inflict the greatest injustice on Ireland.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that this was not the first time that he had heard the two hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite make speeches such as they had just delivered; and, if he were not mistaken, he had heard the same observations, word for word, fall from them last Session. The Government were accused of intending to support a measure which was denounced as a sham and imposture; but he might remind the House that a measure quite as extensive was introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) when Attorney-General for Ireland. It was, indeed, that right hon. and learned Gentleman who first introduced what it was now convenient to call a sham and imposture. That right hon. and learned Gentleman's measure contained not only the principle of giving compensation to tenants for improvements, but also a clause retrospectively affecting, without any limit as to time or the nature of the improvements, the relations of landlord and tenant. The Bill to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred as having been rejected by the Lords was the Bill brought in last Session by the hon. and learned Serjeant (Mr. Serjeant Shee) and, after reference to a Select Committee, modified by amendments proposed by Sir John Young then Secretary for Ireland. The imputation of shilly-shallying, if it was attributable to anybody, was attributable to the Government of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been a member, for the Compensation Bill which he introduced in that House was almost immediately condemned by several supporters of his Government in the other House, who intimated their intention to offer it all the opposition in their power. The course pursued now by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was neither consistent nor convenient, and he trusted it would not be supported by the House.

MR. G. H. MOORE said, he hoped the House would now read the Bill a second time sub silentio, on the understanding that the discussion should be taken on going into Committee, when, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney-General for Ireland had promised, the Government would be ready to state their intentions with respect to it.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to say that the Bill originally introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin and the Bill now before the House were totally and essentially different. He feared that the people of Ireland were now further than ever from the boon they had hoped to obtain. He must say he thought the House ought not to consent to the second reading until the intentions of the Government were made known.

MR. FRENCH said, he thought that the second reading should be disposed of at once. If any more time were put off, the Lords would have the usual excuse that the Bill came up too late. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) would induce the other Members of the Government to allow it to come on on an early day.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he thought that a Bill of this kind ought not to be allowed to pass a second reading without a division. It was too bad to bring on a Bill of such importance when only one Member of the Cabinet, the right hon. Baronet the First Commissioner of Works (Sir W. Molesworth) was present.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he must charge the Opposition with violently opposing out of office a measure which they had supported when in office. With regard to the opposition of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside), he rather preferred being opposed by an hon. and learned Member who was always placing his party in ridiculous predicaments. He (Serjeant Shee) had crossed to the Government side of the House in order that he might see the hon. and learned Gentleman's relative (Mr. Napier) blushing for the reckless indiscretion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and tugging him by the tail of the coat, and imploring him for God's sake to sit down. The hon. and learned Gentleman was a perfect Barabbas to his party. He was clamorous for justice to his constituents when out of office, although when in office he denied them the smallest meed of commiseration. The principle of retrospective compensation to tenants was contained in the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin; but he had afterwards used all his influence to prevent the Tenants' Compensation Bill passing through the House of Lords, and he was now endeavouring to play the same game, simply because the Bill was supported by the present Government, and was not introduced by a Government of which he himself was a Member.

MR. BENTINCK said, he must call upon the House to reject the propositions of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, on the ground that the House was in ignorance of the intentions of the Government with respect to it.

MR. GEORGE rose to address the House but it being now a quarter to six, Mr. Speaker interfered, and the Debate was adjourned till Friday.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—VISIT OF THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

MR. A. STAFFORD said, that as many hon. Members would, no doubt, desire to be present at the ceremony in the city tomorrow, on the occasion of the visit of the Emperor and Empress of the French, it would be more convenient, he considered, if the House were to adjourn over to-morrow, and he would therefore move that the House at its rising adjourn until Friday.

MR. FRENCH seconded the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned, at ten minutes before Six o'clock, till Friday.

THE MILITARY AT THE ASSIZES.

LORD CAMPBELL gave notice of his intention to ask his noble and gallant Friend the Commander in Chief a question relative to the order issued from the Horse Guards, forbidding the presence of soldiers in courts of law or in the streets of assize towns during the holding of assizes. He by no means complained of his noble and gallant Friend, who, in issuing the order, had only followed a precedent which had been long established. It was formerly supposed that the Judges might be overawed at the sight of red coats in their courts, and orders had consequently been issued forbidding them to appear, not only in the courts, but in the streets, during the holding of the assizes. He had at different times received applications from various commanding officers to allow their men to appear in the streets at such times, and not only had he on all occasions cordially granted the application, but had invited their presence in the Courts, and he had had the satisfaction of finding a considerable number of them among the spectators. At Shrewsbury, the commanding officer who made the application, pointed out the great inconvenience which would arise from the confinement of the men who were at the time billeted in the different public-houses of the city, and who would have been obliged, had the order been stringently enforced, to remain in their bedrooms during the whole of the assizes. Their Lordships were aware that there was a law which required troops to be removed a distance of two or three miles from any town during a Parliamentary election, but no law existed requiring their removal during the holding of the assizes, nor did he see that any danger was to be apprehended either to the independence of the Judge or the due administration of justice by allowing the presence of the militia or troops of the line in the courts or in the streets of assize towns during the progress of the trials. He should, therefore, ask his noble and gallant Friend whether there was any necessity for issuing the order in question, and, if not, whether the practice would be discontinued?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was extremely glad that his noble and learned Friend was about to put the question, for he had himself been struck, while a common-law Judge, with the absurdity of the regulation. The only exception to the rule that he recollects was at Chester, where the Judges lodged at the Castle, which, in point of fact, was the barracks, and the soldiers who remained there and who attended the court in considerable numbers were among the most orderly and attentive of the spectators.

LOBB CAMPBELL observed that, so far from there being any variance between the Judges and the soldiery, there really was an alliance between them, for some of his predecessors, Chief Justices of England, had commanded armies.

House adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THE FRENCH INDEMNITY FUND.

MR. BOWYER begged to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether the sum of 23,707*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, which, by certain Parliamentary returns was stated to have been paid to Monsieur Ladebat, a French subject, out of the "French Indemnity Fund;" had ever, and when, been returned to that fund, and if so, whether Her Majesty's Government had any objection to lay upon the table of the House a return showing the application thereof?

MR. WILSON said, that a sum of 23,707*l.* out of the French Indemnity Fund had been paid to M. Ladebat, a French subject; that payment was made under clauses of the treaty of 1815; the money had not been repaid, nor did he see any reason why it should be repaid. He had no objection to the production of any papers connected with the subject.

THE COLONIAL CHURCH.

MR. DUFFY rose to ask a question with regard to the status of the Church of England in the Australian Colonies. He wished to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether the Government had directed any departure to be made from the system of religious equality which had hitherto been established in the colonies of Australia; and whether the Royal assent had been withheld from a Bill which passed the Legislative Council of Victoria in November last, entitled "An Act to enable the Bishop, Clergy, and Laity of the United Church of England and Ireland, in Victoria, to provide for the regulation of the affairs of the said Church."

MR. J. BALL said that Her Majesty's Government had not given any directions on the subject to which the question of the hon. Gentleman related, and he had also to state that the Bill to which reference had been made had been referred to those gentlemen who usually examined those Bills which were sent to this country from the Colonies; but he himself had not seen the Bill, and could not, therefore, express any opinion as to its provisions. He might add that the measure to which the hon. Member had referred had not been sent to this country in consequence of any communication from the Home Government.

ADMIRAL THE EARL OF DUNDONALD'S PROPOSALS.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether it was intended by Government to entertain the proposition of Admiral the Earl of Dundonald; and, if not, whether the Government would object to the "searching investigation" into the merits of the plan, and which the Earl of Dundonald continues to solicit?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The Earl of Dundonald, everybody knows, is a most distinguished officer, and who not only combines naval and practical experience, but has also very great scientific attainments. The Earl of Dundonald from time to time has signified to the Government of the day that he has a plan which he conceives would afford great facilities for naval attacks on fortresses. That plan was last year submitted to the consideration of a Committee of naval officers and scientific men, and is still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. But under the circumstances I really cannot answer the question of my gallant Friend as to the intention of the Government on the subject. It is enough to say that those professional and scientific men, to whom I have referred, stated that they found grave difficulties to lie in the way of a practical execution of the project.

BOMBARDMENT OF SEBASTOPOL.

MR. MUNTZ wished to know from the noble Lord whether the statement which he saw in The Times newspaper a few days ago was correct—namely, that orders had been given by Lord Raglan, in consequence of a communication from the Home Government, to spare the town of Sebastopol during the bombardment?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No orders have been given, except to take the town of Sebastopol as soon as possible.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—THE BUDGET.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: I feel, Sir, that some apology, or at least some explanation, is due to the House for the postponement of the financial statement which I have to make on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the present moment. It was the wish of the Government that this statement should be as complete and, as far as it was in their power to make it, as satisfactory to the House as possible; and they were apprehensive that if it had been made shortly after the formation of a new Administration, and immediately after the appointment of a new Chancellor of the Exchequer, such a statement would have been less satisfactory to the House than if a longer period were allowed to elapse. The Government also felt that there was an advantage in waiting until the financial year had expired, as they would thereby be enabled to lay the annual accounts before the country in a more perfect form. At the same time, the Conferences at Vienna having lately commenced, Her Majesty's Government thought that it would be more seemly if at the commencement of these Conferences, and before they were able to form any judgment of the views likely to be entertained by the other great Powers, they did not proceed at once to lay before the House a statement of our annual expenditure and estimates founded on supplies already voted, and which assumed a continuance of the war. Her Majesty's Government, under these circumstances, thought it would be better to postpone until after Easter the time for making this statement, but in taking that course they feel they have extended the delay as far as they could with propriety; and they feel also that with a due regard to the public interests and consistently with the respect they owe to this House the period for making the financial statement can no longer be postponed. In making the statement, which it is now my duty to submit to the House, I am aware how much I have need of their kind indulgence. I will try to simplify the statement I shall have to lay before them as much as I am able, and it will be my purpose to render it as complete in itself, and satisfactory as possible to the extent of my power. I will begin by referring to the estimates made, for the revenue and expenses of the year which has just elapsed, by my right hon. Friend my predecessor in office, the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). The estimate he made for the revenue of the year which expired on the 31st of March last, was as follows:—The produce of existing taxes he took at 53,349,000*l.*; and the produce of the new taxes which he proposed for the ensuing year he estimated at 10,157,600*l.*; but the amount of the new taxes to be received within the year he calculated at only 6,147,000*l.* So that his estimate of the taxation to be received within the year amounted to 59,496,000*l.* Now, I must certainly congratulate my right hon. Friend on having exercised, in this instance, a species of financial second-sight, for whereas his estimated produce of the year was 59,496,000*l.*, the amount actually received was 59,496,154*l.* Hon. Gentlemen will see that the difference between the sum estimated and the sum actually received is, upon that very large amount, not greater than 154*l.* In the Ways and Means of last year, my right hon. Friend took a further power of issuing 1,750,000*l.* Exchequer bills, which were actually realised; and he also made an estimate for 6,000,000*l.* Exchequer bonds, which operation produced 5,375,513*l.*, making together an amount of unfunded debt equal to 7,125,513*l.* Therefore the produce of the taxation of the year being 59,496,154*l.*, and the unfunded debt thus created being 7,125,513*l.*, the total revenue of the year was 66,621,667*l.* The actual expenditure of last year having been 65,692,962*l.*, there was thus left an excess of receipts over expenditure of 928,705*l.*, which excess was, as I have already explained, produced by the issue of certain securities creating a further portion of unfunded debt. The revenue from taxation having been during the last year 59,496,154*l.*, and the expenditure 65,692,962*l.*, it follows that there was an actual deficit of revenue to the amount of 6,196,808*l.* But the entire amount of the new taxes imposed by my right hon. Friend last year was not received within the year, and there remains uncollected of the taxes which were imposed last year, but which have not been collected in the year ending the 31st March last, according to the best estimate that can be formed, a sum of 5,020,000*l.*—adding that sum to the revenue produced from the taxation of last year, the sum is 64,516,154*l.* The whole revenue estimated for the year, with the new taxes, including the portion uncollected, was estimated to be 63,506,000*l.*, and assuming that the uncollected portion should produce what it is now estimated it will produce, there will be on the estimate of revenue made by my right hon. Friend a gain of more than 1,000,000*l.* This result has taken place, though, in consequence of the alteration in the quarters of the year, the present year contains five days less than the estimate was made for; and, as the receipts would amount to about one million a week, the difference of the five days is not unimportant. I call the attention of the House to this result, inasmuch as it shows that, notwithstanding the burdens which unhappily it has been necessary to impose upon the people, and notwithstanding the disturbance of trade and industry and manufactures which a state of war must necessarily produce, the revenue that has been received, and that will, on a safe estimate, be received, including the new taxes imposed in the last year, exceeds the estimated amount by more than 1,000,000*l.*

I shall now proceed to estimate the expenditure for the ensuing year. The expenditure for the financial year, ending on the 5th of April, 1854, that is to say, the last year of peace, which included only a small military expense for the Kafir war, amounted to 51,198,000*l.*; but the expenditure for the year which has just expired has been 65,692,962*l.* I shall now, with the permission of the Committee, state the estimate of the expenditure for the present year, judged by a mode that with tolerable closeness approaches to the truth, inasmuch as all our military estimates have been voted, and some progress has been made in voting the Miscellaneous Estimates. The first item is the charge for the funded and unfunded debt, amounting to 27,974,000*l.*, in which a saving will be produced this year in consequence of the reduction of the 3½ per cent stock to 3 per cent, which, as was arranged by the Act of 1844, comes into effect in the course of the present year. The other charges on the Consolidated Fund, which have been now somewhat reduced in consequence of the numerous transfers made from that fund last Session, amount to 1,750,000*l.* The charge for the army, which has been already voted, amounts to 16,214,477*l.*; the charge for the navy, which has been also voted, amounts to 16,653,042*l.*; and the charge for the Ordnance amounts to 7,808,000*l.*; and I propose to take a vote of credit in aid of the military service for the year to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* The charge for the Civil Service amounts to 6,500,000*l.*; which makes a total for Supply services of 50,175,561*l.* I further include an estimate for two instalments of the Sardinian loan, one of which is now in progress of payment, and another may become due before the end of the year. That produces a total of expenditure, which we are able to estimate with tolerable accuracy, of 80,899,561*l.* I beg to state that the charge I have stated for the funded debt includes the additional expense of the interest of the loan which has been contracted this day, and which now awaits the confirmation of Parliament. The Committee will probably think that the sum of nearly 81,000,000*l.*, which I have just stated, may be excessive compared with the probable wants of the ensuing year. I fear, however, that any such anticipation will be over sanguine when we advert to the fact that during the last quarter—consisting of the months of January, February, and March of this year—the sum actually expended and disbursed from the Exchequer amounted to 19,474,000*l.* This great expenditure, as the Committee will naturally conceive, has been owing almost exclusively to the additional expenses of the war. Perhaps it may be satisfactory to the Committee to be informed, and I shall therefore state, what have been the expenses of the present year as compared with the expenses of the last year of peace and of the previous year. The total amount voted for the Army, Navy, and Ordnance and the Vote of Credit, constituting the military expenditure for the year 1853-1854, was 16,487,000*l.* The expenditure under the same heads for the last year amounted to 30,121,000*l.*, and the sum estimated for the corresponding expenditure of this year amounts to 43,675,000*l.* I shall further state the progress of the expenditure within the six last quarters. In the quarter ending January 5, 1854, the expenses for the supply services, which include the expenses of the Civil Service, amounted to 4,650,000*l.*; in the quarter ending April 5, 1854, they amounted to 5,640,000*l.*; in the quarter ending July 5, 1854, they amounted to 7,445,000*l.*; in the quarter ending the 10th of October last they amounted to 8,500,000*l.*; in the quarter ending the 5th of January last they amounted to 8,600,000*l.*; and in the quarter ending the 31st of March last they amounted to 11,664,000*l.*

I shall now proceed to state to the Committee the estimated income of the ensuing year, upon which we may rely to meet the estimated expenditure which I have laid before the Committee. It is estimated that the Customs for the present year will produce 20,500,000*l.*, in which sum is included that portion of the tea duty which would have been abandoned but for the Act passed at the beginning of this year. The amount which it is estimated will be received from the Excise is 17,071,000*l.*; stamps, 6,815,000*l.*, exclusive of 480,000*l.* stamp duty upon newspapers; land and assessed taxes, 2,920,000*l.*; property and income tax, 13,535,000*l.*; Post Office, 1,150,000*l.*, to which I add 288,000*l.* for postage on newspapers; Crown lands, 260,000*l.*; miscellaneous, 800,000*l.*—making a total revenue of 63,339,000*l.* The estimated expenditure, as I have already stated, amounts to 80,899,561*l.*; and I further include in the estimate for the expenditure for this year a sum of 1,000,000*l.* for Ways and Means Bills issued in the last year, and redeemable this year, issued to the Commissioners of the National Debt in consequence of the sales of stock belonging to the savings banks, and which will be replaced out of the revenue of this quarter. I further propose to take, in order to guard against those contingencies which may not unreasonably be expected, a margin of 4,440,000*l.* The Vote of Credit will be immediately applicable to the military services; but, in addition to the Vote of Credit so appropriated, I propose to leave an unappropriated margin of surplus revenue for the amount I have mentioned. This will make a total estimated expenditure for next year of 86,339,000*l.* I have already stated that the estimated revenue arising from the existing taxes amounts to 63,339,000*l.*; and we have therefore to provide in the service of the ensuing year for a deficit amounting to the difference between 86,339,000*l.* and 63,339,000*l.*—namely, for a deficit of 23,000,000*l.* The question now arises for the consideration of the Committee, how this deficiency is to be supplied; and it will be my duty to submit to your consideration the Ways and Means by which we propose that that deficiency shall be met.

It has been stated at different times that the entire expenditure for the war should be defrayed by taxes levied within the year. And it is said that it is not safe to intrust to a Government the power of effecting a loan—of borrowing money and mortgaging the revenues of posterity—for the purpose of defraying the extraordinary expenses of a war. I shall not enter into a long recapitulation of the opinions expressed on that subject, but I will take the liberty of reading a single passage from the celebrated essay of Mr. Hume on Public Credit, in which he states his opinion upon this question—

"It is very tempting to a Minister to employ such an expedient, as it enables him to make a great figure during his administration, without overburdening the people with taxes, or exciting any immediate clamours against himself. The practice, therefore, of contracting debt will almost infallibly be abused by every Government. It would scarcely be more imprudent to give a prodigal son a credit in every banker's shop in London, than to empower a statesman to draw bills in this manner upon posterity."

That is a plain statement of the doctrine that it is not expedient, under any circumstances, to attempt to defray the extraordinary expenses of a war by a loan, or by any other means than by taxes levied within the year. But the experience of this country and of other countries in all times has shown the impossibility of reducing to practice this attractive theory. It is impossible, with a large expenditure for military purposes immediately to be met, to raise by taxation the sum necessary for defraying the whole additional charge within the year. And even if it were found by experience to be practicable, the encroachment

upon the savings of the industrious classes, which would be caused by excessive taxation, would be a greater evil than the abstraction of capital by means of a loan, and its expenditure upon the war. I apprehend that nothing can be more certain than the effect of excessive taxation in making inroads into the savings of the industrious classes. We can see this fact proved to a certain extent in the diminution of useful projects of various kinds that has already begun to take place in this country, and which exhibits itself in the diminution of the private business of this House. It is well known that a diminution has taken place in the number of Bills for new projects of different kinds which have been brought before the Private Bills Committee, and by the fact that many projects which had already received the sanction of the House, have been suspended during the past year, because the calls upon the shareholders have not been paid up. Taxes which cripple enterprise and derange industry, or interfere with the ordinary distribution of capital, are more detrimental to the community than loans effected by the Government. The practice which was resorted to by Mr. Pitt and his successors during the last war, as it had been previously resorted to by their predecessors, was every year to defray the increased charge upon the Exchequer, partly by loan, and partly by additional taxes; and there is not a single year, during the Seven Years' war, during the American war, or during the French war, in which a loan was not contracted. Our experience, which has been purchased at the expense of much hardship upon individuals, and much privation endured by the public, should warn us against the attempt to meet any large temporary deficiency exclusively by taxation. Her Majesty's Government therefore determined to take steps for negotiating a loan to cover a portion of the deficiency arising within the year; and in so doing they felt that they were fortified by uniform experience, and by the constant example of their predecessors.

Before, however, I proceed with the explanation of the details of the loan, for which Her Majesty's Government have made a provisional contract, I would take the liberty of asking the Committee to listen to a short statement of the progress of the national debt, with a view of making them perfectly aware of the nature of the proceeding in which the Government has now embarked. Sir, at the beginning of the last century, in the year 1702, the national debt consisted of only 10,000,000*l.*; at the beginning of the reign of George II. it had risen to 53,000,000*l.* It was then reduced during the succeeding years of peace to 46,000,000*l.*, which was its amount at the beginning of the Spanish war in 1739. During that war it rose to 72,000,000*l.*, at which amount it stood in 1748, at the conclusion of the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. At the beginning of the Seven Years' war in 1757 it amounted to 76,000,000*l.*, and at the end of the war, and at the Peace of Paris in 1763, it amounted to 135,000,000*l.*, at which sum it remained up to the commencement of the American war in 1776. In 1786, three years after the termination of the American war, it stood at 259,000,000*l.*; and in 1793, at the commencement of the French war, it had risen to 269,000,000*l.* In 1800 it amounted to 491,000,000*l.*, and in the month of February, 1816, it had reached 816,000,000*l.* Since the peace it has undergone some reductions, and on the 5th of January last the funded debt of this country amounted to 751,000,000*l.*—the decrease since the peace in 1816 having been 64,471,968*l.* The details which I have read to the Committee show the continual tendency of a great national debt to increase. They show that we bequeath to our successors, together with the advantages of our free Government, our religion, our established institutions, our arts and sciences, a debt which is a mortgage upon our late posterity; and they show, also, that the additions which are made to that debt during a time of war are but imperfectly removed by the slight reductions effected during the subsequent periods of peace. If, therefore, upon the renewal of hostilities, and under the circumstances in which this country is now placed, it becomes necessary to resort to the practice of borrowing, it is certainly incumbent upon Parliament to take such means as are at its disposal to prevent us from imposing a perpetual burden upon our successors. It is said that the creation of a perpetual debt is merely the short-sighted expedient of improvident Ministers, and that by proper attention to finance, and to the modes of providing for the extinction of the debt, this perpetual charge may be avoided. But it will be found, on closer examination, that this system of borrowing is forced, to a great extent, upon the Government by the interests and preferences of the lenders. It suits the lender to purchase perpetual annuities, the capital of which he can at all times realise by going into the market; and, at the same time, he is protected by their perpetuity from the danger of redemption. It is the danger of redemption, in fact, which so greatly influences the value of public stocks—those stocks which are least exposed to the danger of being redeemed being those that command the highest prices in the market. I will take the liberty of mentioning that a gentleman who holds the situation of actuary of one of the leading insurance offices—Mr. Newmarch—has recently examined, in an able pamphlet, the question of the loans effected during the last war, and he successfully shows that those loans were obtained upon terms much less disadvantageous to the public than we have been accustomed, of late years, to suppose. Our predecessors, while thus creating this enormous burden of debt in successive years, were, notwithstanding, fully conscious of the evils they entailed upon posterity, and they took at different times measures, which they believed to be efficacious, for preventing the continuance of that evil. From an early period different schemes were proposed for the creation of a sinking fund for the extinction of the national debt; and a plan, which at the time was thought to be efficacious, was devised by Mr. Pitt, carried in 1786, and maintained in one form or another during the whole of the late war. There is no doubt that Mr. Pitt, and most of his contemporaries, believed in the efficacy of the sinking fund for the extinction of the debt, although the sinking fund was itself created by borrowing, and the delusion under which they laboured was, that by some contrivance of keeping up a nominal sinking fund, supported by loans, and by some imaginary operation of compound interest, it would be possible, at no distant time, to extinguish the whole of the national debt. This idea was fondly cherished by Mr. Pitt, who unquestionably died, as he had lived, in the conviction of its soundness, and that great statesman would not believe that he had been the means of entailing a burden upon future generations, the end of which it is scarcely possible for us even to conjecture. There is also another class of cases in which Parliament has recognised the inexpediency of a perpetual loan, namely, in all those cases in which money is borrowed by subordinate bodies; I may refer, for example, to cases in which money is advanced to boards of guardians to the justices of the peace, and to other subordinate authorities, who are entitled to charge the rates of their districts with the payment of loans raised for some permanently useful purposes. I may state, for instance, to the Committee that the expenses for building or repairing county bridges, prisons, town-halls, asylums, and other similar works, must be paid off, according to Act of Parliament, within twenty or thirty years. In fact, there is a long series of Acts of Parliament, in which powers are given to local bodies to raise loans upon the security of the taxes within their command, and in every case the creation of an annual sinking fund is made compulsory upon them, and it is required of them that they should extinguish the debt within a limited number of years. This practice sanctions the principle of not permitting the existence of a perpetual debt where the body contracting the loan is under the control of Parliament; and, indeed, I doubt whether there is a single example in which a loan of that kind is authorised to be raised by a public body without an express provision having been made for its liquidation within a definite period. With respect, again, to the case of railway companies, the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act has a clause which provides that unless the money borrowed by any company on mortgage be repaid by the specified period before agreed on, it shall be open for the parties interested to demand the repayment of the principal on giving six months' notice to that effect, thus distinctly preventing the possibility of the debt being perpetual. Another means of preventing the existence of a perpetual national debt has been adopted by the mode of raising loans upon terminable annuities. The raising of money for the Government in the last-named manner is a plan which has recommended itself to many persons, and unquestionably offers great advantages with respect to the extinction of the debt. The Committee are doubtless aware of the nature of terminable annuities. An annuity is granted by Government for a limited number of years, and it pays to the annuitant annually not only a sum calculated as interest, but also a certain portion calculated as principal, so that at the end of the given term, whatever it may be, the entire debt, both principal and interest, is discharged. The advantage of the system of terminable annuities, in securing the extinction of debt, so far as the Government is concerned, is obvious, inasmuch as the periodical repayment of a portion of the principal sum borrowed is made a distinct and component part of the contract entered into between the Government and the party lending; and, without breach of faith, the Government cannot omit to pay every year a portion of the principal. But although Government in this manner finds its hands, as it were, tied up, and is bound to extinguish a certain portion of the debt, unless it be guilty of a breach of faith; it is found in practice that terminable annuities are to so little extent a marketable commodity, the demand for them by the public is so limited, and the dislike to receiving annually a portion of the principal, which the individual must either spend as revenue, thereby diminishing his principal, or else reinvest in very small sums, as he receives them, is so great and general, that at no time in this country has it been possible for the Government to effect a loan on terminable annuities only. There is no example of an entire loan having been effected on that species of security; and the terminable annuities have in every instance been combined with a loan for a perpetual annuity; they now amount to a considerable sum, and are formed of the aggregate amount of the terminable annuities of the different loans that have been effected. They are formed of the aggregate of loans on terminable annuities similar to that which the Government has this day effected. Therefore, however much Her Majesty's Government may have desired to effect the whole loan that is necessary on terminable annuities, they had no option in the matter. It was impossible for them to obtain such a sum as is required for the service of the year on terminable annuities without giving a price which would be justly considered as exorbitant and unjustifiable. It seems to be supposed by many persons, with regard to terminable annuities, as it was at one time thought with regard to the sinking fund, that it acts by some mechanical and spontaneous operation towards the extinction of the debt. It was considered that the nation thus obtained value without equivalent or security, and effected a reduction of their debt without an expenditure of taxation; and that by some mysterious and occult process, which no one has been ever able to describe, the national debt might be reduced and ultimately extinguished, without any burdens being imposed upon the people. Unfortunately, nothing can be less well-founded than these suppositions, which are wholly chimerical and illusory. A terminable annuity consists of the repayment of principal as well as the payment of interest; and although at the end of the given time the debt will be extinguished, it will have been extinguished by the ordinary mode of repayment of principal with interest, the repayments having been provided for out of the annual produce of the taxation of the country. Under the circumstances I have stated, Her Majesty's Government found it was necessary that a part of the loan they were called upon to contract should be effected in perpetual stock; that is to say, the only means by which they could have avoided the creation of a perpetual stock would have been by borrowing the whole amount on stock of a terminable nature, and thus leaving the whole amount borrowed to be repaid at the end of a fixed time. For instance, if the Government had determined to effect a loan on stock terminable at the end of thirty years, when that period arrived it would be necessary for the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that year to provide a surplus of 16,000,000*l.* for the extinction of the debt. Now we all know from experience that nothing is more improbable than that a provision would have been made by previous Parliaments for the payment of a sum of 16,000,000*l.* for the extinction of that debt when the time should arrive. If such a mode of creating terminable stock had been resorted to, it would infallibly, at the conclusion of the period, end in disappointment. We should find that the nation would resort to some method of re-borrowing like that adopted by railway companies, who, having borrowed on debentures payable in three, five, or seven years, simply continue them when they expire, and scarcely ever extinguish the debt. Her Majesty's Government therefore thought that any plan that created terminable stock, the whole of which would become payable at the end of a certain term, would be an ineffectual mode of obtaining the object they had in view; and I, therefore, propose as a means—so far as lies in our power—of preventing the creation of a perpetual burden by the loan which we have found it necessary to effect, to insert in the Loan Act a clause which will render it incumbent upon the Government for the time being at the end of the year following the signature of a treaty of peace, to set aside one million sterling annually until the whole perpetual portion of the debt which they propose to contract shall be extinguished. In that manner a legal obligation will be imposed upon the Government of the day to provide one million sterling annually for the redemption of the debt now about to be incurred. I am aware that any Act of Parliament we may now pass may be repealed or modified by subsequent Acts. All similar Acts, I must be allowed to say, have been violated, and it is impossible to make any law which our successors can be prevented from altering; there is no irrevocable Act of Parliament. But we can pass an Act which will produce the only effect it is in our power to accomplish—namely, to render it incumbent on the Government for the time being to provide funds for the extinction of the debt, and to make it obligatory on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for each successive year, to include that amount in his estimate of expenditure, and to provide the funds necessary for the extinction of the debt, unless Parliament should deem it otherwise expedient. Sir, it appears to me that the only sound sinking fund—the only effectual mode of discharging the debt—is that Parliament should agree, upon the return of peace, to create a special revenue by taxation, and to set aside annually a certain portion of revenue for the reduction of the debt. If Parliament would again return to the policy which it pursued after the peace, but which unfortunately was soon afterwards abrogated, of creating a sinking fund of 5,000,000*l.* annually, and applying those 5,000,000*l.* to the redemption of debt during times of peace, when no loans are necessary, then we should be making undoubtedly slow but steady progress towards the extinction of the debt. If, unhappily, another war should arise, or any other circumstance, to create an extraordinary demand on the Exchequer, it would then be in the power of Parliament to release the Government from the obligation of the extinction of debt, and to apply that margin of surplus revenue to defray the extraordinary expenditure of the year, thus rendering the imposition of new taxes unnecessary, and affording a reliable surplus to fall back upon. When those extraordinary demands shall have been met, the way would then be prepared to continue the extinction of debt by the only sure means by which it can be extinguished—namely, by the creation of a surplus of taxation, and not by any imaginary expedient of a sinking fund founded on borrowed capital.

Sir, in the Essay on Public Credit, from which I have already read an extract, Mr. Hume remarks that either the nation must destroy public credit, or public credit will destroy the nation. Now, Sir, I beg leave, with great submission to so high an authority on questions of this sort, to dispute both branches of this dictum. We see, by long experience, that the nation has not destroyed public credit; for during the exigencies of the most disastrous wars—during that period of great depression which followed the American war—during the Irish rebellion, during the mutiny at the Nore, and other occurrences tending to shake the stability of our institutions in the course of the French revolutionary war, the sacredness of our public credit was never for a moment violated. On the other hand, I may equally venture to question the other branch of the dictum, that public credit will destroy the nation. Notwithstanding the rapid increase and vast amount of the national debt, the magnitude of which I have already laid before the Committee, there has been a perpetual growth of the prosperity of the country since the conclusion of the last peace, and the proportion which the wealth of the country bears to its means of paying taxes and affording a revenue to the Government has been perpetually augmenting. Moreover, at the same time, annual means have been found, in consequence of this prosperity, of reducing the interest of the national debt, and thus making the debt a smaller annual charge on the country. In the year 1816, the charge of the national debt was 30,458,207*l.*; in the year 1854 the charge was 26,521,190*l.*; being a decrease of 3,937,017*l.* in the actual charge of the debt. The income tax in the last year of the war, which then stood at 10 per cent, produced 14,880,000*l.*; the income tax of 6 per cent in the last year produced nearly 14,000,000*l.*; showing how great has been the increase in the income of the country since the peace, and how far, therefore, the ability of the country to bear taxation has been augmented. Sir, I can see nothing in the present state of our national debt, with all the burdens it entails on us, to cause any well-grounded feeling of despondency at our future prospects; but I see ample ground for confidence with forethought and good management of our national finances.

Having stated the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government have determined to effect a loan of 16,000,000*l.* for the service of the present year, I will merely observe that they have negotiated such portion of it as they thought they could obtain in terminable annuities on that species of security, recognising the value of the principle that the nation should bind itself to discharge a portion of the loan by the annual repayment of principal as well as interest. With respect to the remaining portion of the loan, they have necessarily borrowed it, in a perpetual stock; but, at the same time, they propose to undertake an obligation to repay 1,000,000*l.* in each year, after the conclusion of peace until the whole is paid off.

While on the one hand Her Majesty's Government have rejected the plan of attempting to defray the whole expenditure of the year out of the annual taxation, so, on the other hand, they have rejected the plan of defraying the whole of that expenditure out of borrowed money. They have judged it prudent to follow the example of former years, in which the extraordinary expenses of the war were defrayed by an addition to the taxes of the year as well as by an annual loan.

With the permission of the Committee I will briefly state the progress of taxation during the late war; from which they will see that with the system then adopted, although it was founded upon the defrayment of the expenses of each year in part by loan—the loan having been generally annual, though sometimes even two loans were contracted in one year—it was, notwithstanding, found necessary to make a considerable addition to the annual taxation. In 1793, the sum raised by taxation was 17,656,418*l.*; in 1801, it was 35,229,968*l.*; in 1808, it was 58,390,255*l.*; in 1815, it was 69,684,192*l.*; thereby showing the great addition which was made to the annual taxation of the country during the war, notwithstanding the large sums raised by borrowing. We propose, therefore, Sir, to make an addition to the public taxation of this year of a sum amounting, according to the estimate we have made, to 5,300,000*l.* I will now, with the permission of the Committee, state to them the manner in which this addition is proposed to be effected. In the first place we propose an addition to the present duties on sugar, of 3*s.* per cwt., to be varied according to the quality. That additional duty, we estimate, will produce the sum of 1,200,000*l.* In justification of that estimate I will, with the permission of the Committee, state briefly the recent stock and consumption of sugar. The stock of sugar in London on the 14th April, 1855, was 51,890 tons. At the same time last year, the stock was only 42,120 tons. In consequence of the last year's importation, the short price of sugar (by which is meant the price minus the duty) was lower from 3*s.* to 4*s.* a cwt. than it was a year ago. I will now state the comparative prices of sugar in two years since 1844, by which the Committee will see that, notwithstanding the addition now to be proposed to the duty, the price to the consumer is at present considerably lower than it was at that period. In 1844 the importation amounted to 4,129,000 cwts.; the price in bond was 33*s.* 8*d.*, and the duty 25*s.* 2*d.*, making the full price 58*s.* 10*d.* In 1846, after the alteration of the duty had taken place, the importation amounted to 5,220,000 cwts.; the price in bond was 34*s.* 5*d.* and the duty 14*s.*, making the full price 48*s.* 5*d.* In 1854 the consumption had risen to 8,096,000 cwts.; the price in bond was only 25*s.*, the duty was 12*s.*, making the full price to the consumer 37*s.* Under the new duties at present the price in bond is only 23*s.*, the new duty is 15*s.*, and the price to the consumer will be only 38*s.*, that is to say 1*s.* more than the price of last year, 10*s.* less than the price of 1846, and 20*s.* less than the price of 1844. We further propose an addition of 1*d.* per lb. to the duty on coffee, which is at present 3*d.* per lb.—that is an extremely moderate duty; we propose to increase it to 4*d.*; and we estimate that this will yield an additional revenue of 150,000*l.* I have already stated that the reduction in the duty on tea which would have taken place this year was stayed by the Act passed at the beginning of the year. I propose, also, to make some addition to the duty on tea. In 1853, the duty on tea stood at 2*s.* 2½*d.* per lb.; it was reduced in the first year to 1*s.* 10*d.*, and next year to 1*s.* 6*d.*, at which rate it now stands. I propose to raise it to 1*s.* 9*d.* per lb., which will be 1*d.* less than the rate at which it stood in the first year of the reduction. That addition to the duty on tea I estimate to produce 750,000*l.* This will make a total addition to the revenue derived from Customs duties of 2,100,000*l.* With respect to the Stamp Duties, they have undergone recently so systematic a revision, that it is not my intention to propose any alteration in them, with one exception—that of the removal of the exemption which bankers' cheques now possess when drawn within fifteen miles of the place where they are payable. This exemption is the means of diminishing the duty from receipt stamps, inasmuch as unstamped cheques frequently perform the duty of stamped receipts. I propose to withdraw that exemption; and the effect of this withdrawal, it is estimated, will be to produce about 200,000*l.* additional revenue. I come now, Sir, to the head of Excise. The only duty of Excise upon which I shall propose any augmentation to the Committee is the duty on spirits. My proposal is to assimilate the duties on Scottish spirits to those upon English. The duty on English spirits is now 7*s.* 10*d.* a gallon; the duty on Scotch spirits is 6*s.* a gallon, and I propose to equalise them. The present duty on Irish spirits is 4*s.* a gallon. On account, Sir, of the circumstances of Ireland regarding illicit distillation, I do not propose to equalise the duty on Irish spirits to the English and Scotch rate, but I propose to raise it to 6*s.* a gallon. The additions which have recently been made to the spirit duty both in Scotland and Ireland have not produced any increase of illicit distillation, nor have they diminished consumption. I will state to the Committee the consumption of English, Scottish, and Irish spirits during the last ten years. The consumption in England during the financial year, ending January 5, 1854, was 10,350,000 gallons; in 1855, it was 10,839,000 gallons. In Scotland, the consumption of the financial year 1854 was 6,534,000 gallons; that of 1855, was 6,553,000 gallons; thus showing a slight increase of consumption, notwithstanding the addition to the duty. In Ireland, the consumption of 1854 was 8,136,000 gallons; in 1855, it had risen to 8,440,000 gallons. The effect, therefore, of this experiment in increasing the duties on spirits is to recommend a further advance in the same direction. It can hardly be disputed that if an increased duty, producing a considerable sum, can be obtained from spirits without increasing illicit distillation, smuggling, and all the evils which go in their train, it is as legiti-mate a means of providing an additional revenue during the heavy expenditure inevitable in a time of war as can well be found. I estimate, not on a sanguine conjecture, the produce of this increased duty on Scottish and Irish spirits at 1,000,000*l.* sterling; and this, with the augmentations I have already stated to the Customs, Stamps, and Excise duties will bring an addition to the revenue of 3,300,000*l.* In order, however, to raise a sum sufficient for the service of the year, it is still further necessary that we should propose some addition to the direct taxation of the country. Last year the additions made to the direct and indirect taxes were in this proportion. The additions to the indirect taxes were calculated to produce 2,600,000*l.*; the addition to the direct taxes, 6,557,000*l.*; therefore the great increase was on the direct taxes, being more than double that on the indirect. In the plan, however, which I have now the honour of submitting to the Committee, it has been thought desirable to throw the excess into the other side of the scale, and to levy the larger sum by indirect taxation, and a less sum by direct taxation. While, therefore, we propose to raise 3,300,000*l.* from the indirect taxes in the manner I have stated, 2,000,000*l.* are left to be raised by direct taxes. Now, the number of direct taxes to which a Chancellor of the Exchequer can resort with advantage for the purpose of raising additional revenue is very limited. It is well known that the land tax in this country is an impost which is fixed at rates varying in different localities, which has been made the subject of partial redemption; and it is in a state which renders all attempts to increase it impossible except in a very partial degree, and by means which it would be very difficult to carry into operation. The only direct taxes of any magnitude besides the income tax to which our attention can be directed are the house and assessed taxes. With respect to the house tax, its produce is not very considerable; it is between 700,000*l.* and 800,000*l.* a year; and even if the tax were doubled, and some extension given to its area, it still would hardly produce above 1,000,000*l.* of additional revenue. The house tax is, after all, only a species of income tax, and the same may be said of the assessed taxes, which, moreover, fall upon a narrower class of persons than the income tax, and which are not only subject to the objection of their incidence while any increase in them would interfere with the employment of industry. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, after consideration, have come to the conclusion that the best form of direct taxation which now exists is the income tax. It reaches on the whole the largest number of persons, and its operation falls with fairness on different classes of incomes, whilst an additional sum can be collected through the existing machinery, thus obviating the necessity of creating any new tax, of creating a new inspection, or of extending the machinery of collection to meet an extraordinary expenditure which I hope will not be of long duration. On the whole, then, we propose that the additional sum of 2,000,000*l.* required shall be raised by an augmentation of the income tax, by simply adding 1 per cent, or 2*d.* in the pound, to its present amount. With this enhanced rate of income tax, I calculate that an addition of 2,000,000*l.* will be secured for the service of the next year, 1,000,000*l.* of which will be received within the present financial year. This addition to the income tax therefore, conjoined with the additions to the other indirect taxes already specified, will produce a sum of 5,300,000*l.*, which, together with the loan, and the sum of 3,000,000*l.* in Exchequer bills, for the issue of which we propose to take a power equivalent to that of a vote of credit as taken in former years, will complete the sum necessary for the service of the year.

With the permission of the Committee, I will now state precisely the Ways and Means by which we propose to meet the estimated expenditure of the ensuing year. That expenditure, I have already stated to the Committee at 86,339,000*l.*; the estimated revenue from existing taxes I have given at 63,339,000*l.*; the loan will furnish 16,000,000*l.*; and the new taxes receivable in the year 1855-56 will be 4,000,000*l.* I say 4,000,000*l.*, leaving out 1,000,000*l.* of income tax which will not be receivable within the year, and, in order to avoid the appearance of over sanguine calculation, I have also omitted 300,000*l.* of indirect taxes. I think this is a safe and moderate calculation in making allowance for the fluctuations which may occur in consumption. The issue of Exchequer bills, for which I propose to ask power to the extent of 3,000,000*l.*, will not, under any circumstances, take place until the last instalment of the loan, payable in December next, shall have been paid up. All these Ways and Means will

To enable the country to bear the increased charge, the items of which I have now submitted to the Committee, all that is necessary is, that its resources should remain unimpaired, and that the vast creation of wealth which has been going on without interruption for some years past should not suffer any diminution in consequence of the vicissitudes of the war. Now, Sir, there is one cause of favourable anticipation, to which I think hardly sufficient attention has been paid in this House, and to which, as it seems to me, scarcely sufficient credit has been given to the Government which preceded that of my noble Friend near me—I mean the measures they adopted with respect to trade with neutral nations. It is well known that during the late war a large portion of the disturbance of trade and interruption to manufactures was owing to the unwise retaliatory measures adopted by this country against the Berlin and Milan decrees. The Orders in Council then issued led to great disturbance of the trade with neutral nations, and created an amount of loss and disturbance of commerce and industry, which it would, perhaps, be no exaggeration to say was equal to the entire detriment and suffering created by the increased taxes. From that cause of national loss the country has been fortunately saved by the wise measures which the late Government have adopted. In consequence of the measures adopted in former years by the Legislature, as well as of the measures taken for the protection of our commerce since the war, hitherto with success, a sound state of commerce has been preserved, and it appears that a vast increase has taken place in the amount of our foreign trade. As a proof of the present power of the country to bear increased taxation, I will beg to draw the attention of the Committee to a comparison of our imports and exports in the year in which the French war broke out, in the year when peace was concluded, and the present year. In 1793 the imports into the United Kingdom were valued at 17,850,000*l.*; in 1815 they were valued at 32,987,000*l.*; in 1853 they had risen to 123,099,000*l.* Our exports in 1793 were 18,486,000*l.*; in 1815 they were 58,629,000*l.*; and in 1853 they were 242,072,000*l.* These figures, Sir, present incontestable proofs of the enormous increase of the trade of this country since the beginning of the French war and since the last peace; and they prove that an enormous mass of wealth exists in the country, from which an additional amount of taxation can be raised to defray the extraordinary expenditure of the country.

I fear that it has been necessary for me to detain the Committee at very considerable length in laying these statements before them; but I preferred running the risk of being tedious, to that of subjecting myself to the charge of having withheld from the knowledge of the Committee information necessary for their guidance. The plan I have introduced to their notice is proposed in a spirit of fairness to all the various interests of the country, and I submit it to the Committee with the confidence that it will receive a fair and liberal consideration, and that an impartial judgment will be passed upon it. I will only entreat hon. Members that in examining the ways and means by which the Government propose to defray the expenditure of the year, and to meet the exigencies of the times, they will take the whole plan into consideration at once, that they will not single out particular details of it, that they will look at it as a whole, and will form a combined judgment on the scheme proposed by the Government, keeping constantly in mind that if they change any part of the plan now proposed, they must look to some practical alternative, to some other less objectionable means by which we may provide for the service of the country.

Perhaps, before I conclude, the Committee would wish for some particulars with respect to the loan which was contracted for this morning. The Government required that the party proposing for the loan should give 100*l.* in money for every 100*l.* stock created, in order to avoid that state of things which sometimes occurred during the late war, of a large debt in stock being created, for which the Government received an imperfect equivalent. By the mode which has been adopted the Government will receive 100*l.* in money for every 100*l.* of stock created. I will briefly point out what was done during the late war in this respect. In 1798 a loan of 17,000,000*l.* was contracted for, to meet which 34,000,000*l.* of stock was created; in 1801 there was a loan of 28,000,000*l.* and stock created to the extent of 49,210,000*l.*; in 1813, a loan of 27,000,000*l.* with 45,900,000*l.* stock; and in 1815, a loan of 36,000,000*l.* with 62,240,000*l.* stock.

By adopting the course we have this day followed, we at least secure to the public 100*l.* for every 100*l.* of stock issued. That portion of the price of the loan necessary to make up the price of Consols for the day, is contracted in a terminable annuity of 14*s.* 6*d.*, which will necessarily expire by annual payments at the end of thirty years. We have every reason to believe that the terms of that loan are fair between the contractors and the public, and that the public has reason to be satisfied with the rate at which it has been taken. A provisional contract only is entered into between the Government and the lenders. The Government must lay the terms of the loan before Parliament in order to receive its sanction. As it is my duty to submit them to the Committee, I now ask them to agree to Resolutions embodying the terms and conditions of the loan.

The following are the Resolutions referred to in the Financial Statement—

perfectly illusory? When peace came there would be a pressure upon the Government to take off some unpopular tax; and if they could escape from the liability of this annual payment without a positive act of bankruptcy, would not this sinking fund share the fate of other sinking funds? They ought to look the whole question boldly in the face, and be prepared either to create a perpetual national debt and borrow upon 3 per cent. Consols—the cheapest form in which they could obtain money—or else they should consider whether there was not some form of loan in which whatever addition was made to the national debt should be of a terminable character, so that in a given period of years it might be extinguished. He looked upon all this as a mere question of price in the market. If the Government of England went into the market and said, "Here is an annuity of 4*l.* or 5*l.* a year, terminable within a period of sixty or 100 years," this would have a clear, intelligible market value, and, like everything else, might be made negotiable. It would not bring for the moment quite so much proportionably as a perpetual annuity of 3 per cent, because the 3 per cent Consols formed the bulk of our stock, and commanded a better price on that account. But that was entirely a question as to the amount of stock you created. If the Government created so small an amount of stock as now proposed, that stock would be unavailable except to a very limited extent; but if they began by borrowing in the form of terminable annuities for a period of 100 or sixty years, and created similar stock whenever they were obliged to incur new debts, so as to throw into the market a large amount of stock expiring at the same period, and being, therefore, a uniform stock in the market, such a stock would be easily negotiable, and there would be no difficulty as to the rate at which that kind of security would go off. In creating it in Consols there was one important consideration; it would not be all gain which the Government made by effecting their loan in 3 per cent Consols. The circumstance which kept that stock at such an extraordinarily high price was, that it formed at present the only mode of investment for the greater number of trust funds. There was always, therefore, owing to this, a large demand, with a limited supply; and this stock was thus kept artificially high. If they compared the prices of the funds in England and France, the difference of price in the public securities was by no means justified by the intrinsic credit of the two countries, but it was due to the great wealth of England, seeking for investment in the one large and uniform description of stock open to it, which stock was therefore kept at an artificially high price. In consequence of that, 3 per cent consols bore a higher value than other securities, and consols were the barometer which regulated the value of the great mass of other property. If, therefore, by creating a large additional amount of that stock the Government increased the floating supply in the market, they would inevitably bring down the price of 3 per cent Consols, and in doing so would also bring down the prices of securities of every denomination, which fluctuated more or less with the price of Consols. Let the Committee consider for a moment whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer had obtained a loan on terms which gave an equivalent for having created perpetual instead of terminable annuities. A short time since consols remained steadily at from 92 to 93; money was comparatively scarce; the rate of interest at the Bank was 5 per cent; money suddenly became abundant and the market changed, from a condition of tightness to one of easiness; foreign exchanges were in our favour; bullion accumulated rapidly in the Bank; the Bank reduced the rate of interest to 4*½* per cent, with the prospect of still further reduction; the circumstances were all in favour of retaining the price of Consols. But Consols were considerably depressed by a series of operations on the part of the Government, which, in his opinion, were short-sighted. The amount of sales by the Government broker on account of savings banks was so great that Consols, instead of rising from 92 or 93 to 94 or 95, had been depressed to 90 or 91. It was very bad policy, when a loan was contemplated, to depress the market by sales by the Government broker. The natural effect of a loan was to produce a heavy fall even with an abundance of money, and when every circumstance was otherwise favourable for great operations; and as soon as it was known a great portion of the loan would be created in 3 per cent Consols, as a natural consequence there was a heavy fall in the market. And thus, with favourable circumstances and abundance of money, instead of Consols rising, which he contended they would have done if there had been no sales by the Government broker, they had fallen, and instead of the loan being calculated on the basis of Consols at 94 or 95, or certainly, at the lowest calculation, at 92 or 93, Consols had been forced down to 90, and when the value of the annuity given with the 3 per cent Consols was estimated, he believed it would be found that the 16,000,000*l.* of national debt was created at a figure equivalent to little more than consols at 85 or 87. There was another point connected with the loan in which he thought the Government was at fault. In borrowing money they had to choose between a system of open loan, in which the Government applied at once to the public, and a system of close loan, in which the Government applied to middlemen. He by no means participated in the prejudices against middlemen. He believed that in money, and in corn, and other trades, middlemen were useful, and that they might do better through a middleman than by direct communication with the customer; but in making use of middlemen or agents, they ought to bring the element of competition into action, and pit the middlemen against each other. If the Government resorted to agents for a loan they ought to take care there should be sufficient competition. They might either do that or abandon the use of agents, and resort to an open loan. Upon the information derived from private negotiation, they might fix the terms, and leave everybody who pleased to subscribe his 100*l.* That system was adopted by the French Government, on a recent occasion, with great success; and he thought under that system the results obtained would have been more satisfactory than under the system which had in this instance been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. If the Government had avoided the sale of savings-banks money, which depressed the market; if they had determined not to create more 3 per cent Consols, but to create a new 3½ per cent stock, or some description of terminable annuities; and if they had made up their minds to a clear and intelligible plan, by which the whole public would have been invited to subscribe, his belief was that they would have obtained the money on much more favourable terms than had been obtained on this occasion. The first hearing of a Budget was not an occasion upon which to enter into details, but he trusted the House would take the opportunity of considering the principle on which this loan had been created, and, after mature deliberation, decide the principle on which future loans should be created. He would merely make one remark on the increase of taxes. There was a sum of 5,000,000*l.* to make up; and he had heard with great regret that several additional taxes were to be proposed. He could not understand why the income tax was not raised higher, when during the last war it stood at 10 per cent. The present generation were as patriotic as the last, and as ready to pay with their eyes open the taxes which were necessary, and not 10 but 9 per cent would produce the whole money which was required. He could not understand why they were to retrace their steps—why they were to affect such important interests as the interests of our West India colonies by an alteration of the sugar duties—why they were to meddle with a tax of so much importance as the duty on coffee, for the sake of a miserable sum of 150,000*l.*—or, why they were to incur all the evils of unsettling the system of taxation adopted in recent legislation for these comparatively small amounts, while the income tax remained to them. He trusted the Committee would bear in mind that the money derived by the Exchequer by no means represented the evils caused by these small additions to taxation. If by an alteration of the sugar duties the Government raised a million of money, that million of money would not adequately represent the mischief to the colonial interests by unsettling the sugar duties. During a great many years past the sugar duties had been in a state of perpetual alteration. No man interested in the West India colonies had known from month to month, scarcely from day to day, what those duties were. At last, when, having struggled through great difficulties, those colonies were beginning to raise their heads and improve their condition, the sugar duties were again to be unsettled. He hoped the House would say, "We have gone to war with our eyes open, and we will bear the burden with our eyes open; we will not fritter away the sources of our trade; we will not affect the condition of the working classes; we will not undo what we have done; and we will not consent to all these petty and peddling alterations in the financial policy established by Sir Robert Peel."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should not enter into the question raised by the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but rather seek to obtain information for future discussions. Upon the Resolutions read by the Chairman he did not feel himself in a position to give an opinion; but, in reply to the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, he would say that he did not believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer existed, ever did exist, or ever would exist, who was able to extract from the pockets of the people in one year 86,000,000*l.* He said it was impossible either by direct or indirect taxation to raise that sum. If he were allowed to make a remark upon that large amount, it would be to point out the enormous danger of entering on an aggressive war upon the Russian Empire. They might have easily protected their allies the Turks from aggression, but when they entered on an aggressive war the immediate consequence was the raising of taxation to 86,250,000*l.* He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that the expenditure of the year 1854-55, ending the 31st of March, amounted to 65,692,962*l.* He wished to learn whether there were any outstanding expenses; because, unless they could get at that, they would know nothing, and might fall into a prodigious error in supposing those figures represented the whole expense of the war up to the end of March last. He wished to learn from the right hon. Gentleman to what extent this country had run in debt during the past year? Fresh taxes to the amount of upwards of 10,000,000*l.* were voted last year, a large portion of which—he believed nearly one-half—was still unpaid, though upwards of 7,000,000*l.* of money raised by Exchequer bonds and Exchequer bills had been actually spent. He wished to know, therefore, where the right hon. Gentleman took credit for the 5,000,000*l.* of taxes still due on the year 1854-55—because there are both the debt and the taxes to be accounted for. So far from the expenses of the war having been paid out of the taxes, he believed the Government had spent all the taxes that could be obtained, and 7,300,000*l.* of borrowed money in Exchequer bills and Exchequer bonds. The right hon. Gentleman had stated very clearly what was a terminable annuity; but in the course which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take of applying the income tax to these annuities there was the danger of taxing the principal and not the interest, and to tax the principal would be to enter upon a career at variance with all principle whatever. Was it not the fact that at this moment an enormous tax was levied upon Long Annuities, and could it be imagined that taxes could be continued to be raised by a species of taxation which was nothing more than robbery and plunder of the grossest description? He agreed with the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Martin Smith), that the right hon. Gentleman ought to give some clear intimation of the intention of the Government with regard to subjecting the new terminable annuities to the income tax.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In answer to the first question of the hon. Baronet with respect to the expenses of the war, I may inform him that the chief part of the expenses of the army, navy, and ordnance department, is met by payments in ready money; and that with regard to the charges for transports, and for various contracts for food and clothing, the payments were made every quarter, and have been made within the last few days—at all events very recently. No doubt some of these payments may be in arrear, but I do not apprehend that the amount is very large. With respect to the Exchequer bills and bonds referred to, no portion of them is payable next year, and therefore no provision for them is necessary at present. With regard to the terminable annuities referred to by the hon. Baronet, I am perfectly aware that they are subject to the income tax. In my opinion, it is right in principle that an annuity terminable in a certain length of time should be considered as income, and be subject to the income tax. Those who take terminable annuities reckon upon the income tax as one of the elements of their calculation when they offer a certain price. So long as the income tax exists their calculation holds good, and if the income tax should be diminished or repealed they receive a benefit upon their speculation. The Committee will be aware that terminable annuities to a considerable extent were created in the late war at the time when the income tax was in operation, and no doubt the loans then entered into were entered into upon the calculation of the income tax. With regard to what the hon. Member for the Wick boroughs said in reference to terminable annuities, I apprehend that these annuities are terminable stock in the same sense as railway debentures in this country are terminable stocks. They are loans granted for a short term of years, which, when the term expires, are renewed by reborrowing; and I apprehend that that is the principle adopted by the foreign railway companies referred to by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing). The hon. Gentleman talked of effecting a loan in terminable annuities by appealing to the public at large. If such an appeal had been made, it would have been made in vain. The only customers for terminable annuities are such bodies as the Bank of England, insurance and other companies, who are in the habit of dealing in money, and who hope in a speculation of this nature to gain some advantage.

MR. LAING observed, that the foreign railways he had referred to had obtained money upon securities strictly terminable. A person bought what he supposed to be an annuity of 10 per cent, and it positively terminated in a certain number of years.

MR. FREWEN thought some portion of the propositions of the right hon. Baronet would meet with considerable opposition. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the desirability of giving every possible facility to a person charged with the income tax without being liable to it, or who had been overcharged, to appeal against the tax. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that many persons whose incomes were considerably under 100*l.* a-year, and who therefore ought not to be called on to pay the income tax, had had it deducted when they received their dividends, and they very seldom succeeded in recovering the amount, or, when they did so, it was with great difficulty. The difficulties of appealing against the tax were very great, and ought to be rendered much lighter.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am induced to rise at this period of the discussion, because I do not feel entirely certain that the Committee are aware of the precise nature and bearings of the Resolution which has already been read from the chair. In the excellent speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a speech distinguished as well by the utmost candour and fairness as by its great clearness—in that excellent speech I only regretted a single omission—namely, that my right hon. Friend did not state to us precisely both the order of the Votes he intended to ask for to-night, and likewise the exact effect and character of those Votes. If, therefore, I now presume to state what is the nature and character of those Votes, I do so only with a view of offering my humble assistance to the Committee, and I shall do so subject to correction from my right hon. Friend if what I state is inaccurate. I apprehend my right hon. Friend will ask us to-night in the first place for a Vote which will empower him on the subject of the loan for which he has made a provisional contract; and I presume that, after having done so, he will go on to ask for a series of further Votes, which will enable him to levy the new taxes he has proposed in so far as they belong to the class and character of indirect taxation. If I am right, the Votes for which my right hon. Friend will thus ask us are entirely distinct in their substantial character. If he asks us for a Vote to levy an increased duty on tea, sugar, coffee, or spirit, to-morrow morning, I apprehend he is in a condition to say that, as far as the Vote of to-night is concerned, it does not in any way commit the final judgment of hon. Members, but that every Gentleman who concurs in the Vote to-night, if he thinks proper, in the very next stage of proceedings will be as free to take a different course, and to reverse the measure proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as if he had never concurred in the preliminary step. I am afraid that the Committee may think it an analogous proceeding with respect to the Vote on the loan; but, on the contrary—not from any fault of my right hon. Friend, for he has acted in strict conformity to practice and according to the dictates of prudence—I apprehend he is asking for a Vote on the subject of the loan which will be binding and conclusive between us and the contractors, and, though with reference to the taxes proposed you are only called upon to give an indirect and technical Vote, yet you are going to commit yourselves as to the loan of 16,000,000*l.* I apprehend I am right in this statement. [The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER signified his assent.] I understand then that the Vote we are called upon to give will be a distinct "ay" or "no" as to the arrangements my right hon. Friend proposes to make between the State and certain contractors who are about to lend us 16,000,000*l.*; and that, after having given this vote, though we may criticise the arrangement, yet it will not be competent to us to dispute or interfere with the conditions of this contract. If this is the state of the case, the Committee is aware of the issue before it, and must consider the Resolution which we have now heard for the first time; and in consenting to which the Committee will sanction the provisional contract which has been made. Up to this moment we possess entire liberty, which, by consenting to the Resolution, we are about to part with. I am not prepared to withhold my affirmative vote from the proposal of my right hon. Friend, if the House should confirm the contract which he has provisionally entered into; but, before I say anything on the merits of the contract, I wish to express my desire, for fear of any misunderstanding, that we should exclude from the Resolution that portion of it which relates to the peculiar arrangement proposed by my right hon. Friend for the repayment of the loan. My right hon. Friend has proposed an arrangement, with respect to which I give him credit, not only for the best, but for the highest intentions; for he has tried on his part to vindicate the principle that we should transmit as little as possible of the burden of this war to those who are to follow us, and that we should make provision as far as we can to discharge its expenses ourselves. At the same time, without giving any conclusive judgment, I feel great doubt and difficulty with regard to the peculiar provisions proposed for the repayment of the loan, and should wish to have time to consider these provisions; but I am afraid that it is just possible we may be told, if we agree to-night to the Resolution now before the Committee, which Resolution is understood to be binding and conclusive as to the substance of the arrangement, the Committee may find that it has parted with its liberty with regard to the peculiar arrangements made for the repayment of the loan, and that it will be held that the Resolution of this House sanctions the substantial contract between the State and the lenders of the money, and that they will have a right to bind and hold us to the peculiar provisions which my right hon. Friend proposes. What I would suggest to my right hon. Friend is, that the provisions with respect to the repayment of the loan should be separated from the rest of the Resolution, and I am not aware of any strong reason, if it is so separated and put into a distinct Resolution, why a Resolution should be taken on it to-night. I hope my right hon. Friend will consent to separate this Resolution, so that we may be left free not only to canvass his proposals as to the repayment of the loan, but even to modify his Resolution in that respect. I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) with great interest, and sympathised in the high English spirit which it appeared to evince; but I am not prepared to say with him that it was the duty of my right hon. Friend to propose to us on the present occasion to raise the income tax to 10 per cent. My opinion is that, if all persons who are payers of the income tax possessed the same incomes and were in the same circumstances as those who listened to the hon. Member's speech, then it would have been right and obligatory on my right hon. Friend to propose to raise the income tax to 10 per cent; it would have been the simplest, the most powerful, the safest, and fairest measure he could have taken. But it is only those who are actually conversant with financial affairs who are aware of how severe becomes the pressure of the income tax when you approach the classes that are touched by it when you come to its lowest limits. I am bound to say that it is a serious and doubtful question whether you can carry the augmentation of the income tax to the war limit of 10 per cent without undertaking the difficult political problem of a further extension of the income tax downwards beyond any limit that has yet been attempted. Let us consider the present position of the income tax. You levy it on persons possessing an income of 100*l.* a year, and, in so doing, I may say that you take it from the whole of the educated part of the community; those of the educated class who receive less than 100*l.* are so few that they may for the present be put out of the question, while, on the other hand, those labourers and mechanics who receive 100*l.* are limited in number. Therefore, in the main, the dividing line of 100*l.* is the line between the educated and the labouring part of the community. I hope the sense in which I use these terms is understood. What I feel strongly, and what I think the Committee must feel is that, measuring wealth and poverty not by figures merely, but by their relations—station, position, and social wants—the educated part of the community, with 100*l.* a year, is clearly poorer than the less educated part of the community, who may have 60*l.*, 70*l.*, or 80*l.* per annum. I say, therefore, that it is not a mere fiscal question to be settled at a stroke—that there are more than mere fiscal questions involved in the question, whether we should raise the income tax to 10 per cent or not. I look at the augmentation of the income tax as a necessary incident of the war, and have not a doubt that if the war is materially protracted you must raise it to 10 per cent; but, if you do so, you must consider in connection with it the relation of the classes to which I have briefly adverted—that great political problem—and, also, the extensive machinery that will be required, and the difficulties of its administration. I think my right hon. Friend, not finding it absolutely necessary to undertake these gigantic difficulties, was justified in resorting to other means, and I am not prepared to join in a censure for his not having proposed to raise the income tax to 10 per cent. I am bound to say that, though not prepared to withhold my vote from the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to borrow a large sum of money, my impressions on the subject of public loans are not different from those which I entertained when I had the honour to propose a War Budget to this House. If there is one sentence in the speech of my right hon. Friend from which I emphatically differ—and that difference is a verbal, though a marked one—it is contained in the sentence in which he referred to the able and ingenious pamphlet, well worthy of the attention of every Member of this House and of the public generally, recently published by Mr. Newmarch, who has examined in detail the financial policy of Mr. Pitt during the revolutionary war. The words of my right hon. Friend were, I think, that Mr. Newmarch had shown that the loans of Mr. Pitt were contracted on far more advantageous terms for the public than was of late years commonly supposed to be the case. I frankly own that, in my opinion, that is not what Mr. Newmarch has proved. What he has shown is this—that infinitely greater difficulties than are commonly supposed would have beset the path of Mr. Pitt if he had attempted to proceed in another manner. No doubt Mr. Newmarch shows that you could not have realised the whole of those advantages which many persons supposed that you might have gained from a different method of proceeding. It has been a common idea that if you had borrowed at 5 per cent in place of at 3 per cent, instead of getting 100*l.* at the latter rate you could easily have got 166*l.* at the former. In my opinion Mr. Newmarch shows that there is no mode of borrowing which is advantageous to the public, but that all modes alike are attended with difficulty and disadvantage.

I own that he strengthens my opinion of the damage and detriment which accrue to the public from becoming borrowers upon a large scale under pressing necessities; for he shows, not that Mr. Pitt's loans were less disadvantageous to the country, but that any loans whatever, contracted how you will, must be attended with immense economical disadvantages and with heavy pecuniary burdens. But with these impressions upon my mind, and being by no means disposed to extenuate my share in the proposals of last year—on the contrary, being well content to have been the instrument of any Government in inducing the House of Commons to make what I think was a manly, resolute, honourable, and successful effort—without in the slightest degree receding under that storm of invective which every man must expect who does not endeavour to square and suit himself to everybody's convenience, but remembers that there is such thing as the public interest, which, after all, is somewhat different from the convenience of classes—being prepared to stand up and contend for the principle which I then avowed; yet I apprehend that there is a limit to its application, and that we cannot possibly expect a free country—that we cannot possibly expect even this great and enlightened assembly, representing a free country—to push the very soundest economical doctrines, under all circumstances, to their extremes. You must remember that you have to deal with flesh and blood, and that you cannot ask from flesh and blood more than they can reasonably bear. I go a step further, and I admit that there is a point at which the sudden accumulation of taxation becomes so great an evil, and so great a cause of disturbance to all personal and social relations, that it is better to provide yourself with money up to a certain limit at a pecuniary disadvantage than to carry that disturbance through all ranks of the country. Therefore, for some considerable time past—ever since the growth of the expenditure for the war became so uncontrollable—I have fully admitted that it was necessary for the Government to make provision for a considerable portion of the expenses of the year by borrowing money, and I was prepared to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not be blamed for resorting to a loan. I do not speak merely of raising money in anticipation of taxes—I myself last year made provision for a considerable portion of the expenses by borrowed money —but it was merely borrowed money in anticipation of taxes, which has been covered, within a million, by the taxes raised last year—but it was clear to me that some more extended measure must be resorted to if we were to make provision for another year of war expenditure. Holding that opinion, I am not disposed to enter upon any minute criticism as to the precise proportion of money to be borrowed in comparison with that to be raised by taxes, or even as to the question whether my right hon. Friend has selected the stock in which to borrow with a sound estimate of the public interests, or whether he might have carried to a greater extent the principle of borrowing by terminable annuities. I entirely agree with him that it would not have been practicable, except upon the most extravagant terms, to complete the whole, or anything like the whole, of his operation in that form. These are questions which, upon the fitting occasion, it may be proper to discuss, but it does not become me to discuss them now. The question for me is, whether I think, upon the whole, that the principle and outline of my right hon. Friend's plan, considered simply as a means of providing for the financial necessities of the country, are such that I should give to them my support, and I am quite prepared to say that none of those preferences which we may have for one mode of proceeding over another should induce us—as they do not refer to matters of primary importance—to withhold our vote from the plan of my right hon. Friend, the general principle of which we approve. I certainly should wish to have the power of considering more maturely the special provisions which he proposes to make for the repayment of the loan; but, as respects the form of the loan, I shall not even question the abstract merits of the proposition, because I am of opinion that it is of capital importance that the House should maintain the strength and credit of its financial organ in the face of the country; and even if it were in my power to show—which I do not assume—that in one point or another my right hon. Friend might have made this proposal in a manner more precisely coinciding with the public interest, yet I should have to balance the advantage so obtained against the great and heavy disadvantage—which I have good reason to know to be a great and heavy disadvantage—which a Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is the guardian of the public interests, is exposed to by criticisms which, though unavailing indeed, are actively, zealously, and constantly indulged in upon the plan which he proposes. I, therefore, am very much disposed to withhold those criticisms upon the present occasion. But there is another question upon which I think it necessary to reserve my judgment. My right hon. Friend opened his speech by referring to the time at which he made his financial statement, and he appeared to think that he owed us some apology for not having come before us at an earlier period with this exposition of his views. There was one reason, undoubtedly, why it was desirable, if it could have been done, that the finances of the country should have been brought before the House of Commons at a very early period of the Session, and that was, that the extremely rapid growth of expenditure during the last quarter has outstripped all bounds and all possibility of calculation. That rapid growth of expenditure pressed so severely upon the immediate resources of the Exchequer that it was necessary, if the Minister did not ask for additional supplies, that he should use his own discretionary power, and, availing himself to a certain extent of the favourable state of the public funds, should raise money by the sale of stock belonging to the National Debt Commissioners. My hon. Friend below me (Mr. Laing) has censured that step. I am responsible, however, for a large part of that proceeding, and my right hon. Friend is responsible for having continued in the same track. I do not believe that it would have been satisfactory to the House that, before the conclusion of the financial year, it should be called upon to make another financial arrangement. The real truth of the case is, that in time of peace it is an easy thing to propose to the House of Commons a financial arrangement which shall last over twelve months; but in time of war it is extremely difficult to do so. On the other hand, it is most annoying and worrying to the House of Commons to be continually pestered with one application after another for an increase of taxation; and it is most desirable to adhere, if possible, to the principle of an annual statement in preference to a multiplication of your financial plans. It may be open to question whether last year, in our desire to act in a constitutional manner, and to place ourselves at the command of Parliament, it was for the public convenience that the House of Commons should have been twice called upon to alter its arrangements, and to make additional pecuniary provisions for the expenditure; at any rate, I think that my right hon. Friend did quite right to reserve his statement to the usual time, and that he did right to use his discretionary powers for obtaining money upon terms which I do not think at all disadvantageous, but rather the reverse, instead of coming down prematurely to Parliament with a budget which he would have to alter again before the end of the Session. I am about to express regret in quite a different direction. I am decidedly disposed to regret that my right hon. Friend, having postponed his financial statement till the 20th of April, did not postpone it and the loan consequent upon it for a week or a fortnight longer; and I am so upon account of a question of the greatest importance. You have at this moment negotiations going forward at Vienna. Upon the issue of those negotiations it must depend whether your expenditure will be, as my right hon. Friend says, 86,000,000*l.*, or under 70,000,000*l.* If you were to conclude peace to-morrow your expenditure for next year would probably be greater than for the year which has just closed, yet it would not be near the mark which my right hon. Friend has estimated. Take, for example, the item of 4,000,000*l.* for embodying the militia. Of that sum 3,000,000*l.* at least, and perhaps more, would be saved in case of peace. Then, again, for the transport service there is a sum of from 5,000,000*l.* to 6,000,000*l.* which has been voted, more than one-half of which would in all probability be saved if the negotiations which are now going on should lead to an immediate peace. We have also the large estimate of 8,000,000*l.* for the Ordnance Department, a large portion of which is voted as a provision to meet the weekly, daily—nay hourly consumption arising from the exigencies of the war, and the necessity for those supplies and the arrangements connected with them would terminate with the war itself. It appears, then, that a large portion of the money which has been voted is connected with the immediate expenditure for the war, and I should have been glad if we had not been called upon to take a step of so great importance as the one which has this evening been proposed, at a time when we may expect from day to day to learn the issue of the conferences now being held at Vienna. I do not mean to say—for I am aware of the argument that might be urged if I did, that a war may leave off at any time—that by the present proposal you are pledging yourself to carry on the war; but our present position, as it appears to me, is somewhat peculiar. We have negotiations on foot in which a certain progress has been made. We have arrived at the third out of four conditions, and we have something like a moral certainty that if the negotiations on that third condition should fail in being brought to a satisfactory termination—and if they do unhappily fail we shall know it in a few days—the war will continue. Under these circumstances, I should have thought that, financially speaking, the budget, having been delayed to the 20th April, might have been advantageously postponed to a somewhat later period. [Mr. WILSON intimated dissent.] I see that my hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury shakes his head, but I think I am sufficiently familiar with the ordinary practice of my hon. Friend to understand the meaning of that shake of the head. I think he meant to express his conviction that if the budget had been postponed things could not have gone on; and I can quite believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have found it necessary to ask for some temporary means of obtaining money on certain conditions, but on conditions not involving an important financial arrangement like that now proposed. I must add one sentence to what I have already said, because I am anxious that my vote tonight should not be made to bear an aspect which in reality it does not bear. It is to my mind impossible to overstate the magnitude of the issues involved in the negotiations now going on at Vienna. I confess it pains me deeply to see signs of levity, come they whence they may—and I do not allude to what has taken place in this House, for here I am glad to say I have seen no such tone exhibited—with reference to matters of such tremendous interest. I apprehend that when these negotiations are concluded, whatever may be the result, whether they lead to peace—which God grant—or whether they terminate in a manner which will render necessary a prolongation of the war, the House of Commons and the country, in one form or other, will have to pass their judgment upon them. It will then be for this House to determine whether in its judgment the Government has conceded too much or too little—whether it has well discharged its duty and its awful responsibility either of acceptance or rejection of terms of peace; and it is hardly possible to find language strong enough to characterise the grave nature of the responsibility which now devolves upon them. One thing is clear, and that is, that you cannot come out of the conferences now going on at Vienna as you entered into them. It would indeed be a sufficiently important matter for reflection if the only question involved in the conferences was the continuance of the war, after the conclusion of the conferences, upon the same footing as that upon which we stood before their commencement and holding the same relations towards the other Powers of Europe which we then held; but there is a high probability—if not a certainty—that if these conferences terminate without any result, your relations with the other Powers of Europe will be essentially changed. Compared with the present position of this country, the fundamentally new conditions under which it may be called upon to pursue the war form a question of gigantic importance. I wish that there should be no misunderstanding as regards the vote which I shall this night give—I do not wish it to be regarded as my judgment upon that awful question. Do not let it be said, that by consenting to make pecuniary provision for the year I have committed myself to the issue of the Vienna Conferences. As to the mere financial advantage of taking a loan at the present moment, I am perfectly willing to pass by that question rather than to attempt to interfere with the Government or with my right hon. Friend, but I reserve to myself the most perfect and absolute freedom to pass my judgment with respect to the issue of the conferences at Vienna. I will no longer trespass on the time of the Committee, but I will only say that my object has been to endeavour to place in a clear point of view the vote we are now called upon to give, and I, for my own part, retaining all my objection to loans, and all the desire I have always expressed that the expenses of the war should be defrayed, as far as they reasonably can be, from the taxation of the year, and reserving to myself the perfect freedom to which I have alluded, shall say "aye" to the proposal of my right hon. Friend.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he felt that he could not consistently with his duty give a silent vte upon the Resolutions before the Committee; but he felt called upon to call attention to one or two considerations regarding the loan which had that night been announced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was not his intention to trouble the Committee with any observations on the proposed increase of direct or indirect taxation, but, as regarded the loan, it might prove, as had been suggested, by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) the first of a series of loans to which the House would be called upon to assent, and it certainly was the duty of the Committee to withhold its approbation from any loan which might be proposed if they were satisfied that the plan proposed was vicious in principle and detrimental to the public interest. He felt called upon to say that the scheme of the loan now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman was marked with every defect which could belong to a loan, while it possessed no single advantage which the present state of the public revenue enabled a Minister to command. The scheme embraced two conflicting and objectionable principles, inasmuch as an amount of stock equal to the capital borrowed was created, and at the same time the repayment of a portion of the loan was to be made upon terminable annuities. It appeared to him that, looking at the present rate of interest and the price of the funds, to borrow 16,000,000l. by the creation of an equal amount of stock was to proceed upon a false principle, and one which involved a large sacrifice of the public money. From the beginning of the year to the present day it appeared to him impossible that a worse time could have been selected or a more unfortunate moment for proposing a loan. The present state of the negotiations at Vienna, and the condition of the war in the Crimea, acting upon the money-market, rendered it more disadvantageous to contract a loan at the present day than at any former period of the year, and more especially as the public were led to believe that a very few days would bring the negotiations to a point which would give the public information to enable them to consider the terms upon which the loan was to be adopted. The first observation he should make was, that by creating this loan of 16,000,000l. when the funds were about 10 per cent. below par, they made it impossible at any future time, however favourable the circumstances might be, for the country to get out of it with a loss of less than 1,600,000l. The difference between the present period and the time of Mr. Pitt, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred for precedents, was this—that in Mr. Pitt's time not only was a long war anticipated, which depressed the money-market to an almost unexampled degree, but public credit was at that time at its lowest ebb, and the mercantile community was in a condition of deep and wide-spread distress. Could, then, the terms at which a loan was obtained under such circumstances justify the bargain made by the Government now, when public credit was high and money abundant, and when, if some different principle had been acted upon, much more advantageous terms might doubtless have been procured for the public, and a saving of some 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* a year in interest at least effected. He conceived there were still greater objections to the other part of the right hon. Gentleman's proposition—namely, that which involved the payment of an interest of 14*s. 6d.* by means of a terminable annuity expiring at the end of 30 years. This he thought was paying an unnecessary and extravagant per centage. He was of opinion that nothing but a case of extreme national necessity could justify any addition to the national debt, and therefore he did not hesitate to say that he was favourable, as a matter of general principle, to the raising of money by terminable annuities. But he must qualify that observation by adding that for Government to raise money on terminable annuities, when the rate of interest was high, and the price of the public funds far below what it would be in a time of prosperity, was making a bargain obviously most disadvantageous to the country, and guaranteeing for the long period of thirty years a rate of interest which they all hoped might not continue for more than three or four years longer. If the present war were to terminate in three, four, or five years, there could be no doubt that the rate of interest would fall, and there would be the means of obtaining a loan to any amount either by the creation of stock or terminable annuities on much more favourable terms than at present:—yet in consequence of the bargain now being made the country would have guaranteed a rate of interest for thirty years founded on the state of the money-market at the present moment under all the effects of an existing war. This naturally accounted for the hard terms forced on the right hon. Gentleman; for in accepting this loan the Government had sacrificed about a million sterling in capital, and in interest some 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* a year. The present price of the funds being about 90, money was worth about 3*l. 6s. 8d.* per cent. and no doubt with the credit of the Government it would have been perfectly easy for the right hon. Gentleman to raise 16,000,000*l.* at the current interest of the day, for as long or as short a time as the Government might think it necessary to retain the money, and thus he would have been enabled, when the rate of interest fell, to pay off the loan by a fresh loan at a reduced interest. But instead of that, the right hon. Gentleman proposed the double plan now before the Committee. He had required an advance of what might be called a sum of 1,600,000*l.* upon a terminable annuity of thirty years, not at 3*l. 6s. 8d.*, the present value of money, but at 3*l. 14s. 6d.*, which was paying 8*s.* per cent., or 62,000*l.* a-year, for the difference between a perpetual annuity and an annuity for thirty years on the sum of 1,600,000*l.* It had been stated that Pitt made his loans during the war upon the principle of the right hon. Gentleman; but it should be borne in mind that that statesman never borrowed upon the creation of stock until he had exhausted all the resources of his genius, until all his efforts had failed to procure money on other terms. He should abstain from dividing the Committee on the question, following the example of the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford; because he felt that it was the duty of every Member of the House, engaged as they were in a war requiring all the efforts and resources at their command, not to thwart her Majesty's Government in any measures they might bring forward for the carrying on of that war, unless they should feel that, besides being vicious in principle and detrimental to the public interest, it would actually be a breach of faith in the House to sanction them. The loan, although both vicious and detrimental, was yet necessary for the purposes of the war. He should not, therefore, oppose the passing of the Resolution, but he entered his protest against the principles on which the loan was to be raised. Should they feel themselves again under the necessity of once more resorting to the money market, he hoped it would be upon other and more advantageous terms.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that, so far as concerned the direct taxation the right hon. Gentleman proposed, he saw nothing particularly objectionable, but he decidedly objected to the way in which it was proposed to add to the national debt, the amount of which was already so enormous. The right hon. Gentleman had followed in the track of all former Chancellors of the Exchequer, who, whenever they were under any financial pressure, resorted to an addition to the national debt. In this manner we had added no less than 44,000,000*l.* to it during the last twenty years; and, although it might be alleged that we had made some reductions, they did not compensate for the augmentations of the debt. When 8,000,000*l.* had to be raised to relieve the distress in Ireland a few years ago, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, making the best bargain he could in Consols, added to the debt more by 938,000*l.* than he received in money. He therefore remarked with pleasure that now, for the first time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to get his pound sterling for his pound of Consols. If Mr. Pitt had adopted that principle, our national debt would now be 175,000,000*l.* less than it was. We had in 1798 a Finance Minister who made a loan of 34,000,000*l.* in Consols; and how much did he get for that? Just half the amount—only 17,000,000*l.* The 3 per cent Consols now amounted to more than 500,000,000*l.* sterling, and their interest could not be reduced without a twelve month's notice; and no Chancellor of the Exchequer would be bold enough to attempt it with such an amount; yet it was now proposed to add to that amount. Our national debt in 1818 amounted to 776,000,000*l.*, and in 1852 it was 765,000,000*l.*, so that 11,500,000*l.* was the whole amount of the reduction we had effected in the last forty years; but if he included the Exchequer bonds and Exchequer bills, our whole debt was but little less than 800,000,000*l.*, and would some day swamp the country. The proposition to lay aside 1,000,000*l.* yearly for sixteen years to pay off these 16,000,000*l.* was quite fallacious. It was not likely the House of Commons would be disposed to carry it out; and if they did, what an enormous loss the public would sustain when each million of these Consols, which were issued now at 86½, were to be bought back again, perhaps, at the price of 101 or 102, at a future day! The right hon. Gentleman had omitted, in his (Mr. Williams's) opinion, a very important item of taxation. He alluded to the omission of imposing the probate and legacy duty, and all property belonging to corporations, colleges, Universities, and properties of that kind which now escape, but which would not have escaped under the Chancellorship of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). He (Mr. Williams) brought the question before the House some little time ago, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to consider it—indeed, he stated that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had left him the outline of a Bill which would be satisfactory with regard to that important measure. Although successive Governments had not been very successful in regard to the reduction of the national debt, he held that they were not justified in making additions to the debt irrespective of its present enormous amount, for he believed that the time would come when, as had been described by Hume, (the historian), the debt would put down the country, or the country would put down the debt. To that end it was as certain to come as day followed night, unless the Government put a speedy stop to the system of increasing our national debt. He desired to object in the strongest terms possible to any increase of the 3 per cent Consols, and he was surprised that any Chancellor of the Exchequer should recommend such a course, why not create new stock reserving the right to pay it off at par after twenty years.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to say a few words in reply to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). In negotiating the loan now under the consideration of the House the Government had strictly followed the precedents set by former Governments; and, though they were conscious that the course necessarily limited to a certain extent the discretion of the House, and would gladly have adopted some other means of providing for existing exigencies, they had found it impossible to resort to any other course. It was not their wish to do so if they could have adopted any other course previously to obtaining the consent of the House; but it must be obvious to any hon. Member, on reflection, that it would be utterly impossible for any Government to come down to the House and discuss the manner in which a loan should be effected, to arrange the minimum terms, and settle the details of negotiations which, in order to be successful, must necessarily be settled in private. So far from obtaining more satisfactory terms by the adoption of such a course, he believed that a contrary result would have been shown. They therefore decided to adhere to the precedents of former Governments, and had in no respect departed from them. It necessarily followed that, a provisional contract having been made with reference to the loan, they must now ask the House to abide by the terms contained in that contract, for it was impossible for the Government to consent to any alteration. With regard to the proposition to which his right hon. Friend had referred for the repayment of 1,000,000*l.* a year at the termination of the war, that was not one of the essential conditions of the contract, and was a matter entirely open for the consideration of the House. If the House should not approve that provision it would be quite competent to them to modify or reject it. He hoped, however, that the Resolution relating to that subject would be permitted to pass with the other Resolutions to-night, as its omission might occasion some inconvenience, and he would undertake to say that that provision should not be viewed by the Government on the same footing as those parts of the Resolutions which were matters of contract with the lenders. With regard to the question of terminable annuities, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) seemed to be under the impression that the Government had resorted to some novel and unprecedented course; but so far was that from being the case that the whole of the existing terminable annuities, which now amounted to above 1,000,000*l.* a year, had been created in the same manner, namely, as attendant annuities upon loans. From 1793 to 1816 there had been thirty-one loans contracted, ten of which were aided by long annuities; and the slave compensation loan, contracted more recently, had been aided in the same manner. In adopting this mode of borrowing money the Government had, therefore, followed a long series of precedents. The hon. and learned Gentleman complained that the Government obtained 100*l.* in money for every 100*l.* of stock they created; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was at a loss to understand how that could be said to be a losing bargain on their part. When the Government, in borrowing money, gave 100*l.* of stock for some 70*l.* or 80*l.* or 90*l.* in money, the bargain was perhaps a disadvantageous one for them, but he could not see on what ground a complaint could be made against the Government, that they received 100*l.* in money for each 100*l.* of stock.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he had a most serious objection to all indirect taxation, because it tended to raise the price of all articles of general consumption. If prices were raised, consumption diminished, and a diminished consumption materially affected the industry of the country, destroying the very sources from which the country derived all the wealth which paid all the taxes. That was the ground on which politically he objected to indirect taxation. Members of that House did not like to increase their income tax, or to impose any additional tax upon those who were rich; but they had no hesitation in putting it upon the poor in the shape of a tax upon articles which they consumed, and which they paid for out of their incomes. It would have been far more politic and just to raise the additional taxation by an increased income tax, even if it amounted to 20 per cent—that would have shown some hardihood and nobleness in their warlike profession—but he should oppose any measure which recognised the objectionable system of indirect taxation.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to have misunderstood the observations of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), in whose views he entirely concurred. He (Mr. Baillie) believed that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gone into the market, and had borrowed money at the present rate of interest, which was about 3½ per cent, instead of bargaining to pay what was equivalent to 3⅓ per cent, the Three-and-a-half per Cents thus created might, on the conclusion of peace, have been reduced without difficulty to Three per cents, and the country would have been relieved from a burden of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent upon the debt, which under the present plan they would be compelled to pay for thirty years.

MR. WILKINSON said, he thought that the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for raising the loan had been contrived so as to meet objections from both sides; because it would not defray the increased expenditure entirely from the revenue of the year, neither would it do so wholly by loan; while on the other hand, the amount to be borrowed would not be raised exclusively by perpetual annuities nor by terminable annuities. The scheme was therefore based upon a combination of the different principles advocated in opposite quarters. As to raising money upon Consols, it too was clearly the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to borrow as cheaply as he could; and if the entire sum wanted were to be raised in the shape of Three per Cent consolidated and perpetual stock, it was not improbable that that would be a more advantageous arrangement for the public. It was notorious that the Three per Cent Consols were more in demand and fetched a higher price than other stocks, in consequence of what had been termed their "delightful simplicity." As to the plan of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) for creating a two-and-a-half per cent stock, it was no doubt a great and a remarkably good plan, only it had been tried and found to fail, and therefore was not at all feasible. He scarcely thought, too, that the country would prove to be so virtuous as to lay by 1,000,000*l.* a year for the purpose of redeeming the stock now proposed to be borrowed.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he would give the Chancellor of the Exchequer credit for sincerity in the conviction that his measures were of the best possible character; but he was compelled to differ from him. He did not think that the present state of affairs justified a loan in the manner now proposed; he objected not only to the form of it, but he thought the right hon. Gentleman had committed a grave error in not having thrown it open to public competition. If that course had been pursued, and the necessary amount had been borrowed in the form of terminable annuities, no doubt sufficient money could have been obtained at an average rate of 3½ per cent, with this advantage, that the debt would have vanished for ever at a given period. When the late French loan was announced and thrown open to public competition, more than double the sum demanded was rapidly subscribed; and a similar result would, in all probability, attend the adoption of that principle in this country. The country had long pronounced its verdict against any addition being made to its permanent debt, and the House should therefore pause before it suffered itself to be hastily drawn into sanctioning a fallacious and dangerous principle. The Government had not treated the country with confidence in this matter. There was now less prospect of peace than there was six months ago—the war was now only at its commencement, and it was obvious that if there was a deficit of 23,000,000*l.* at this early stage of the struggle, the present budget, should the House unwisely commit itself to its principle, would be only the first of a series of similar additions to our already enormous and overwhelming public debt. He therefore trusted the House would pause before they sanctioned the present proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Montesquieu had observed that the English constitution would fail when the House of Commons became more corrupt than the Government—in other words, when they fell into apathy—and he much regretted to see so small an attendance when measures were being discussed which would injure the real interests of the country. Posterity was not being treated fairly, and it would say that it was not responsible, for it was not represented, and that the tax was saddled upon it without its consent by those who engaged in measures to which it was not a party. If ever there were measures which exhibited little practical wisdom with respect to future events they were those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If the House agreed to them, the country would not, and he would do all he could to make the country take up his opinions. He believed that Government belonged to the fatal number whom the gods had in their anger determined to destroy, but whom in their mercy they had first deprived of their senses to prevent them feeling their sufferings. He protested against the Resolution, which he was afraid would be only the commencement of a series of loans; and he must also dissent from the other parts of the budget. He had consented to arrest the decline in the tea duties in the present state of affairs, but he was opposed to any increase in them. Our merchants had framed their calculations upon the hypothesis that the existing legislation with regard to import duties on articles of consumption would be maintained, little dreaming after all that had passed in Parliament of late years on this long-controverted subject, that the Legislature would be asked to retrace its steps and increase those duties. Although he thought their minimum scale of sugar duties had been fixed too low, the attempt to increase those and the tea duties would bring down upon the Government the curses of every woman in the country. This was one of the worst budgets that had ever been proposed, and it would make the Government more unpopular than any other measure they could have introduced.

MR. MUNTZ said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had observed that posterity would have a right to complain of being taxed in the manner proposed. Posterity might complain of them as they complained of their ancestors; but what would posterity say if in avoiding to tax them, they were to allow the Russians to carry the war into Europe generally, and to take possession of different countries till they arrived at our own coast, and destroyed all our trade and prosperity? No man could have a greater objection to loans under ordinary circumstances than he had, believing as he did that when money was obtained easily, either in public or in private life, it was generally spent wastefully. But this was an exceptional case, for there never before was a war which belonged so completely to posterity as the present one. It was of no interest to the nation at large, as it existed, whether the war were carried on or not; and if the war were for posterity, surely posterity ought to pay something toward the expense. He did not object to a loan, but he objected to the principle which had been adopted. He was quite at a loss to understand why the Government had not adopted the principle of terminable annuities, and on that point he agreed with the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs (Mr. Laing), that the only question was what the country should pay. With terminable annuities only, the transaction would ultimately have closed itself, and the loan have come to an end. He thought the House of Commons was used in a rather extraordinary manner, inasmuch as the Government did not come there in the first instance to ask what the loan should be, whether as regarded the amount or the terms, but agreed with a great capitalist for a loan at a certain rate, and then came to them for sanction. That was making a laughing-stock of the House. How could the House check the Government when the whole affair had been settled before it was brought under their notice? With regard to the rest of the budget, he thought it would cause much unnecessary suffering to merchants by making alterations which they had no reason to anticipate. As regarded the income tax, he objected as strongly as any one to the manner in which that impost was now levied, but he would rather see it extended so as to meet the requirements of the country, than see any increase of the taxes on the necessaries of life.

MR. HILDYARD wished to know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the increase of twopence in the pound should apply to incomes under 150*l.* a year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his proposition was that the increase should apply to incomes generally.

MR. MASTERMAN said, he thought the House ought to come to an early decision with regard to the loan. He did not think the Government had made an unfavourable bargain for the country. In his opinion the House should be satisfied with the bargain, and not hesitate to sanction it.

MR. THORNELY was gratified to learn from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they would not bind themselves by assenting to the Resolution in the chairman's hands, to appropriate a million a year after a treaty of peace had been signed, to the extinction of the three per cent consols. He totally objected to the making of such an engagement beforehand, and was satisfied with the present arrangement with regard to the sinking fund.

MR. MALINS said, having last year deprecated any attempt to raise the amount required annually during the war from taxes levied within the year, he felt extremely gratified that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was not about to engage in such a task. On general principles he approved of the plan adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of meeting the deficiency; and he thought the Government had made a fair compromise between direct and indirect taxation, when they proposed to raise 3,300,000*l.* by indirect, and 2,000,000*l.* by direct taxation. The Government had, in his opinion exercised a wise discretion in coming forward so early for a loan, and in giving up all attempts to raise 86,000*l.* within the present year; and if it should be necessary to carry on the war for a long period, he hoped the Government would endeavour to meet it by a mixture of direct and indirect taxation, combined with moderate loans on the best terms that could be obtained. He rose chiefly for the purpose of expressing his approval of the budget submitted to the House.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution having reference to the spirit and malt duties having been read,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in reply to a question from Mr. CRAUFURD, that the Government had no intention to make any alteration with regard to the drawback on malt.

Other Resolutions agreed to.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR rose to warn the House against reporting the Resolutions in a hasty and ill-considered manner. The effect of reporting these Resolutions would be to enable the Government to levy from to-morrow all the new taxes indicated by them, without having to wait for the authorisation of distinct Acts of Parliament. He was quite aware that to oppose this new scheme of taxation would be quite in vain, unsupported as the attempt must be by any organised party opposition. Still he could not allow the moment to pass without entering his protest against the rash interference with the progress of industry and commerce contemplated by the proposal announced that evening.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

ARMY BEFORE SEASTOPOL COMMITTEE.

MR. BENTINCK rose to move, that Mr. John Ball be discharged from further attendance on Army before Sebastopol Committee, and that Captain Scobell be appointed in his place. The hon. Gentleman said that he wished, in bringing forward this Motion, to state in the first place, that he did so without any wish to disparage the hon. Gentleman whose name was involved in it. Upon general grounds no one probably was more competent to be a Member of the Committee than the hon. Member for the county Carlow; but it appeared to him to be perfectly impossible that an hon. Gentleman who was a Member of the Government could look upon a Committee, or upon the report of a Committee, which was to try the conduct of that Government, with the same impartiality as if he were sitting below the gangway in the place he occupied in the early part of the Session. A great deal was said at the time the Committee was formed of the importance of having the most impartial names that could be selected for the purpose. With that view various names were selected and various names were rejected. Now, to have on that Committee the name of an hon. Gentleman himself a Member of the Government, was, he humbly submitted, a proceeding wholly inconsistent with previous acts. They might be told, however, that the present Government was not that whose conduct was being inquired into.

But hon. Gentlemen opposite would be pleased to recollect that there were at least eight Members of the present Cabinet who were Members of the late Cabinet; so that there were no less than eight Members of the present Cabinet whose conduct was involved in the report which would issue from the Committee sitting up stairs. Now, although the House had seen of late a rather glaring instance of a Member of a Government deserting his colleagues, in the case of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. B. Osborne), still it was scarcely to be expected that a Member of the Government would be the most impartial person to select as a Member of the Committee. It was quite certain, at all events, that the country would not be satisfied with a report of such a Committee. Now, in order to avoid the appearance of having acted from mere party motives—an insinuation often thrown out against those sitting on the opposition side of the House by the Gentleman opposite, as well as to supply an element greatly deficient in the composition of the present Committee, he proposed the name of the hon. Member for Bath (Captain Scobell) to fill the place of the hon. Member for Carlow, believing him to be a person that could greatly aid the labours of the Committee.

MR. F. HUME seconded the Motion.

MR. ROEBUCK fully concurred with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) as to the propriety of discharging the hon. Member for Carlow from the Committee; but he thought the hon. Member was going somewhat beyond his province in nominating the Member who should supply his place. It would be remembered that there was a distinct understanding that the nomination of a portion of the Committee should be left to the Government, and amongst those whom they selected was the hon. Member for Carlow; but the hon. Member having been appointed Under Secretary for the Colonies, he had become incompetent to discharge his duties as a Member of the Committee. As he began the Committee, so he should continue to support it; and since, by arrangement, it was left to the Government to nominate a portion of the Committee, and one of the Members whom they selected was the hon. Member now proposed to be discharged, he thought, in all fairness, they ought to have the power of naming his successor. But it was said the naval element was wanting in the Committee;

he did not think it was ; but the Committee had, amongst other matters, to inquire into the clothing of the army, and therefore he thought a tailor might have been proposed just as well as a sailor—[Oh, oh !]. Hon. Members might cry “oh, oh !” but he wanted to know, if the argument was good in the one case, why should it not be equally good in the other ? He wanted to know why it should be necessary to have a sailor on a Committee appointed to inquire into the state of the army before Sebastopol ? However, he understood that the Government intended to propose that the hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. De Vere) should supply the place of the hon. Member for Carlow ; and, in accordance with the arrangement to which he had already referred, he thought the matter ought to be left in their hands.

MR. LIDDELL asked upon what ground the Government could claim the right of appointing a Member of this Committee ? Who first called for the inquiry ? Why, the people ; and Parliament, responding to the appeal of the country, consented to the appointment of this Committee to investigate the conduct of those whose mismanagement had destroyed one of the noblest armies that had ever left our shores ; and that House, as representing the people, ought to appoint the Members of the Committee and not the Government. And yet they were told that by arrangement the Government had the right to appoint a portion of the Committee. He protested against such an extraordinary doctrine as that laid down by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), and thought the House would best discharge its duty by disregarding the arrangement, if there was any, and filling up the vacancy themselves.

MR. ROEBUCK explained that the existing Committee was appointed upon an understanding with himself, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, which understanding gave the Government the right to nominate a portion of the Committee, and all that he now said was, that that understanding should be adhered to, and that one of the Members appointed by the Government having been withdrawn, they should propose another in his place.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was the uniform practice of the House, when a Committee was to be appointed to investigate matters of such deep and great importance as those which had been submitted to this Committee, that the Members to serve should be selected by the Mover of the Committee in communication with the Government of the day—not that the Government were always to appoint the persons to serve on the Committee ; but it was only right and proper, when matters were to be investigated, in which the conduct of the Government was concerned, that only such persons should be appointed, who, by their impartiality, by their competence, by their ability, were the best qualified to perform the duties and execute the task confided to them. It was in that sense, and in that sense only, that according to the established practice of the House the Government and the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield agreed in communication with each other upon the persons who should form the Committee. Those who had watched the proceedings and conduct of the Committee would agree with him that the choice was well made, and that only those Members had been selected who were the best fitted to be entrusted with the difficult and delicate investigation which had been confided to them. From the moment, however, that the hon. Member for Carlow accepted the office of Under Secretary for the Colonies, it was quite impossible that he could continue to be a Member of the Committee. His official occupations would have interfered with his attendance on the Committee ; but it was not so much that as his belonging to the Government that disqualified him from continuing a Member of the Committee. Then came the question who should succeed him ? Now, his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow was the only Irish Member on the Committee, while he thought it was understood when the Committee was appointed, that it was only right and proper that there should be at least one Irish Member on it. Therefore he should propose that the hon. Member for the county of Limerick should be appointed in the stead of Mr. Ball, and that being the choice of the Government—a choice which the hon. and learned Chairman of the Committee did not object to—he should have no alternative but to oppose the appointment of Mr. Scobell, with the view of nominating Mr. De Vere on Monday.

MR. FRENCH said, the inquiry was one which had been demanded by the nation, and accorded by the House of Commons ; and it was the duty of the House to see that the inquiry was an impartial one. Now that could not be if the Members were to be left to the selection of the Government, or if the House refused to place a Member of the naval profession on the Committee, which, he believed, had become absolutely necessary.

Mr. JOHN BALL discharged from further attendance on the Committee.

MR. BENTINCK then rose to propose that Captain Scobell should be placed upon the Committee in the room of Mr. Ball. He had no doubt that the arrangement declared to have been made between the Government, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck), was very satisfactory to the parties concerned; but he, for one, was not inclined to concur in that arrangement. The rule that the Government and the mover of the Committee should come to an understanding in a case like the present, and that the appointment should rest with them, might be a very good rule under ordinary circumstances, but could not be accepted now. It was a monstrous proposition to assert that the Government were to have the nomination of half a Committee, when that Committee was called upon to inquire into their conduct and character. He had no wish to say anything disrespectful of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. De Vere), but that Gentleman had only been a Member of that House for three or four months, and he would ask whether a gentleman who had had such short Parliamentary experience was fit to be placed on the Committee in the middle of its deliberations? The country was looking with intense interest for the Report of this Committee—the characters of many public men depended upon it; and nothing could be more absurd than that they should choose as one of the Committee an hon. Member who had not had the advantage of more than two or three months' Parliamentary experience.

MR. DRUMMOND said, it was at all times exceedingly difficult to select competent persons to serve on Committees. The House complained, and justly too, of the enormous lengths to which the Reports of Select Committees ran; but that arose in a great measure from the circumstance of appointing Members who were unable to give their full attendance upon the Committee, or who did not understand the question to be inquired into, and, therefore, in order to make themselves masters of the subject, they asked all sorts of questions, until there was no end to the printed evidence. Now under these circumstances, he and his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) consulted with the various heads of as many parties as had heads, as to the persons who might be agreeable to them, or who were in their opinion the best qualified to serve on the Committee. In that way it was arranged that a certain number should be nominated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), and the same thing was done with regard to the Government. Now the Gentleman who had just been superseded was one of those nominated by the Government, and the House was, in his opinion, bound by the original agreement to support the Government in their nomination of his successor.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, I having on a previous occasion expressed how firmly I held the opinion that a naval officer ought to have been included among the Members of the Committee, that inquiry embracing the conduct and administration of the Transport Service, and the condition of Balaklava harbour, I had not been induced to have addressed you, Sir, at this time, were it not from the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) having expressed his opinion that a tailor would be of as much use as a sailor in the Committee. Now the fact is, did the House possess such a Member? A tailor would render good service in the Committee, seeing that so much turned upon the arrangement for clothing the troops, and the mismanagement in that department. For my part, I cannot but repeat how deeply I regret that no Member of the naval profession was placed upon that Committee, for none but a seaman is capable of eliciting such information and such answers as ought to satisfy the Members whether there was any foundation for the charges made against the naval authorities on the very difficult and complicated subject of the Transport Service and the management of Balaklava harbour; and the inevitable consequence of naming a Committee of hon. Members without a naval officer has, I know, produced much dissatisfaction in the country. I, in common with hon. Members, only desire a fair inquiry and no favour, such as may enable us to avoid fresh disasters and mismanagement of affairs. An able naval officer ought to have been at every port whence transports were laden and sailed, to regulate their departure and superintend the cargoes placed on board them, with correct invoices furnished to the several departments. As I trust the committee will soon bring their labours to a close, it might be too small advantage at the present time in Captain Scobell being placed upon it. I think, however, it was a disrespectful and most unbecoming observation of the hon. and learned Gentleman to say they might as well put a tailor as a sailor on the Committee. I mean no disrespect to tailors, but I do not consider it other than a coarse expression to compare a tailor with a naval officer. [Mr. ROEBUCK understood the gallant admiral to say, that if there were a tailor in the House, he ought to be put on the Committee.] I said no such thing—I said if the House possessed a tailor as an hon. Member, a tailor would be very useful, as the inquiry turned so much upon the clothing of the army; and I said this only in reference to the observation which fell from the hon. and learned Member.

MR. ROEBUCK submitted that he had correctly represented what the gallant admiral had said. The gallant admiral seemed to have confounded the province of a witness with the province of a judge. Any one of common sense could judge of the matters which the Committee were investigating, and no hon. Member had forbore to give his opinion because he was not a sailor. One official had arrived, and he was given to understand the gentleman who was in command at Balaklava was on his way to this country. The Committee had examined some witnesses as to the conduct of persons in Balaklava harbour, and they would examine those gentlemen also. He wanted to know why they were to be called upon to appoint a gentleman on the nomination of hon. Gentlemen opposite? He could only repeat that the Committee was formed upon an understanding. [“No!” and “Hear!”] Could there be any man in that House who did not know that propositions of that sort were always made upon an understanding? Without an understanding he could not have carried the Committee, or any Member of it. He went behind the Speaker’s chair, and entered into correspondence with gentlemen on both sides of the House with the view to form a Committee which would give satisfaction to the country. It would be seen by and by whether they had performed their duties to the satisfaction of the House and of the country. It seemed to him that the understanding with which they had entered on the constitution of the Committee was that the Government should have the nomination of a certain part of the Committee. A Member having withdrawn whom the Government had nominated, he thought the Government had the right to nominate to the vacancy which had been created.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR denied that it was right, though it might be the practice, to enter into a sort of cabal with the Minister as to the members to be nominated on a Committee. He also denied that any man of common sense would be a fit person to be nominated. A good ploughman might have common sense, but he was not therefore a good judge of the circumstances attending the loss of the Prince. Could they tell him that any man of common sense could sit on the woolsack where the Lord Chancellor sat? He must have received a legal education. Education was of all qualities the most essential in the selection of a judge. He thought it most invidious to object to his gallant Friend (Captain Scobell), in whom a large constituency put their trust, and he trusted the House would not be led away by the sophistry of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL hoped the House would give themselves no great trouble about his feelings or his desires, for he had no great feeling or desire to be upon the Sebastopol Committee. It should be remembered that no vacancy was declared by the Government until this Motion was made. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) said to him, he thought the Under Secretary for the Colonies ought to vacate his seat; and would he allow his name to be proposed, as it would not do to propose any Member from the Opposition side, the Member withdrawing having sat on the Government side of the House? He concurred in thinking that the hon. Member for Carlow was disqualified from acting on the Committee by accepting office, and consented to the proposal of his name. He thought the joke about the tailor and the sailor unworthy of the quarter from which it came. He expected to have found more solidity in the learned Gentleman than was consistent with cracking jokes, because the two words, with the exception of a letter, were identical. But, since sailors were disparaged, he would observe that he had been a magistrate for thirty years, and as much in the habit of conducting examinations as the hon. and learned Gentleman himself. He believed he was as capable as most men of putting ordinary questions, and he supposed conjuring questions were not required. The hon. and learned Gentleman was a comparatively young man when he (Captain Scobell) first became a landsman; for such was the system, that when once a man got on shore he was never allowed to go to sea again while men of greater influence were to be found, and the worst of it was that if a man had once been to sea it seemed to be thought he was fit for nothing else. The First Lord of the Treasury said they wanted men of impartiality. The noble Lord dared not, and could not impeach his impartiality, though, perhaps, he was a little more independent than was agreeable to the Government. With respect to ability he was not a judge, and he must, therefore, leave the noble Lord to form his own opinion whether he was fit or unfit. The hon. Member for Surrey spoke of the thousands of questions that had been put—he did not know how many thousands, he said—[Mr. DRUMMOND: 14,000]—but the hon. Gentleman implied that because he had been to sea he would ask more questions than any other person, since, as the hon. Member confessed he did not know the person even of the other hon. Member whose name was proposed, he could not know that few questions would be put if he were appointed. He was just in the same position as the hon. Member for Surrey. He did not know even the person of the hon. Member whose name was proposed, but if the House thought his name preferable it would cause him no disappointment. He thought it his duty to reply to some personal observations which had been made, and from which he gathered that he was not estimated so highly as other Members on that side of the House. The reasons which had been given were all hollow, and might be summed up in this, that the Government and the Gentlemen whom the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had consulted had made a kind of bargain, which would be broken if he were placed upon the Committee. The noble Lord said it was necessary to appoint a person of impartiality, as if he did not possess that quality. He had now been for some years a Member of that House, and while always endeavour-

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he should be extremely sorry if the hon. and gallant Member were to leave the House under the impression that anything which he (Viscount Palmerston) had stated, was meant in the slightest degree to impugn his impartiality, ability, and least of all, that upon which the hon. Gentleman very properly prided himself—his independence. He could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that what he had stated had no reference to his hon. Friend personally, but referred entirely to the question of the manner in which understandings took place with regard to the appointment of Committees. What he had intended to say was, that an understanding between the mover of a Committee and other persons in the House was absolutely necessary, in order to secure the services of hon. Members competent, by their impartiality, ability, and other qualifications, to discharge the duties intrusted to them. That observation applied to the general question, and not in the least to his hon. and gallant Friend, who, in point, of impartiality and ability, was, undoubtedly, as fit to serve upon the Committee as any other Member of that House. The grounds upon which he had thought the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. de Vere) a more fit person to be chosen upon the Committee than his hon. and gallant Friend were, that, inasmuch as the vacancy had arisen in consequence of the withdrawal of an Irish Member, and as there was no other Irish Member upon the Committee, there ought to be upon it at least one Irish Member, considering how deeply Irishmen and Irish matters were interested in the inquiry. It was solely upon that ground that he had objected to the proposal of the hon. Member opposite; and he hoped if his hon. and gallant Friend left the House, he would carry with him the conviction that nothing had been further from his (Viscount Palmerston's) intention than to state anything in the least disparaging of the independence and ability of his hon. and gallant Friend.

MR. MUNTZ complained that the House of Commons was becoming every day more and more a cipher. He felt in great difficulty upon this subject. He had not the honour of knowing the hon. Gentleman whose name was proposed to be added to the Committee, even by sight, and in voting for a member of the Committee he should like to know whom he was voting for. He certainly could not make up his mind to stultify himself by voting for a member on the nomination of the Government, simply because the Government had lost a member of the Committee. He entertained great respect for many Members of Her Majesty's Government, but he could not place the highest confidence in them as a whole.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the noble Lord at the head of the Government had appealed to the Irish Members to vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), but he thought the hon. Gentleman deserved the greatest credit for the manner in which he had brought his proposal forward. The noble Lord said, it was desirable to have one Irish Member on the Committee; but, if that were desirable, why had not more than one Irish Member been placed upon it? The conduct of many of the men who sat upon the Ministerial bench was involved in the inquiry, and it would be unfair to the country to allow the Government, by the connivance of any party in that House, to pack the Committee in their own favour. He acknowledged the abilities of the hon. Member for Limerick; but he must say at once, that he thought the hon. and gallant Member for Bath a more fit person to appoint upon the Committee. With regard to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond), the hon. Gentleman had merely acted upon this occasion as he had upon many others, namely, made a speech upon one side of the question, and ended by voting on the other. It appeared from the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield that a most important witness—a gentleman who had charge of Balaklava harbour—was about to be examined, and it was, therefore, highly desirable to have a naval officer upon the Committee. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield asked if the public were not satisfied with the Committee. He would give the hon. Gentleman an honest answer. He fully believed in the uprightness of the hon. Gentlemen, but he must say the tone and whole object of the Committee seemed to be to deal with the inquiry rather delicately. There was a vast amount of mealy-mouthedness exhibited in that House, and a great deal of delicacy upstairs. In his opinion there was one man whose conduct ought particularly to be inquired into, and it was highly requisite that the Committee should ascertain the reason of the lethargy which had characterised the conduct of that man for months, while the noblest army ever sent into the field was withering away. The person he referred to was Lord Raglan; and he wished to ask where had been the inquiry into his conduct? The Committee had elicited a great amount of useful information, but only to confirm what The Times had already told the country, and what had been sneered at and denied from time to time by the Government. The country desired to know why Lord Raglan was sleeping while his army was rotting away; and the only way to obtain that information was by putting independent men upon the Committee, determined to probe the subject to the bottom.

MR. BENTINCK, in reply, expressed his surprise at the persistence of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield in the extraordinary argument he had adopted. The hon. Gentleman told them that the Committee was formed upon an understanding between the Government and certain other persons; but he (Mr. Bentinck) contended that that was not the principle on which the Committee ought to be formed, and was a total misconception of the manner in which Committees were nominated in that House. The process of appointing a Committee was for the mover of a Committee, after having obtained the sanction of the House to his proposal, to submit to the House a certain number of names; but this was the first time he had ever heard the doctrine broached that the Government ought to be consulted as to the composition of a Committee. Such a doctrine would be highly objectionable, especially where the character of the Government was involved. As an independent Member his conduct was not called in question in the investigation, whereas the conduct of at least half of the Members of the Cabinet was impugned, and he, therefore, submitted that as an independent Member he was more entitled to suggest who should compose the Committee than the Government.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Captain SOOBELL be added to the Committee."

The House divided; Ayes 68, Noes 81: Majority 13.

The House adjourned at Eleven o'clock till Monday next.

CLOTHING OF THE GUARDS—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STUART said, he begged to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War whether the last detachment of Guards, 1,000 strong, left London on the 12th April with the clothes of 1854, the new clothing due on the 1st April, 1855, not having been issued; whether the allowance made to the men for wearing their own clothes will be borne by the contractors or by the Government, from the 1st April to the date of issuing the new clothing of 1855; and whether any steps have been taken to provide the Guards with clothing suitable to the Crimean summer, the issue of white trousers having been lately discontinued?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he thought the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been put from the want of information as to the regulations that were observed by the Guards with respect to the wearing of their clothing. In the case of regiments of the line, when an issue of clothing was made, the clothing of the preceding year was discontinued, but, in the case of the Guards, it was usual for them to have two suits of clothing in use, the suit last issued being reserved for Sundays, parades, and reviews, while clothing issued to them for the preceding year was worn on all ordinary occasions. The detachment referred to consequently had in wear, at the time of their departure, the clothing issued for 1854, and it would be against the regulations if they were to take into use, on leaving London, the new clothing of the present year issued on the 1st of April last. No allowance, therefore, would be due to them; and, with regard to the last portion of the question, although it was true that white trousers had been discontinued, light clothing of another fashion would be substituted, and would be sent from this country as soon as it was ready. In the meantime, he might say that a supply of light clothing for the army generally in the Crimea had been provided at Constantinople. He would take that opportunity of answering a question which had been put to him the other night by a noble Lord opposite. He had been asked whether a detachment of the 50th Regiment had not been landed from the Alma, while the baggage of the detachment was taken on to the Crimea. He had then stated that he had received no report on the subject, but he thought it was extremely unlikely that such a circumstance should have taken place. Since that time he had been put in possession of a report from the commanding officer of that detachment, and he found that the whole of the regimental baggage and camp equipage was duly landed. One officer, however, had left behind him a portmanteau, and another officer had left behind him a camp bed, and for that the Government were not responsible. With those exceptions the statement was entirely without foundation.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, that perhaps the House would allow him to explain that the new clothing of the Guards was not sent out, but the clothing they had taken out had only been worn one quarter of a year, and was as good if not better than that now in wear by the army in the Crimea. The new clothing would be sent out in the course of the summer, and would be taken into wear when most wanting, namely, during the next winter.

NATIONAL GALLERY—QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he begged to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Sir Charles Eastlake has been appointed director of the National Gallery, and Mr. Wornum secretary; and whether Sir Charles Eastlake has been appointed for five years, or for life?

Viscount PALMERSTON: No appointments have as yet taken place with respect to any of the offices to which the noble Lord has referred. The whole arrangement is still under consideration.

SUPPLY OF GUANO—VENEZUELA—
QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL said, he begged to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government was aware of the fact of the Venezuelan Government, or persons in the name of that Government, having taken possession of the Island of Aves, which was surveyed by the British Government in 1849 ; and if so, whether it is intended to take any measures for the recovery of the island, and for the preservation to this country of the supply of guano which abounds there ?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that in the year 1849 some officers in the British service examined the island in question, and had reason to think that there was a supply of guano upon it, but it was doubtful. In December last, Her Majesty's Government was informed that some Americans had ascertained that there was guano on the island, and that some arrangement had been entered into between these American adventurers and the Government of Venezuela, granting and securing to that American undertaking the exclusive right to take guano for a certain number of years. A question arose as to whether this island could be claimed by Great Britain, as having been an unoccupied island, and whether England, by right of first occupation, could claim sovereignty over it. On consulting the Law Officers of the Crown, it appeared from the statement of facts that Great Britain could not properly assert any claim of sovereignty over that island ; but as soon as that was ascertained, instructions were sent to the British consul at Caraccas to require from the Government of Venezuela that British subjects should have the same privileges and facilities for obtaining guano from that island as should be afforded to the subjects of any other country.

CIVIL HOSPITAL AT SMYRNA—
QUESTION.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he begged to ask a question of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the War Department, but before doing so it was necessary that he should say a few words in explanation. When the civil hospital was established at Smyrna, great doubts were expressed as to the salubrity of the climate. At that time, however, there was a great pressure for room, and a barrack was offered to the Government by the Turkish Government for hospital purposes. Arrangements were made that that barrack should be immediately taken possession of, but that hospitals constructed of wood should be sent out, so as to enable the whole of the establishment, before the hot weather set in, to be removed to some other more salubrious locality. He understood that at that hospital, owing to the prevalence of fever, and to the necessity of giving one thousand cubic feet to each patient, it was necessary to reduce the number of patients from 800—the number the hospital was supposed to be capable of containing—to 480. That being the case, it appeared that they had an expensive staff of civil surgeons, with a much smaller number of patients under their care than was intended. He, therefore, begged to ask whether or not wooden hospitals had been sent out, or, if not, whether they were about to be sent out ; and if not, whether the intention had been changed with regard to removing the hospital from Smyrna to some other locality supposed to be more salubrious when the hot weather set in.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he had seen a letter from Dr. Meyer, the head of the civil hospital at Smyrna, written on the 14th of this month, in which he stated that he had reduced the number of patients accommodated in the hospital buildings to 480 or 490. He added that the medical staff under him was capable of treating double that number of sick, and he therefore submitted that the Government should increase the number of sick to 1,000 or 1,200, and that that should be done, not by disusing the hospital building, but by erecting wooden huts in an open space adjoining the building. He (Mr. Peel) could not find that any huts had been sent out from this country for erection at Smyrna ; some were on their way to be erected near Constantinople, but, with the application from Dr. Meyer before them, he thought a number of huts should be sent out, so as to enable him to increase the number of patients to the amount specified, namely, 1,000 or 1,200. So far as Dr. Meyer's report went, the hospital appeared to have been progressing very favourably, and in a private letter, received that day, he stated that the average statistical results were quite as good as in any other hospital in the East.

MR. LAYARD said, he desired to know whether accounts had been received that fever had already broken out in the lower wards of the hospital at Smyrna, and that all the patients had been removed from those wards?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he must beg to state in reply, that Dr. Meyer had removed all the patients from the ground floor of the hospital, and moved them to the first or second floor. Perhaps the question would be best answered by reading an extract from the letter of Dr. Meyer, dated the 7th of April. In that letter he made the following statement:—

"The general state of those in hospital is improving daily. The number of fever cases is diminishing, also the number of deaths, there having been only two last week. The orderlies have hitherto been sleeping in the sick wards, and many have in consequence been attacked with fever; they are now being moved into rooms appropriated to the attendants on the ground floor, so that I confidently expect that this evil will be diminished. I have no misgivings with regard to the climate; if not over-crowded, the sick would do well here."

ASSISTANT-SURGEONS FOR THE BALTIC FLEET—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE TYLER said, he had seen in The Times of that morning a statement with respect to the appointment of surgeons and assistant-surgeons to the fleet now in the Baltic which appeared to be contrary to that which the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Admiral Berkeley) had made the other night, and to impugn the veracity of the hon. and gallant Admiral's statement. He (Sir G. Tyler) wished, therefore, to give an opportunity to the hon. and gallant Admiral of making a reply, and setting himself right with the House and the country.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, the House would perhaps allow him to explain what it was he had stated in answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Chippenham (Colonel Boldero) who first brought the subject forward. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, having remarked that last year there were a great number of vacancies in the medical department of the fleets sent to the Baltic and Black Sea, he (Admiral Berkeley) had thought it his duty to contradict that statement. He accordingly stated that there was a proper allowance of medical men in both of those fleets, and that he had never heard any complaint upon the subject before. An anonymous letter in The Times endeavoured to fix him with having stated that there were no vacancies at present. That, however, was a mere anonymous assertion, and whenever such an assertion was made in the proper place in that House he would endeavour to reply to it. Throughout his private and public life he had endeavoured to treat all anonymous correspondence with the contempt due to cowardice, and he should always continue to act in the same manner.

THE NEGOTIATIONS AT VIENNA.— QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, the importance of the question which I am about to put to the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government will be a sufficient apology for my putting it without having given previous notice. I wish to know whether the House can be informed or is to understand that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London has left Vienna, and if the conferences and negotiations are considered by the Government to be at an end? If that be so, I wish also to ask whether the noble Lord can inform the House on what day he will make a specific statement, or afford to the House documentary information, whereby we may be enabled to ascertain precisely what is the difference between the terms offered by the allies, and any terms that may have been offered as counter propositions by the Russian Government, in order that the House and the country may precisely understand, if the war is to be prolonged, what is to be the object of the war in future? As I have not been enabled to find persons agreeing as to why the war began at all, I am the more anxious that we should know exactly how we stand, apart from the obscurity of diplomatic language, and I therefore beg to inquire of the noble Lord if he can give the House, at an early period, the specific information for which I ask?

— VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the subject referred to by the hon. Gentleman is of too great and deep importance for me to shrink from some explanation even at the present moment, though, as to what may be the time at which Her Majesty's Government may think fit to give more detailed information, or to lay any papers upon the table, I am not now in a position to state. It is well known to the House that the English and French Governments in concert with the Government of Austria, had determined that the proper development of the third point, which regarded the treaties of 1840 and 1841, with respect to the Straits of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, should be, among other things, that the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea should henceforth be made to cease. That was the principle laid down by England and France, and agreed to by Austria, and it was in the abstract accepted by the Russian Plenipotentiary. On Thursday last, at the conference held on that day, at which were present the English, French, Austrian, Turkish, and Russian Plenipotentiaries; the Plenipotentiaries of England, France, Austria, and Turkey proposed to the representative of Russia, as a mode of making the preponderance of Russia cease in the Black Sea—which, in principle, had been admitted and accepted by Russia—either that the amount of the Russian naval force in the Black Sea should henceforth be limited by treaty, or that the Black Sea should be declared entirely neutral ground and all ships of war of all countries be excluded from it, so that henceforth it should be a sea for commerce only. The Russian Plenipotentiary required forty-eight hours to take that proposal into consideration. Those forty-eight hours elapsed on Saturday, and on Saturday another conference was held, at which the Russian Plenipotentiary absolutely refused to accept either of the alternatives proposed, those alternatives being pressed by the four other Plenipotentiaries unanimously. Thereupon the conference adjourned sine die, and my noble Friend the Member for the City of London, and the French Minister, M. Drouyn de Lhuys, were, I believe, to take their departure from Vienna in the course of the present day.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the noble Lord had not answered the question of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), with respect to any counter propositions which might have been made by Russia.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I have to state that Russia made no counter proposition.

WAYS AND MEANS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER brought up the Report of the Resolutions agreed to in Committee of Ways and Means.

On the First Resolution being put,

MR. GOULBURN said, he hoped as he had been unable to attend on the evening when the Budget was brought forward, that the House would excuse him for now offering some observations on the course taken by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the raising of a loan. It was not his intention to offer any opposition to the confirmation of the contract into which the right hon. Gentleman had entered. Abstractedly considered, the loan appeared to have been contracted on terms fair to the contractors, and not unfair to the country; but as he thought the House must be prepared to anticipate that in future years they might be called upon for a repetition of the process of raising money by loan, he was anxious to point out the objections to which the present arrangement was liable in order to prevent the inconvenience which would result from the continued adoption of the same system. If he could believe, with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Parliament, on the arrival of peace, would be prepared to apply a surplus of 1,000,000*l.* annually to the redemption of the debt now to be incurred, and to apply the same principle to every future loan, then he should have no objection to make to the measure, but as he did not believe this, he could hardly persuade himself that when his right hon. Friend came to consider what experience had pointed out as the reasonable objections to the course proposed, he would still be disposed to persevere in it. He must say that he doubted the justice of the Resolution, against which applied with still greater force the objection usually brought against loans, that they threw the whole burden upon posterity, whilst the parties borrowing derived nothing but the advantage. But if they threw the entire burden, not merely of the increase of the debt caused by the loan, but of the redemption at the rate of 7 per cent upon posterity, they enhanced the objection heretofore raised to the system of loans. But let them consider whether it was in the least degree probable that on the arrival of peace Parliament would be prepared to fulfil the engagement into which they were called upon to enter, to raise above what was required to defray the annual expenditure, an additional revenue of 1,000,000*l.* annually for sixteen years for the purpose of repaying the capital borrowed. He would ask hon. Gentlemen whether it was probable, from the experience of past years, that such a plan would succeed. When he first sat in Parliament many hon. Members, thoroughly acquainted with financial matters, advocated the establishment of a sinking fund, and the House adopted a solemn Resolution by which they declared that 5,000,000*l.* a year should without fail be set apart for the redemption of the debt. Now, did Parliament adhere to that Resolution? Quite the contrary. Two years afterwards their confidence failed them, and the House declared that 3,000,000*l.* a year should be set apart for that purpose; but they observed that Resolution with just as much punctuality as they had done the first. In the end, the only mode adopted of reducing the funded debt was by comparing quarterly the amount of revenue with that of expenditure, and applying any surplus to its redemption. As the custom had been to apply this to the payment of deficiency bills, the surplus which was intended for the reduction of debt had been generally used to eke out the revenue of a deficient quarter. How, in the face of this, could the Chancellor of the Exchequer hope that on the restoration of peace Parliament would raise an additional revenue for the purpose of paying off debt at the rate of one million for every sixteen used for carrying on this war? He therefore hoped his right hon. Friend would abandon the Resolution by which he proposed to lay on this increased burden for the repayment of the debt for that Resolution as it stood could not deceive any persons who were conversant with the financial system of the country. As the loan was in Three per Cent Consols, he was bound to take it as an irredeemable annuity to the amount of somewhere about 500,000*l.* a year, and it was as an irredeemable annuity that he objected to it. They were about to impose on the country for ever the charge of 500,000*l.*; and if succeeding loans were contracted on the same principle, a burden would be imposed on the country from which there was no hope of relief. It was perfectly true that, technically speaking, the Three per Cent Consols were redeemable; but twelve months' notice was required before any alteration could take place; and he would ask any man conversant with financial affairs where he could find a Chancellor of the Exchequer bold enough, in the circumstances in which the country might find itself placed, to give twelve months' notice that at the end of that period he would be prepared to deal with that large amount which the Three per Cents offered to the operator. He contended, therefore, that the funds must be regarded as practically irredeemable annuities. It was the first duty of the Minister entrusted with the management of the finances to apply himself, as far as possible, to the reduction of the burden which the national debt imposed on the country. He could only do this in one of two modes—by applying a special revenue for the reduction of the capital of the debt, or by availing himself of those reductions of interest which might take place from time to time in the general market, and thus relieve the public of part of the charge of the debt. Exactly in proportion to the difficulty of the operation was the duty incumbent on us to take care that we did not throw away a favourable opportunity of reducing the interest of the debt, and it was in that respect, he thought, his right hon. Friend had erred. He knew he might be told that Mr. Pitt, who was acknowledged by all to be a great master of finance, raised his loan by offers of Three per Cent Consolidated Annuities, but the circumstances under which Mr. Pitt acted were totally different from those which existed at the present time. Mr. Pitt had no other fund open to him of sufficient amount to enable him to borrow on it with advantage. The whole amount of Consols at the commencement of the last war did not exceed 100,000,000. But the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had far larger funds open to him in other Stock, and he believed his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have acted a much wiser and safer part if he had made an offer of this new loan in the Three per Cent Annuities, which represented a capital of 250,000,000, and were capable of redemption in the year 1874, rather than in the Three per Cent Consols, which, as he had already shown, were in fact irredeemable. The consideration was one of vital importance to the future interest of the country. He maintained that we ought to purchase the power of redemption in twenty years by some sacrifice of immediate interest, rather than entail on ourselves and on posterity the burden of a perpetual charge. The theory of the plan of raising money by annuities, was that at the expiration of a certain period the whole sum they had borrowed would be discharged, and to secure that advantage the borrower consented to pay a considerable additional interest above the market rate. If, therefore, for the sake of the extinction of the debt at a distant period, they were willing to raise the terms to be given to the loan contractor, he maintained that it would be good policy to raise the terms to a limited amount, in order to the reduction of interest on the debt when the market rate fell. When he spoke of the reduction of interest, he might be told that he was indulging in a premature speculation; but with his knowledge of the industry and energy of the people of this country, with the great facilities of enterprise possessed by the inhabitants in time of peace, and the great accumulation of capital that was continually taking place, he could not conceal his conviction that if they should be blessed with a long return of peace, the interest of money would be at a far lower rate than it stood at the present moment. He trusted, therefore, that they would take care not to divest themselves of the possibility of effecting a reduction of interest, of which they had already experienced the benefit. In making these observations he did not forget the difficulties of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's position, and he had been induced to make them chiefly for the purpose of pointing out what he considered would be the most advantageous course to follow in any future loan that might be contracted.

MR. T. BARING said, he had heard with very great astonishment the objection which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman who had just resumed his seat, to one part of the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If there was one Member in that House on whom he thought he could have relied more than on another for the maintenance of the principle of repaying what we had borrowed, that Member would have been the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House. To his surprise, however, he found that the right hon. Gentleman opposed the clause for applying 1,000,000*l.* of the surplus revenue, after the peace, towards the extinction of this debt. He opposed the clause which said that, when we borrowed in a time of exigency, we should pay when we had the power to do so, which said we should borrow for the purposes of war, but that when peace came we should show our good faith by being careful to pay. He confessed he saw no good reason, because we had not hitherto adopted the system of repaying what we had borrowed, that the House should now refuse to pass a Resolution expressive of its honest intentions. It was no argument to him that, because they had before abolished surplus revenue applicable to their past debt, they should not now, in making another loan, assert the principle that in time of peace they should pay the debt incurred in war. It was nothing to him that because this House of Commons was honest, there might be another House of Commons that would not be equally so. The ground on which he supported this clause of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not be induced to give up, was that he thought it important to lay down as a principle the rule that, while in times of emergency, of exigency, of war, and of trial, debt must necessarily be incurred, it became the first duty of Parliament and of the Government, when the means recurred of filling our coffers, to diminish that debt by the application of our surplus revenue. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goulburn) asked the House to see how delusive past Resolutions had been on this subject. No doubt good intentions often were delusive, but he never knew it inculcated as a moral precept in consequence, that there never should be good intentions. The duty of the House was to say we should refrain from borrowing as long as we could, to lay no burden and impose no obligation on posterity if it were possible to avoid it; but that, when we must necessarily borrow, to do so with the honest intention of reducing the debt as soon as practicable. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think there would be no possibility of carrying out this Resolution, that there would be such a pressure on the Government that any surplus which might exist would be extinguished; but, though precedent might be against him, he would still cling to the hope that we should find a Government strong enough and honest enough to resist the pressure that might be made for excessive reduction. It had always appeared to him that there was little wisdom in what had been termed an "ignorant impatience of taxation." It was necessary, if we wished to maintain public credit that we should maintain a surplus revenue; and it was equally necessary that, if we wished to be honest, to apply the surplus revenue obtainable in a time of peace and abundance to the extinction of debt incurred in periods of emergency. He would not enter upon the question whether we could have borrowed better in the Three per Cents Annuities, which are redeemable in 1874, but would only say, that the Minister of the day would in all probability have enough to do with the 250,000,000*l.* which would then stare him in the face, without encumbering him with greater difficulties.

He believed the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be just and honest, and, considering the time and the circumstances in which the arrangement was made, not only creditable in its terms, but likewise advantageous for the Government. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gone on the principle that during thirty years the nation should pay 14*s.* 6*d.* for every 100*l.* of money borrowed. He must express his hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would persist in the clause for applying 1,000,000*l.* annually to the repayment of the loan, inasmuch as it would record the Resolution of the House to apply this amount out of the surplus revenue to that purpose after the restoration of peace. He did not know how far the constituencies were likely to be favourable to that addition to the taxation; but he hoped the scheme of his right hon. Friend might be carried out. He had been surprised to hear the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) the other night say that the right hon. Gentleman might with the greatest ease have obtained his money in terminable annuities. It was very well in theory or in the closet to say that it might have been so obtained easily. But in all contracts there were two sides, and you might no doubt find a seller with opinions that this would be the more just course, and the more advantageous for the country, but, on the other hand, you must find your buyer, and if you wanted the money you must offer a commodity that would be dealt in. He must confess his doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been able to obtain it on those terms, except by making some great concessions and sacrifices, which would have been at once repudiated by the House and the country. The hon. Member for Wick also referred to the large sum of money borrowed for the French railways in annuities, for a term of ninety-nine years, but he forgot to say that it was not a question of fixed rental but of fluctuating profit in that case, and that the parties lending entered into a commercial speculation. It would be impossible that Government affairs of finance could be conducted in that way, and to parallel two ways of raising money for different objects, and with different terms and inducements, seemed to him a notion utterly preposterous. The hon. Member for Wick likewise recommended them to try the plan of subscription, as had been done in France; but in that country there was a large class of proprietors of small means, who, having before their eyes the dread of such revolutions and public calamities as they had witnessed in their own country, were anxious either to hoard their money or to lay it out only in what they thought a secure investment upon very favourable terms. The French, too, as a community, were a more saving people than the English. The people in the interior of France had, and still have, a great deal of money divided amongst the great mass of the people, either hoarded, or, at any rate, employed at a very low rate of interest. But the same thing did not exist in England. The owners of small sums of money were here not only more intelligent but also more enterprising; they generally invested their savings in something that would give them a good rate of interest. The French Three per Cent Loan was negotiated at 62; could the Chancellor of the Exchequer have offered the same inducement here? He could have, at the most, offered 3*½* per cent, and did the House think that persons holding small sums would have diverted them from existing investments and subscribed them to a loan at 3*½* per cent? He did not believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have raised his loan either by terminable annuities or an open subscription; but by inserting the clause they were then discussing, he had done what he could do in order to comply with what he felt to be the true policy of this country—that we should continue a surplus income in time of prosperity in order that we might apply it to the diminution of our debt.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he concurred in two important points to which the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) had just adverted. He was firmly convinced that it would not be possible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to contract for so large a sum of money as he required upon the terms of terminable annuities except at prices wholly extravagant and disproportionate. He thought, likewise, that he had done service to the cause of truth and to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in saying that which he hoped would tend to dissipate the delusive opinion which prevailed—namely, that it would be competent for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to adopt the mode of proceeding with respect to the loan which had been so wisely taken in France—an opinion which he thought could never be entertained by those who had made a careful estimate of the great difference which existed in the circumstances of the two countries. But he (Mr. Gladstone) considered that it was not just to his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) for the hon. Member for Huntingdon to comment as he had done upon the observations that had fallen from him. He was, however, glad to find that the hon. Member opposite and his right hon. Friend both concurred in holding the opinion, that it was the duty of Parliament in times of peace to maintain a surplus revenue for the reduction of the national debt. He knew the opinion of his right hon. Friend, not only from his words, but from his deeds when he held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, for while he held that office it was a main object with him to create a large surplus revenue applicable to the reduction of debt from year to year. That, however, was not the point of difference between the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Baring) and his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goulburn). He did not believe that there was a man in that House more disposed to exercise his influence for the creation of a surplus revenue than his right hon. Friend. The question, however, was this, not whether they were to have a surplus revenue in time of peace, but whether this clause would really assist the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the attainment of his object. The right hon. Gentleman said that this proposition was but the assertion of a principle. Now, he (Mr. Gladstone) ventured to say on Friday night, what he would now repeat, that he respected the motive and object with which the right hon. Gentleman introduced his proposal. He was convinced that the object of the right hon. Gentleman was most honourable to himself, and that his desire was a large application of the revenue from year to year to the principle of reducing the debt. But would the right hon. Gentleman attain that object by means of a clause of this description? That was the question for discussion upon that occasion. What did the right hon. Gentleman mean when he said that this was but the assertion of a principle? He apprehended, when Parliament wanted to assert a principle, in the sense of a solemn expression of their conviction, the proper place for doing so was not in a clause but in the preamble of a Bill. That was the usage of the Legislature upon all occasions. But what was the use of Parliament enacting a clause for a purpose to which it was not in its power to give effect? This clause purported to be a contract or pledge. Now, there were two things requisite in respect to a contract or pledge. First, it should be given to somebody; secondly, it should be given by somebody who had a right to give it. But a future Parliament might very reasonably question the right of that Parliament to pledge it. But the clause not only asserted the principle that a certain surplus was to be applied by a future Parliament, but it actually specified the particular amount of money to be applied and the form of investment. Now, a future Parliament might naturally say that they were better judges of this matter than the Parliament that had enacted such a clause. Upon what principle was the Parliament of 1855 to say that 1,000,000*l.* a year must be applied in a particular way by the Parliament of 1860 or 1870? They were there to find supplies and money to meet the national exigencies for our own times, and not for the time of our children. That was not their business. They would not ensure the attainment of their object by dictating in this way to a future Parliament as to the manner in which they were to exercise their discretion. He would point out another great disadvantage which attended this mode of proceeding. They provided that this 1,000,000*l.* sterling should be applied to the redemption of the debt at a future time, and also to the redemption of Consols. How could they tell now, whether in the year 1860 or 1870 it would be wise to apply this money as was proposed in the redemption of the stock? It might be preferable to redeem Exchequer bills or Exchequer bonds or other stocks. But here was an Act of Parliament of 1855—utterly ignorant of the circumstances under which the money was to be applied in successive years—actually dictating to a future Parliament the policy they ought to pursue, and appointing a mode of investment under circumstances of which they could have no knowledge whatever. The question was this—were they likely to promote the maintenance of the principle of a surplus revenue by an Act of this kind? However much he respected the motives of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he confessed he inclined to the opinion that the Parliament would do much better to rest satisfied with the performance of its own duty, and not undertake to lay down a particular policy to a future Parliament. He must not be told that enactments of this nature were harmless. Enactments of this kind had a tendency to throw dust in the eyes of the people, and to create an undue facility for unnecessary loans. These were extremely grave questions. For his part he thought the more straightforward and better course would be to be as explicit as possible in all their proceedings involving the disposal of the money of the people. They ought not to attempt to express what was called a principle, but what was really a mere paper promise of repayment, which they had no right to bind others to fulfil. Before sitting down he wished to draw attention to an inadvertence that occurred in the proceedings of the Committee on Friday night. Upon consulting the Votes on the following morning he found that the Resolution relating to the loan, the Customs, and the Excise duties, had, in conformity to previous practice, been voted by the Committee. It appeared, also, that the Resolution affirming the principle of the new income tax was also voted at the same time. He apprehended that the principle of discussing all proposals relating to taxation in Committee of that House, upon their introduction, was one of the most precious and important privileges of the House. The House, with good sense, sometimes waived the principle of discussion in cases where propositions relating to taxation were absolutely necessary and urgent. There was, however, no reason of this kind at all applicable to the Resolution proposing an increase in the income tax. There was no proceeding to be taken which depended in the slightest degree upon the passing of that Resolution on Friday night. The same observation applied equally well to the proposed stamp duty upon bankers' cheques. The usage was to give time to the House, after hearing the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to consider such proposals before they were called upon to proceed to any Vote. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), when he made his financial statement in December, 1852, not only did not press the House for any Vote, but it was actually in the first stage, in the preliminary Committee, that his proposals were resisted and rejected by a majority. The present departure from the usual practice had, no doubt, happened inadvertently, but the point was of such grave importance that he had felt it his duty to enter his protest against it. He, however, must express a hope that this evident error would not hereafter be drawn into a precedent.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have thrown the loan open to public competition, and he considered that the right hon. gentleman might have raised 20,000,000*l.* on terminable annuities at less than 4 per cent., which, with 3,000,000*l.* of Exchequer Bills, would have given him all the funds that he required, without having recourse to the imposition of increased duties on tea and coffee. He quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) that the House had no right to pledge a future Parliament to the repayment of 1,000,000*l.* per annum of the debt now incurred.
